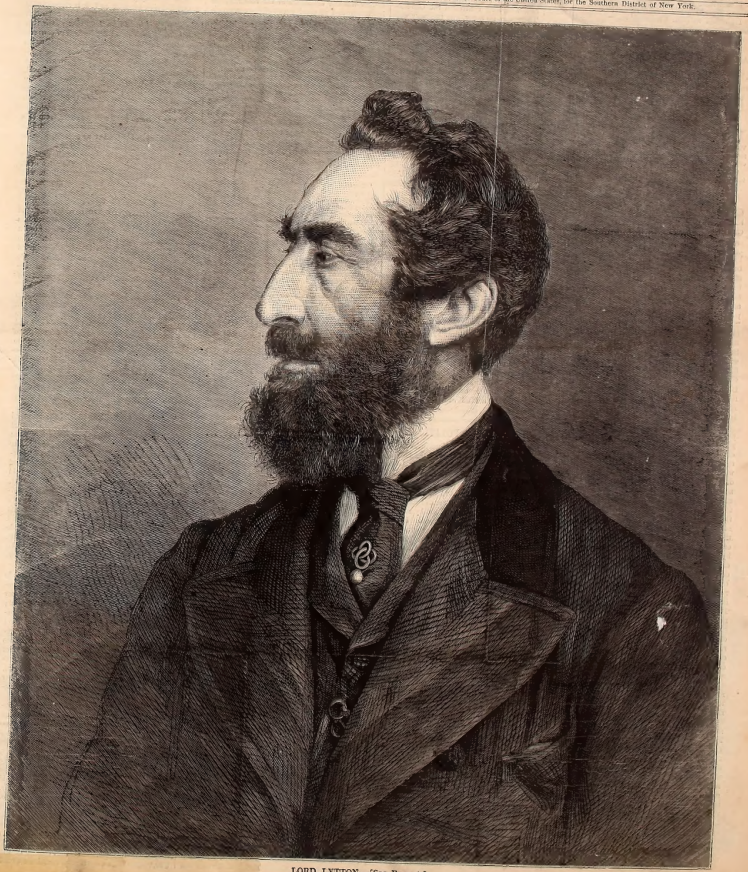
Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from The Institute of Museum and Library Services through an Indiana State Library LSTA Grant http://archive.org/details/harpersweeklyv14bonn

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 679.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.



LORD LYTTON.—[SEE PAGE 6.]

SANTA CLAUS.

He journeys, a guest,
To our gladdened West,
In the gay memorial season,
At the merry time of chime and rhyme
When pleasure romps with reason.

Strange tales we know
Of his beard of snow;
And the reindeer steeds that draw him;
But not a man exists who can
Affirm that he ever saw him!

Always he pays
In secret ways
Those visits that delight us;
And drops by stealth his Christmas wealth,
Too cautious to affright us.

And though unseen,
Where his hands have been Rare joyance follows after;
While his praises float from many a throat
In ripples of mellow laughter.

To us his name
Means more than fame,
With fairest memories round it.
He loves the true old Christmas-bell—
Oh, bid the steeples sound it!

And warm and free
Let the welcome be
As the flame of our brightest logs;
For he comes, a guest, whither every breast
Pays homage to Kris Kringle!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1870.

☞ Subscribers who wish to bind the Thirteenth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY, ending with No. 676, may obtain gratuitously from the principal News-agents a TITLE-PAGE and TABLE OF CONTENTS.

☞ Dealers may obtain CLOTH COVERS for Binding the Volume at Seventy-five cents each, net.

OUR NEUTRAL POLICY.

SENATOR CARPENTER undoubtedly presents the feeling of Cuba as strongly as it can be urged; but the very vital point of his speech was its weakest part. We are neutral, he found, by the laws of nations and by our own pledges to stand entirely neutral between Spain and Cuba. But how can we be neutral and stand between two professed belligerents? For this most obvious question Senator CARPENTER has a reply. It is, that the acts of 1794 and of 1818 declare the policy of this country to be "neutrality, with the recognition of belligerent rights from the inception of any actual revolution." What is any actual revolution? This question, also, the Senator answers by saying that, in a legal sense, when the fact has not been enforced by civil officers, but only by military authority within a state, war exists. This may be a legal fact and a fact in an international sense; for such a principle would foment and strengthen insurrection every where. It would practically abolish international comity.

Certainly Senator CARPENTER would not say that the necessity of enforcing the law in the presence of General GRANT'S bayonets the other day in Brooklyn made a state of war between that district and the United States. He would probably admit that time and a certain display of force and evidence of purpose were necessary to elevate a riot into a revolution, and to justify the concession of belligerent rights to the rioters by foreign Powers. Until those things were approved he would doubtless concede that there was not "actual revolution," although his words, as reported, are more peremptory, and seem to contemplate interference by recognition at the "inception" of actual revolution—such as the Boston massacre in 1770, or the firing on the Star of the West in 1861, or the firing on the Sumter in 1863.

Upon such a principle as this, Senator CARPENTER would not, of course, complain that at the inception of the revolution in the country in 1861, England acknowledged the belligerent rights of the revolutionists. But if, as we assume, he would allow some considerable period of purpose, but of power, to be essential to the recognition of belligerency to both parties in a civil war, he would probably ask international precedents. That custom demands that a belligerent claiming recognition shall have a corporate existence, a civil government performing its functions, ports, and prize courts; that is, that it be more than an armed body of men able to defy the ordinary military force.

The Senator's speech begs the question. He says that, if Cuba violated our neutrality laws by fitting out expeditions, Spain was equally guilty in doing the same thing. This argument asserts that we were bound to treat them both alike. But this is a total mistake. Cuba is not a Power. Cuba is not even a belligerent, so far as we are concerned, until we choose to be so by recognition; and when we do that, we do it upon evidence of the existence of the facts we have mentioned. The act of 1818 indeed forbids the fitting out, or arming in our ports, of ships to be used against any foreign prince, colony, district, or people with whom we are at peace. But, as Senator SUMNER stated, these qualifying words were introduced into the act purposely, and with the specific intention of including the Spanish colonies then in revolt, but of whose belligerency there was no question. The principle which Senator CARPENTER asserted to be that of the policy of the United States, is unquestionably that which Mr. BANES sought to introduce by the modification of the Neutrality laws; but his attempt shows that it is not our present principle or policy.

Indeed, all those who strenuously urge this practice are justifying upon what they call the loftiest grounds the action of England and her granting of our rebellion. If ever circumstances authorized recognition at the "inception of actual revolution," they existed in 1861. England acknowledged the belligerent rights of the Confederacy as a belligerency. The President of the United States had virtually declared that there was no constitutional power to coerce States. It was conceded on every side that the Constitution did not in terms forbid secession. The world had seen the country paralyzed by the sloth at the Star of the West, and apparently enduring it without a protest. The foreign representatives of the Government were friendly to the rebellion. The party whose leaders had begun the revolt was immense, and had long controlled the Government. There was no army, and the navy was dispersed. If ever there was a promising "inception of actual revolution," this was it, and according to Senator CARPENTER'S principle, as reported, Great Britain was wholly justified.

But upon which side, how could equity between the assent of Great Britain to the proposition of France to recognize the independence of the Union at the battle of Fredericksburg! If it be the true policy to grant belligerent rights from the inception of any actual revolution, it is certainly not equally just policy to recognize the independence of a belligerent which, for more than two years, has resisted the efforts of the antagonist, and has maintained a complete system of civil government, and after a decisive victory seems to be consolidated more firmly than ever, nevertheless, refused. Hostile as she seemed to us, she yet refrained from that final and disastrous step which, it is but a logical inference from Senator CARPENTER'S speech, as reported, to say that she was, in his opinion, justified in taking.

The most decisive point in favor of Cuba to-day is the Alabama question. Our position upon it is very strong, and it is fortified by the latest intelligence. Every word spoken upon the subject of international relations, every act done, bears upon the question. Yet not to that merely, officially urging as it is, but for the general welfare of the world, and for the liberty in whose name Senator CARPENTER as well as ourselves has taken our stand, is nothing which shall authorize the eager interference of nations in foreign difficulties. If one nation may intervene for one purpose another will intervene for another. The only reasonable and safe rule is that of the United States, and especially for all who are struggling for liberty, and non-interference until power as well as purpose is established by universal, while evidence, of a kind which is universally acknowledged.

MISSISSIPPI POLITICS.

THE result of the late elections in Texas and Mississippi is now seen to be the fact, Mr. DAVIS is elected Governor of Texas, is very agreeable to those who see in it the evidence of a really Republican party in the States. It was a favorite theory of Governor ANDREW of Massachusetts that the real work of reconstruction in the South must be done by native or long-resident Southern white men. He foresaw the immigration from the Northern States that he was not satisfied could be composed altogether of those who could do the work that was essential. This was also the theory of the thorough Republicans, who have been waiting to see if there were any signs of the appearance of such men. They would be those, of whose coming, the reports made us despair —Southern men who fought for the Confederacy, and who honestly and honorably accepted the defeat, and the consequent situation. In the nature of the case there could be few such men; but Governor ALCORN, the Republican Governor of Mississippi, seems to be one of them.

He did not conceal before the election that he had been a rebel; that he had served in the rebel army, and lost a son in it; that he had been a slave-owner, and was a considerable holder in the State where he had lived for twenty-five years, and with which he was entirely identified. But General ALCORN seems to have been able to understand the logical consequences of the utter fall of the Confederacy and of emancipation. He was also liberal enough to recognize the supreme and resistless power of the victorious Government, and that to defy it was merely to dash himself against the wall. He looked around him, he saw that the hatred of the negro in consequence of emancipation threatened his annihilation, with the loss of the laboring population and endless woes. He saw also that the negro could not but be defended by a military force, and by the ballot. The old matters were, to so speak, the natural leaders of the freedmen. But they carried the new citizens, who were obliged to seek fellowship somewhere, and they turned to the Northern settlers, many of whom were educated, and had various social and property ties to the South. But others were, as was to be expected, mere adventurers who would stop at nothing that might secure their selfish advantage.

The leadership of the new citizens by such men was for every reason not desirable, and in 1867 Mr. ALCORN called upon the white people of the South to accept the situation in good faith, and not to pout and sulk against the inevitable. He was universally denounced by the consequence. But when a policy of general proscription was proposed in the State of Mississippi it failed. Then the Republican party of Mississippi was founded upon the platform of an intelligent union of all who heartily accepted the Republican national policy, including equal suffrage, and at this year General ALCORN was the candidate in the late contest with Judge DENT. The latter was the candidate of the "Conservatives" of every kind—as they are absurdly called, as if it were possible to preserve for the future any vigilant conservatism to refuse to rise out of the ruins of what the past has been upon. The former was the candidate of the Radicals, the intelligent and perceptive part of the community.

The significance before the election Governor ALCORN said:

"The reconstruction to which I go forward is a reconstruction which will make rich and poor equal in fact before the law. I move on with it, guiding a people who have accepted the result of war, signified to the erection of a government by the people and for all your rights. I go forward, fellow-citizens, to build up in accordance with the spirit of the age, in accordance with the will of the nation, a party new to the history of Mississippi—a party determined, while raising the negro to his true position, to maintain under the feet of power, to erect it, not upon its point, but upon its base—the white man's interests."

But he knows that the interests of all are inseparable. He grants that in the old day the oligarchy of slaveholders, of which he was one, controlled the interests of the State. Among the declarations, therefore, this is very significant:

"The 90,000 poor voters who have been disinstated, in the past by a privileged class will strike now for their independence. The small farmer who had been disgusted toward the old Democratic oligarchy will refuse to vote any more in the interests of the few. The small trader finds his interests now with the laborer, and he is justified no longer in declining to assert his independence because of the success of a rich man's opponent. The man who is laboring to form will unite with the laborer who is laboring to reform. Under these several classes of the white race, the principles of the ultimo will be laid, and, berthing the debates of a dead system from their seats, will go forward with me to the erection of a government based on exclusive, prompt payment, equality before the law, and a general system of education, making its foundations in strict justice to the rich and to the poor"

The Republican party in Mississippi polled fully a third of the white vote. But the majority for General ALCORN and his intelligent platform was so immense that many of the leaders who have stood with him will not necessarily remain opposed to an administration which, by insisting upon equal rights, will plainly base its success upon the popularity. For ourselves, however, we do not expect that the old rebel element of the Southern States will become a safe and reliable power. The very fact that General ALCORN and a very few others stand alone among their old associates, results in hopelessness of the position of the latter. They will be an obstruction. But there is no reason to suppose that the party in the State, which has shown such strength upon the declaration of so just and generous a policy, will decline. It has comprehended the situation. It has found its leader, and will loyally express its faith and its purpose; and a man who, under the circumstances that surrounded him, has done what General ALCORN has done, will naturally not wish to undo it.

RECENT GOLD SALES.

MUCH more than usual excitement was experienced in Wall Street on Friday, over the sale of the item of gold. It will be recollected that Mr. BOUTWELL, after the bids had been opened on the 20th of December, declared he intended to sell gold at under 22 per cent. premium. Mr. COLGATE, who had put in his offers at 121 and 4/32, being one of the lowest whose bids had been rejected, proceeded to Washington after having tendered about $600,000 to the Sub-treasury, and intimated that as there were no higher bidders, he should have his gold.

Mr. BOUTWELL was immovable. He claimed that, although special notice had not been given on this particular occasion of the reservation of a right to reject, yet that it had been given before; that such was the understanding, and that this was to be gathered from the fact that at every sale there was delay in its completion until reported to him and approved.

The decision gave umbrage to Wall Street, which has wished for its opportunity to show that it was the currency on hand at Washington —due to the purchases of bonds—to coerce the Treasury into a reversal of its decision.

Friday, the 17th, was the day for the trial of this scheme. A million had been offered for sale on that day, and the sum announced at the beginning of December. The time having arrived for opening the bids, the Sub-treasurer, with a number of the community around him, at o'clock noon to ascertain the result. The announcement that there were but seven bids was received with derisive laughter, and when it appeared that offers for only $482,000 had been made, and that some of the bids were under that of Mr. COLGATE, the large crowd in attendance rushed to the Gold Room to operate, being certain that the offers would be rejected. The price rose to 121¼; but amidst the tumult in the Exchange at a quarter to one, on ascertaining that the bids had been accepted, it fell instantaneously one per cent., and the market sank heavily, closing at about 120¾, the lowest price reached at any time since the close of the war. Wall Street was in consternation. Not to say that no one could tell during the day what principle of action the decision involved. What the Treasury and Administration thereafter, we will it raise or lower them? This was the question universally asked.

As the price of gold affects the price of imported goods—which are marked down with very rigid subservience in proportion to its fall —and as it affects also the bulk of our exports, mere transactions carry dismay to thousands. The merchant, whose goods have been reduced from a currency price founded on gold at 140 to one founded on gold at 120, is ruined if his margin of capital is absorbed. The farmer, who at present sells here for export, finds that what he is sold for gold, and that, instead of converting the latter into currency at 140, his agent will realize but 120, with a loss to the principal of the difference. The disadvantage of the reduction arises from the fact that gold, which was withheld from the market in hopes of a rise of prices, will be immediately pressed for sale simultaneously with the period of greatest activity in our exports.

It was hoped gold was withheld from sale that the sharpers who are pastured upon Rye are enabled in September to carry on gold to 120-3, and with the increase of persistent sales since —doubtless with good intent—that the gold has fallen to 120-1, carrying with it a fall of all descriptions of property which sympathize with gold. A change of a half or a quarter per cent. even is instantly communicated, and in this case has been the cause of immense transactions connected with bonds, which are sold or purchased as they are high or low in gold as compared with New York, at the moment of a slight fluctuation in the price of gold. The sale or purchase of bonds abroad is effected through cable telegrams, and is immediately completed—if a sale—by disposing of exchange in this market, and its resulting proceeds of gold.

The German bankers, who watch with the keenest interest for these fluctuations, have their correspondents in the principal money centres of Europe, and operate with boldness, skill, and absolute certainty in this manner. They have the bonds on hand, and intending it to the Secretary of the Treasury in beating down the price of gold. They sell here the proceeds, in the form of exchange, of our bonds sent abroad by them, which exchange being paid for in gold, they have for a long time been the buyers of gold in harmony with the sales of the Department.

The violent fluctuations which have occurred in gold, and which have been communicated to the trade of the whole country, are due not to the regular operations of commerce, but to the regular operations of those who control the movement of gold, as to an exigency could foresee. The bankers who urged the policy upon the Secretary of buying gold and paying, admit their disappointment, as they expected that such a feeling of confidence would be created abroad in our bonds as to pay for gold; but although this has not been accomplished, the plan is still pursued with disastrous effect upon the trade and industry of the country. It will seldom happen in the experience of men that occasions will be afforded for affecting so powerfully the fortunes of the country.

If Mr. BOUTWELL had paid off the whole amount of three per cent. certificates the contraction in gold would have been much greater than has been produced by the sale of gold; and there would have been this difference between the two modes—that there would have contracted the currency, and prevented a succeeding rise in prices; while the other expedient would be the purchase of a subsequent advance when this temporary pressure proceeding from the Treasury shall have passed away, and it does so, will leave our paper currency to its unrestrained and complete influence.

The act of Congress which prevented contraction after Mr. M'CULLOCH had reduced the amount of legal tenders from $400,000,000 to $356,000,000, limited only to "United States notes," which were specifically mentioned, and did not, by its terms or by its spirit, embrace the Sub-treasury gold certificates. By the terms of the act creating them they were not to bear interest and were to be redeemed by the Treasury should so elect. Had it done this, the whole amount, with the exception, perhaps, of some portion of the twenty millions which are now stamped by the Sub-treasurer for clearing-house purposes, would have been presented for redemption. They are held as a reserve in preference to legal tenders, because they bear interest. To the extent of that $20,000,000 those certificates constitute a tender between banks, although they do not at between the banks and individuals. They perform the purposes of money in promoting expansion, but not at all for the purpose of payment to bill-holders or depositors; and, being thus anomalous and dangerous, should be eliminated from the system. The Treasury was at liberty to pay off these; but it may be said that this would have been in violation of the spirit of the act of Congress, as it amounted to virtual contraction.

It was competent for Congress to have specified these, if it was intended that they should not be paid off; but Congress aimed at steadiness in the currency and in prices, and wished to prevent a contraction in the exchangeable value of commodities, and not by the Treasury, appearing to be governed by the supposed spirit instead of the terms of the act, has adopted a policy which has lowered prices in an extraordinary degree and produced an amount of suffering in all the walks of commerce and industry which could not have been avoided by contraction, and produced it without the permanent benefits to result from contraction.

We urge, therefore, again those who are thus subject to violent vicissitudes in their affairs to support the policy which shall bring the country to a specie currency. It will be found to be the only road to safety and prosperity, both for individuals and the public.

MURDER AND SENTIMENTALITY.

A FEW weeks ago, while the Boston Cadets were feasting General MAGRUDER, the rebel commander at Great Bethel, Union men in Georgia, according to the Atlanta Intelligencer, were murdered at the pleasure of the Ku-Klux bands. There is, he says, no security for life or property, and summary measures will not can do justice. Do the worthy members of the Company of Cadets see no relation between the two facts? Their invitation to General MAGRUDER does not, indeed, directly occasion the slaughter of innocent Union men; but it does indirectly. The lesson which the distinguished element in the Southern States is so painfully slow to learn is that we understand our own victory, not as one of vengeance, but of forgiveness. And how can we expect them ever to learn it if we do not show it in every intelligible way? General MAGRUDER threw up the service not of his country to fight against his flag, at the command of a State, for the purpose of perpetuating human slavery. Was he not as much the Boston Cadets think worthy of especial honor? Or is it done to show that they have no ill feeling? Such delicacy should be shown. Or is it done because they think that General MAGRUDER was as honest as they were? Would they, then, have feasted JEFFERSON DAVIS and RAPHAEL SEMMES?

To bring the matter home, would the commander of the Cadets, when they went to the war, be now made the honored object of hilarious and respectful jamborees by the Palmetto Guard and the Louisiana Tigers? We would not erect those boisterous models, nor do evil because our neighbor will not do well; but we would not certainly honor conspicuous rebels with the rebel spirit slaughtered our brethren; and we certainly should not expect the slaughter to stop until we could feel very respectful to ourselves and our power sufficiently to abstain from how ering those who might stop it. The country should have time to consider the disinterested question, "Are you going to fight forever?" until it had stopped the crimes which General TERRY describes so rife in Georgia.

There is this advantage in the counsels of extreme men, as they are called—that they understand each other. BENJAMIN, if you choose, to catch a thief. Fight fire with fire. There are exhortations that grow out of the depths of experience. It may not be an appropriate truth, but it is still a truth, that such a man as THADDEUS STEVENS understood better how to deal with rebels than more moderate men, and for the reason that he was of a like resolution and temper with them, but patriotically and nobly directed. The policy of reconstruction which has been adopted was the result of a situation which Mr. STEVENS, and men like him, instinctively divined. When he spoke of confiscation and military rule and territorial condition, there was a general shuddering even among his own party friends. He was supposed to contemplate a blood-thirsty and vindictive by the opposition. But he always quietly answered in substance, why is the blood of enemies more precious than that of friends?

He did not, indeed, advise bloodshed. But he was of opinion that the blood of patriots must be spilled rather than that of Union men of any color. He knew, also, that it was necessary, by a thorough and radical reorganization of society in the rebel States, to show the rebel spirit that the country fully comprehended its own victory, and would certainly secure it. He knew that the contempt of "the North" was ingrained and traditional in "the South," and that the shortest and surest way of peace was to show a perfect readiness upon the part of "the North" to use its superior strength to establish its policy.

His view of the situation was practical. It implied nothing vindictive, nothing unjust. Gradually events showed its wisdom. The conduct of the South when ANDREW JOHNSON began the reaction—the New Orleans and Memphis massacres—the black codes—the Ku-Klux —and finally, the total subjection of the Democratic National Convention of 1868 to the rebel chiefs—all revealed the actual facts and spirit with which the country has to deal.

That condition virtually remains. Nobody, of course, expects that any system will instantly pacify a State so long demoralized by the barbarism of slavery, and thus so riven with civil war as Georgia. But because every thing may not be done at once, it would be extremely foolish to expect to do nothing. The removal of the colored members of the Legislature was a deliberate defiance of the authority of the United States. It had been instantly accepted as such by Congress, and the territorial condition been restored, there would be at this moment much more security for life and property in that State than General TERRY reports. So, likewise, when it was proposed that the Cadets in Boston should honor General MAGRUDER, magistrates and juries in Georgia would have been stronger had the Cadets decisively declined.

The remedy is, first of all, moral, then physical. Let the South perceive that we regard the war as a very solemn and serious and enormous crime, the memory and lessons of which are not to be drowned in a slop of sentimentality. That will then civil and political rights that rejected all the sophistries and disregarded all the menaces of the Johnsonian reaction, has been triumphant over the demand for repudiation.

It is proof of the fact that the public mind is well healthful, and that "moral ideas" are not dead even in a political party. Had the Democratic candidates in 1868 been elected upon a platform of virtual or conditional repudiation, the House in 1869 would not have unanimously passed such a resolution as that of General GARFIELD. The election of Mr. SEYMOUR would have been a potent proof of the fatal demoralization of the public mind as the passage of the GARFIELD resolution is proof of the general reaction, even among the Democratic leaders, that the country believes honesty to be the best policy.

INTERNATIONAL GOOD-WILL.

GREAT BRITAIN just now loses no opportunity of showing her good-will to the United States. Not only is GEORGE PEABODY honored and mourned as very few British subjects would be, but Lord LYONS, the English Ambassador to Paris, gives a dinner to General BANKS, and the London Times says that if Mr. MOTLEY proves that the Alabama negotiations be reopened at Washington, at Washington it shall be. The Times further says, what is very evident: "We shall never cease to entertain the friendship if we are to begin in the spirit of bestriggling attorneys. American writers and statesmen may quarrel with advantage like our blood is, after all, not very different from their own. Englishmen have susceptibilities as well as Americans. It is not probable that we shall be drawn toward the Americans by the suggestion that we are insincere, and bent on unbalancing their minds with the promise of a dealing openly. This is sensible; and indeed every thing shows a disposition which is very promising for the future negotiations.

But it can hardly be agreeable to Mr. MOTLEY that the offer of the Times should be made as if a change of the scene of negotiations had been demanded; nor was its previous suggestion flattering, that other persons than our Minister should be called into the negotiation upon our side. The Times has certainly an ingenious cleverness even when it apparently means to be friendly. To remove the negotiations from the capital in which our Minister resides, or to place it in other hands, would be simply to declare that he could not be recalled. Now, when Mr. MOTLEY was appointed, the chief question between his country and England was that of the Alabama claims. If he had not been considered competent to deal with it, according to the views of the Administration, the Times may be very sure he could not have been confirmed. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON was an opposition nomination from an opposition administration, and was confirmed merely because of a foolish custom of the Senate. But Mr. MOTLEY is heartily in accord with the Administration, and—but there the shot pinched?—he is the especial friend of Mr. SUMNER. In him, at all events, the Times and England can see a most representative American feeling—and they must have had quite enough of the other kind in his immediate precedessor.

NOTES.

THE Harvard crew, with the exception of Mr. SIMMONS, have published a card disowning Mr. WILLIAM BLAKIE'S article upon the race in Harper's Monthly, and Mr. BLAKIE has replied. He thinks, so he was with the crew twelve hours a day through all preparation for the race, and knew the great day, and was really their Secretary, whatever he may have been called, receiving and answering letters in their name, and he knew their views and had expressed them. It is a pity that there should be any difference upon the subject; but if the article did not speak the sentiments of the crew, they have done right in saying so. It is almost impossible, under such exciting and remarkable circumstances as those of the race, that there should not be some suspicion or ill feeling. But there seems no reason to suppose that Harvard was cherish any other feeling than that of honorable rivalry toward the Oxonians.

"The Dynamite" is the title of a comely little magazine published by the students of Brown University, which every graduate and friend of Brown will find very entertaining, not only from association, but from the shrewd comments in the department called "Home Matters," upon the current college-going to all literature. It only a dollar and a half a year; and is there any of the sons of Brown who does not love her memory to that amount?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 15.—In the Senate, Mr. MORTON's bill to repeal the reconstruction acts of Congress was reported as amended by the Judiciary Committee. It provides for carrying into effect the fifteenth article of amendment to the Constitution, and declares that the Fourteenth amendment has now become part of the Constitution, and that the condition of the rebel States under the reconstruction acts, since the powers the President to enforce the act, using the army and navy if necessary, and makes the Legislature provisional until further Congressional action. Mr. SUMNER presented memorials from York praying for the recognition of Cuba was presented, under a suspension of the rules, a message from the President was received, containing the announcement of Secretary SEWARD, that he had, up to December 6, ratified the Constitutional Amendment. These were: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Rhode Island, West Virginia, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Maine, Kansas, Nevada, New Hampshire, Michigan, Minnesota, Tennessee, Louisiana, Florida, Illinois, Arkansas, New York, New Hampshire, Nevada, Vermont, Virginia.

December 16.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced providing for the admission of Arizona. Mr. SUMNER presented a memorial from Santa Cruz. In the House, messages were received from the President declining to furnish the correspondence with Minister SICKLES in regard to Cuba, and giving notice that he had ratified the Fifteenth Amendment by Alabama. On the House going into committee of the whole, a resolution from the President's Message relating to the finances, Mr. MONGEN, of Ohio, being in the chair, in favor of repealing the National Debt, whereupon Messrs. BROOKS, of New York, and SCHENCK, of Ohio, spoke in favor of the greenback and Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, one by one, and moved to amend by adding a clause declaring that the act approved April 12 last, entitled "An act to amend the act of June 30, 1864, entitled, &c., &c., and for other purposes," was not intended to authorize the issue of any greenbacks in excess of that if a conflict should begin, the Indians, from the battalion of the Second Regiment of Mounted Riflemen in a war of extermination against the white settlers.

The National Democratic State Convention assembled at Boston on the 15th December, passed resolutions censuring the Governor's report because he was recently investigated the affairs of the Book Concern in New York, and urged the sub-Committee to continue the investigation.

The Kentucky Legislature, on the 15th December, elected John W. Stevenson United States Senator.

On December 15, 1869, the steamer Montana, Peralta's vessel, caved in, filling up the tunnel and shaft, and blocking the entrance. Several of the workmen were carried down a distance of forty feet, and their inmates were imprisoned for life. The rest escaped with the manner of people.

December 16.—The disaster is ascribed to working the tunnel too near the surface. Only about twenty feet of earth between the foundations of the house and the mine.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE remains of the late Mr. Peabody were, on December 13, removed on board the British ship-of-war Monarch, at Portland, and will be consigned to the care of Captain Conner at Liverpool. Minister MOTLEY, Mr. GEORGE PEABODY, the United States Minister, in behalf of the country, and numerous friends in England. During the ceremony minute-guns were fired from the City Hall Square, and the flags on the vessels in the harbor displayed their colors at half-mast and dipped each salute. The United States ship Plymouth is to accompany the Monarch across the Atlantic.

It is reported that Bishop DUPANLOUP urges the placing of Galilean Bishops on leading committees in the Council, in order that the decree declaring the Council in the event of his death is designed to prevent the election of a Pope by the Council. It is stated with pressure that Sir HOWARD DOUGLAS, Minister to Turkey, is going Cabinet Council at Paris. The return was said to be caused by an ex-Imperialist, and urged on by the priests. A new Ministry was soon finally formed, and no endeavor was made to burn the Protestant store, using Bibles for fuel.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,
Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TENTH.

MR. BISHOPRIGGS.

THE knock at the door was repeated—a loud-er knock than before.

"Are you deaf?" shouted Arnold.

The door opened a little by little, an inch at a time. Mr. Bishoprigg appeared mysteriously, with the cloth for dinner over his arm, and with his second in command behind him, bearing the furnishing of the table' (as it was called at Craig Fernie) on my.

"What the dence were you waiting for?" asked Arnold. "I told you to come in."

"And I tauld you," answered Mr. Bishoprigg, "that I wadna come in without knocking first. Eh, man!" he went on, dismissing his second in command, and laying the cloth with his own venerable hands, "d'ye think I've lived in this bottle in blinded cognorance of hoo young married couples past the time when they've left to themselves? Two knocks at the door—and an unco trouble in opening it, after that—is joost the least ye can do for them! What' do ye think, now, I'll set the places for you and your leddy there?

Anne walked away to the window, in unfeigned disgust. Arnold found Mr. Bishoprigg to be quite irresistible. He answered, humoring the joke,

"One at the top and one at the bottom of the table, I suppose?"

"One at tap and one at bottom?" repoated Mr. Bishoprigge, in high disdain. "Do lik of it! Baith yer chairs as close together as chairs can be. Hech! hech!—haven't I caught 'em, after goodness knows hoo many preleeminary knocks at the door, dining on their husbands' knees, and steemikating a man's appetite by feeding him at the fork's end like a child? Eh!" sighed the sage of Craig Fernie, "it's a short life wi' that nuptial business, and a merry one! A month for we bilin' and coorin', and a the rest o' yer days for wondering ye were ever such a fule, and wishing it was a' to be done over again.—Ye'll be for a bottle o' sherry wine, nae doot? and a drap toddy afterwards, to do yer digestin on?"

Arnold nodded—and then, in obedience to a signal from Anne, joined her at the window. Mr. Bishopriggs looked after them attentively—observed that they were talking in whispers—and approved of that proceeding, as representing another of the established customs of young married couples at inns, in the presence of third persons appointed to wait on them.

"Ay! ay!" he said, looking over his shoulder at Arnold, "gae to yon deerie! gae to your deerie! and leave a' the tolal business o' life to Mr. Ye've Sceepture warrant for it. A man maun leave father and mother (Un yer father), and cleave to his wife. My certies! 'cleave' is a strong word —there's nae sort o' doot about it, when it comes to 'cleaving!' He wagged his head thoughtfully and walked to the side-table in a corner, to cut the bread.

As he took up the knife, his one wary eye detected a morsel of crumpled paper, lying lost between the table and the wall. It was the letter from Geoffrey, which Anne had flung from her, in the first indignation of reading it—and which neither she nor Arnold had thought of since.

"What's that I see yonder?" muttered Mr. Bishoprigge, under his breath. "Mair litter in the room, after I've doosted and tidied it wi' my ain hands!"

He picked up the crumpled paper, and partly opened it. "Eh! what's here? Writing on it in ink? and writing on it in pencil? Who may this belong to?" He looked round cautiously toward Arnold and Anne. They were both still talking in whispers, and both standing with their backs to him, looking out of the window. "Here it is, clean forgotten and done with!" thought Mr. Bishoprigge. "Noo what would a fule do, if he fond this? A fule wad light his pipe wi' it, and then wonder whether he wadna ha done better to read it first. And what wad a wise man do, in a seemilar position?" He practically answered that question by putting the letter into his pocket. It might be worth keeping, or it might not; five minutes' private examination of it would decide the alternative, at the first convenient opportunity. "An' gaun' to breeng the dinner in!" he called out to Arnold. "And, mind ye, there's nae knocking at the door possible, when I've got the tray in baith my hands, and, mairs the pity, the gout in baith my feet." With that friendly warning, Mr. Bishoprigge went his way to the regions of the kitchen.

Arnold continued his conversation with Anne, in terms which showed that the question of his leaving the inn had been the question once more discussed between them while they were standing at the window.

"You see we can't help it," he said. "The waiter has gone to bring the dinner in. What will they think in the house, if I go away already, and leave 'my wife' to dine alone?"

It was so plainly necessary to keep up appearances for the present, that there was nothing more to be said. Arnold was committing a serious imprudence—and yet, on this occasion, Arnold was right. Anne's annoyance at feeling that conclusion forced on her produced the first betrayal of impatience which she had shown yet. She left Arnold at the window, and flung herself on the sofa. "A curse seems to follow me!" she thought, bitterly. "This will end ill—and I shall be unwearable for it!"

In the mean time Mr. Bishoprigge had found the dinner in the kitchen, ready, and waiting for him. Instead of at once taking the tray on which it was placed into the sitting-room, he conveyed it privately into his own pantry, and shut the door.

"Lie ye there, my freend, till the space moment comes—and I'll look at ye again," he said, putting the letter away carefully in the dresser-drawer. "Noo shoot the dinner o' they two turtle-doves in the parlor!" he continued, directing his attention to the dinner-tray. "I maun joost see that the cook's done her duty—the creetures are no capable o' decidin' that knotty point for their ain selves." He took off one of the covers, and picked bits, here and there, out of the dish with the fork. "Eh! eh! the collops are no' that bad!" He took off another cover, and shook his head in solemn doubt. "Here's the green meat. I doot green meat's wondy diet for a man at my time o' life!" He put the cover on again, and tried the next dish. "The fish? What the de'il does the woman fry the trout for? Boil it next time, ye betch, wi' a pinch o' saut and a spunefu' o' vinegar." He drew the cork from a bottle of sherry, and decanted the wine. "The sherry wine?" he said, in tones of deep feeling, holding the decanter up to the light. "Hoo do I know but what it may be corkit? I maun taste and try. It's on my conscience, as an honest man, to taste and try."

He forthwith relieved his conscience—copiously. There was a vacant space, of no inconsiderable dimensions, left in the decanter. Mr. Bishoprigge gravely filled it up from the water-bottle. "Eh! it's joost addin' ten years to the age o' the wine. The turtle-doves will be mine the waur—and I mysel' nan a glass o' sherry the better. Praise Providence for a' its mercies!" Having relieved himself of that devout aspiration, he took up the tray again, and decided on letting the turtle-doves have their dinner.

The conversation in the parlor (dropped for the moment) had been renewed, at the instance of Mr. Bishoprigge. No restless to remain long in one place, Anne had risen again from the sofa, and had rejoined Arnold at the window.

"Where do your friends at Lady Lundie's believe you to be now?" he asked, abruptly.

"I am believed," replied Arnold, "to be meeting my tenants, and taking possession of my estate."

"How are you to get to your estate to-night?"

"By railway, I suppose. I shall say that I excuse am I to make for going away after dinner? We are sure to have the landlady in here before long. What will she say to my going off by myself to the train, and leaving 'my wife' behind me?"

"Mr. Brinkworth! that joke—if it is a joke—is worn out!"

"I beg your pardon," said Arnold.

"You may leave your excuse to me," pursued Anne. "Do you go by the up train, or the down?"

"By the up train."

The door opened suddenly; and Mr. Bishoprigge appeared with the dinner. Anne nervously separated herself from Arnold. The only available eye of Mr. Bishoprigge followed her resolute approach, as he set the dishes on the table.

"I warned ye baith, it was a clean impossibility to knock at the door this time. Don't blame me, young madam—don't blame me!"

"Where will you sit?" asked Arnold, by way of diverting Anne's attention from the familiarities of Father Bishoprigge.

"Any where!" she answered, impatiently; snatching up a chair, and placing it at the bottom of the table.

Mr. Bishoprigge positively, but firmly, put the chair back again in its place.

"Lord's sake! what are ye doin'? It's clean contrary to a' the laws and customs o' the honey-moone, to sit as far away from each other's hand as that!"

He waved his persuasive napkin to one of the two chairs placed close together at the table. Arnold interfered once more, and prevented another outbreak of impatience from Anne.

"What does it matter?" he said. "Let the man have his way."

"Get it over as soon as you can," she returned. "I can't, and won't, bear it much longer."

They took their places at the table, with Father Bishopriggs behind them, in the mixed character of major domo and guardian angel.

"Here's the trout!" he cried, taking the cover off with a flourish. "Half an hour since, he was loupin' in the water. There he lies noo, fried in the dish. An emblem o' human life for ye! When ye can spare any leisure time from yer ain selves, meditate on that."

Arnold took up the spoon, to give Anne one of the trout. Mr. Bishopriggs clapped the cover on the dish again, with a countenance expressive of devout horror.

"Is there nobody gaun' to say grace?" he asked.

"Come! come!" said Arnold. "The fish is getting cold."

Mr. Bishopriggs piously closed his available eye, and held the cover firmly on the dish.

"For what ye're gaun' to receive, may ye baith be truly thankful!" He opened his available eye, and whipped the cover off again. "25y conscience is at ease noo.—Fall to! Fall to!"

THE NATIVITY.

"Send him away!" said Anne. "His familiarity is beyond all endurance."

"You needn't wait," said Arnold.

"Eh! but I'm here to wait," objected Mr. Bishopriggs. "What's the use o' my gaun' away, when ye'll want me anon to change the plates for ye?" He considered for a moment (privately consulting his experience), and arrived at a satisfactory conclusion as to Arnold's motive for wanting to get rid of him. "Tak' her on yer knee," he whispered in Arnold's ear, "as soon as ye like! Feed him at the fork's end," he added to Anne, "whenever ye please! I'll think of something else, and look out at the prospect." He winked—and went to the window.

"Come! come!" said Arnold to Anne. "There's a comic side to all this. Try and see as I do."

Mr. Bishopriggs returned from the window, and announced the appearance of a new element of embarrassment in the situation at the inn.

"My certie!" he said, "it's weel ye cam' when ye did. It's ill getting to this hottle in a storm."

Anne started, and looked round at him. "A storm coming!" she exclaimed.

"Eh! ye're well housed here—ye needn't mind it. There's the cloud down the valley," he added, pointing out of the window, "coming up one way, when the wind's blawing the other. The storm's brewing, my leddy, when ye see that!"

There was another knock at the door. As Arnold had predicted, the landlady made her appearance on the scene.

"I ha' just lookit in, Sir," said Mrs. Inchbare, addressing herself exclusively to Arnold, "to see ye've got what ye want."

"Oh! you are the landlady? Very nice, ma'am—very nice."

Mistress Inchbare had her own private motive for entering the room, and came to it without further preface.

"Yell excuse me, Sir," she proceeded. "I wasna in the way when ye cam' here, or I mild ha' made bauld to ask ye the question which I mean e'en ask noo. Am I to understand that ye hire these rooms for yersel', and this leddy here—yer wife?"

Anne raised her head to speak. Arnold pressed her hand warningly, under the table, and silenced her.

"Certainly," he said. "I take the rooms for myself, and this lady here—my wife!"

Anne made a second attempt to speak.

"This gentleman—" she began.

Arnold stopped her for the second time.

"This gentleman?" repeated Mrs. Inchbare, with a broad stare of surprise. "I'm only a puir woman, my leddy—d'ye mean yer husband here?"

Arnold's warning hand touched Anne's, for the third time. Mistress Inchbare's eyes remained fixed on her in merciless inquiry. To have given utterance to the contradiction which trembled on her lips would have been to involve Arnold (after all that he had sacrificed for her) in the scandal which would inevitably follow—a scandal which would be talked of in the neighborhood, and which might find its way to Blanche's ears. White and cold, her eyes never moving from the table, she accepted the landlady's implied correction, and faintly repeated the words: "My husband."

Mistress Inchbare drew a breath of virtuous relief, and waited for what Anne had to say next. Arnold came considerately to the rescue, and got her out of the room.

"Never mind," he said to Anne; "I know what it is, and I'll see about it. She's always like this, ma'am, when a storm's coming," he went on, turning to the landlady. "No, thank you—I know how to manage her. Well send to you, if we want your assistance."

"At yer ain pleasure, Sir," answered Mistress Inchbare. She turned, and apologized to Anne (under protest), with a stiff courtesy. "No offense, my leddy! Ye'll remember that ye cam' here alane, and that the hottle has its ain guide name to keep up." Having once more vindicated "the hottle," she made the long-desired move to the door, and left the room.

"I'm faint!" Anne whispered. "Give me some water."

There was no water on the table. Arnold ordered it of Mr. Bishopriggs—who had remained passive in the background (a model of discreet attention) as long as the mistress was in the room.

"Mr. Brinkworth!" said Anne, when they were alone, "you are acting with inexcusable rashness. That woman's question was an impertinence. Why did you answer it? Why did you force me—?"

She stopped, unable to finish the sentence.

THE CHRISTMAS-TREE.—[SEE PAGE 7.]

Arnold insisted on her drinking a glass of wine —and then defended himself with the patent consideration for her which he had shown from the first.

"Why didn't I have the wine out in your face"—he asked, good-humoredly—"with a storm coming on, and without a place in which to change my clothes? No, no, Miss Silvester! you can take refuge" those you for any scruples I don't presume to blame you for any scruples you may feel—but scruples are sadly out of place with such a woman as that landlady. I am responsible for your safety to Geoffrey, and I am responsible for your looks here. Let's change Geoffrey expects to find you looking your best—the subject. The water is a long time coming. Try another glass of wine. No? Well—here is Blanche's health" (the toon some of the wine in himself), "in the weakest sherry I ever drank in all my life." As he set down his glass, Mr. Bishopriggs came in with the water. Arnold hailed him saltatively. "Well? have you got the water? or have you used it all for the sherry?"

Mr. Bishopriggs stopped in the middle of the room, thunderstruck at the aspersion cast on the wine.

"Is that the way ye talk of the auldest bottle o' sherry wine in Scotland?" he asked, gravely. "What's the world coming to? The new generation's no fool hogwash my fathoming. The curiosities of Providence, as shown to man in the choicest advantages of Spain, are clean thrown away on 'em."

"Have you brought the water?"

"I ha' brought in the water—and mair than the water. I has' brought ye news from outside. There's a company of gentlemen on horseback, joost cantering by to what they ca' the shootin cottage, a mile from this."

"Well—and what have we got to do with it?"

"Bide a wee! There's ane o' them has driven a turtle at the window, and he's operate' after the leddy that cam' here alone. The leddy's your leddy, as sure as sixpence. I droot," said Mr. Bishopriggs, turning away to the window, "that's what ye've got to do with it."

Arnold looked at Blanche.

"Do you expect my body?"

"Is it Geoffrey?"

"Impossible. Geoffrey is on his way to London."

"There he is, any way," resumed Mr. Bishopriggs, at the window. "He's loupin' down from his horse. He's turning this way. Lord have us! I'm exclaimed, with a start of consternation, "what do I see? That incarnate devil, Sir Patrick himself!"

Arnold sprang to his feet.

"Do you mean Sir Patrick Lundie?" he said. Anne ran to the window.

"It is Sir Patrick!" she said. "Hide yourself before he comes in!"

"Hide myself?"

"What will he think if he sees you with me?"

The new landlady's question, put in a shrill shriek, allowed Arnold to be at that moment visiting his new property. What he would think was not doubtful to forsee. Arnold turned for help to Mr. Bishopriggs.

"Where can I go?"

Mr. Bishopriggs pointed to the bedroom door.

"What" can ye go? There's the nuptial chamber!"

"Impossible!"

Mr. Bishopriggs expressed the utmost extremity of human amazement by a long whistle, no one note.

"Whee! Is that the way ye talk o' the nuptial chamber already?"

"Find me some other place—I'll make it worth your while."

"Eh! there's my pantry! I trow that's some other place; and the door's at the end o' the passage."

Arnold hurried out. Mr. Bishopriggs—evidently under the impression that the case before him was a case of elopement, with Sir Patrick mixed up in it in the capacity of the disappointed dressed himself, in friendly confidence, to Anne.

"My certie, mistress! it's the work devised Sir Patrick, if I'm's what ye've done. Ye must know, I was once a bit clerk body in his chambers at Embro'—"

The voice of Mistress Inchbare, calling for the landlord, broke off his inquiries from the regions of the bar. Mr. Bishopriggs disappeared. Anne remained, standing helpless by the window.

It was plain by this time that the plans of her retreat had been discovered at Windygates. The one doubt to decide, now, was whether it would be wise or not to receive Sir Patrick, for the purpose of discovering whether he came as friend or enemy to the inn.

CHAPTER THE ELEVENTH.

SIR PATRICK.

THE doubts was practically decided before Anne had determined what to do. She was still at the window when the sitting-room door was thrown open, and Sir Patrick appeared, obsequiously shown in by Mr. Bishopriggs.

"Ye're kindly welcome, Sir Patrick. This is the night of ye to guide the suir ayont."

Sir Patrick turned and looked at Mr. Bishopriggs—as he might have looked at some troublesome insect which he had driven out of the window, and which had returned on him again.

"What, you scoundrel! have you drifted into an honest employment at last?"

Mr. Bishopriggs rubbed his hands cheerfully, and took his tone from his superior, with supple readiness.

"Ye're always in the right of it, Sir Patrick! I'm, real wut in that about the honest employment, and me drifting into it. Lord's sake, Sir, how well ye wear!"

Dismissing Mr. Bishopriggs by a sign, Sir Patrick advanced to Anne.

"I am committing an intrusion, madam, which must, I am afraid, appear unpardonable in your eyes," he said. "May I hope you will excuse me when I have made you acquainted with my motive?"

He spoke with scrupulous politeness. His knowledge of Anne was of the slightest possible kind. Like other men, he had felt the attraction of her unaffected grace and gentleness on those occasions when he had been in her company—and that was all. If he had belonged to the present generation he would have been a confirmed woman-hater, and would have taken a morbid pleasure in the exercise of his misanthropy, which it was simply impossible for a stranger really to feel. Sir Patrick offered nothing of the sort. He met the besetting sins of his time with the habitual concealment of our better selves—upon the whole a far less dangerous universal error than the habitual advertisement of our better selves, which has become the characteristic of the present day society in this age. Sir Patrick assumed, if any thing, less sympathy on this occasion than usual. Courteous to all women, he was as courteous as usual to Anne —and no more.

"I am quite at a loss, Sir, to know what brings you to this place. The servant here informs me that you are one of a party of gentlemen who have just passed by the inn, and who have gone on except yourself." In those guarded terms Anne mentioned the interval in the unwelcome visitor, on her side.

Sir Patrick admitted the fact, without betraying the slightest embarrassment.

"The servant is quite right," he said. "I am one of the party. And I have purposely allowed them to go on to the keeper's cottage without me. Having admitted this, you will perceive for yourself the permission to explain the motive of my visit?"

Unreasonably suspicious of him, as coming from Windygates, Anne answered in few and formal words, as coldly as before.

"I am waiting, Sir Patrick, if you please, as briefly as possible."

Sir Patrick bowed. He was not in the least offended; he was even (if the confession may be made without degrading him in the public estimation) pleased to perceive that instead of having honestly presented himself at the inn in Anne's interests, she was still under the delusion that, at Windygates, it appended to his sense of honor to find himself kept at arm's-length by the very woman whom he had come to see. Such a temptation was strong on him to treat his errand from his own whimsical point of view. He looked out his watch, and noted the time to a second, before he spoke again.

"I have an event to relate in which you are interested," he said. "And I have two messages to deliver, which I hope you will be kind enough to receive. I must undertake to describe in one minute. The messages I promise to dispose of in two minutes more. Therefore the duration of this intrusion on your time—three minutes."

He placed a chair for Anne, and settled still as, had questioned him, by a sign, to take a second chair for himself.

"We will begin with the event," he resumed.

"Your arrival at this place is no secret at Windygates. You were seen on the foot-road to Craig Ferrie by one of the female servants. And the inference naturally drawn is, that you were on your way to the inn. It may be assumed for you to know this; and I have taken the liberty of mentioning it accordingly." He consulted his watch. "Event related. Time, one minute."

He had excited her curiosity, to begin with. "Which of the women saw me?" she asked, impulsively.

Sir Patrick (watch in hand) declined to prolong the interval of the first minute. "Personal inquiries which might arise in the course of it."

"Pardon me," he rejoined, "I will answer to occupy those minutes only. I have no room for the woman. With your kind permission, I will get on to the next event."

Anne remained silent. Sir Patrick went on.

"First message: 'Lady Lundie's compliments to her relative Anne's late governess—with whom married name she is not acquainted. Lady Lundie regrets to say that the health of one of the family, has threatened to return to Edinburgh unless she consents to be guided by the advice of the doctors and the parents with the late governess. Lady Lundie, accordingly, foregoes her intention of calling at the Craig Ferrie Inn, from motives of sentiments and make her inquiries in person, and commits to Sir Patrick the duty of expressing her sympathy, reserving to herself the option of making her inquiries at the next convenient opportunity.' Message to Anne: 'Lady Lundie wishes you every success in your new position.' Message textually correct. Message to Blanche: 'Lady Lundie will not condescend to write to you. Time, two minutes."

Anne's color rose. Anne's pride was up in arms on the spot.

"The impertinence of Lady Lundie's message is no more when I should have expected from her," she said. "I am only surprised at Sir Patrick's delivering it."

"Sir Patrick's motives will appear presently," rejoined the incorrigible old gentleman. "Second messages: 'Blanche's fondest love. Is dying to be acquainted with Anne's husband, and to be informed of Anne's matrimonial views. Feels indescribable anxiety and apprehension on Anne's account. Insists on hearing from Anne immediately. Longs, as she never longed for any thing yet, to order her pony-chaise and drive full gallop to the inn. Finds, under irresistible pressure, to the exertion of her guardian's authority, and commits the expression of her feelings to Sir Patrick, who is a born tyrant, and doesn't in the least mind breaking other people's hearts.' Sir Patrick (speaking for himself) plows his sister-in-law's sons and his niece's view, side by side, before the lady whom he has now the honor of addressing, and on whose confidence he is especially careful not to intrude. Reminds the present gentleman into the Windygates, however leniently he may interpret it, is not likely to last forever. Requests her to consider whether his sister-in-law, and his niece's view, in coldness, may not lead to very undesirable domestic results; and leaves her to take the course which seems best to herself under those circumstances. —Second message delivered textually. Time, three minutes. Event related. Time, one. A quarter of an hour's ride from here to the shooting cottage. Madam, I wish you good-evening."

He bowed, lower than ever, and, without a word more, quietly hobbled out of the room.

Anne's first impulse was (excusably enough) a good outlet for her sense of resentment.

"Thank you, Sir Patrick!" she said, with a bitter laugh, to the closing door. "The sympathy of society with a friendless woman could hardly have been expressed in a more amusing way!"

The little irritation of the moment passed off with the moment. Anne's own intelligence and good sense showed her the position in its true light.

She recognized in Sir Patrick's abrupt departure the first step in a considerate resolution to spare her from entering into any details on the subject of her position at the inn. He had given her a friendly warning; and he had delicately left her to decide for herself as to the assistance which he had offered her him in maintaining the quility at Windygates. She went at once to a sideable in the room, and wrote a few lines in answer to Blanche, sat down to write to Blanche.

"I can do nothing with Lady Lundie," she thought, "But I have more confidence in my own body else over Blanche: and I can prevent the collision between them which Sir Patrick dreads."

She wrote:—"My dearest Blanche, I have seen Sir Patrick, and he has given me information which will set your mind at ease almost as soon as I can. But, before I say any thing else, let me entreat you, as the greatest favor you can do to your sister and your friend, not to enter into any disputes about me with Lady Lundie, and not to commit the slightest action under circumstances. Say my love—of coming here. She stopped—the paper swam before her eyes. "My head dafing!" she thought, "and I could have foreseen that I should ever shrink from the thought of seeing you?" She sighs, dashed the tears from her eyes, and went on with the letter.

The sky darkened rapidly as the evening fell. The wind swept in fitful gusts over the moorland in the dreary moor. Far and wide over the face of Nature the stillness was fast falling which tells of a coming storm.

CHAPTER THE TWELFTH.

ARNOLD.

MEANWHILE Arnold remained shut up in the head-waiter's pantry—chafing secretly at the position forced upon him.

He was, for the first time in his life, in hiding from another person, and that person a man. Novice—raw as he was in the inevitable lore of self-respect which his situation occasioned—he had gone to the door, determined to face Sir Patrick boldly: and then had abandoned the idea, in mercy to Anne. It would have been impossible for him to set himself and Anne in a false guard-ian without betraying the unhappy woman whose secret he was bound in honor to keep. "I wish to Heaven I had never come here!" was the first less aspiration that escaped him, as he doggedly seated himself on the dresser to wait till Sir Patrick's departure set him free.

After an interval—not by any means the short interval which he required—Arnold's solitude was enlivened by the appearance of Father Bishopriggs.

"Well?" cried Arnold, jumping off the dresser, "is the coast clear?"

There were occasions when Mr. Bishopriggs became, on a sudden, unexpectedly hard of hearing. This was one of them.

"Hev ye had the pantry?" he asked, without paying the slightest attention to Arnold's question. "Is your private? I'm thinking the wuddens, as ye may say!"

His one available eye, which had begun by looking at Arnold's face, dropped slowly downward, and fixed itself, in mute but eloquent expectation, on Arnold's waistcoat pocket.

"I understand!" said Arnold. "I promised to pay you for the Fatmen—eh? There you are!"

Mr. Bishopriggs pocketed the money with a dreary smile that expressed gratitude for the head. Other waiters would have returned thanks. The sage of Craig Ferrie returned a brief remark. Addressing himself to certain things, Father Bishopriggs was especially great at dropping small hints. He made a moral on this occasion from his own gratuity.

"There I am—as ye say. Mercy preserve us! ye never can tell what a very turn, when there's a woman at yer heels. It's an awfu' reflection—ye canna hae any thing to do wi' the ave they ca' the opposite sex without its being an exposure to ye. There's this young leddy o' yourn, I doot me, that has been an expense to ye from the first. When you were courtin' her, ye did it, I'll go bail, wi' the open hand. Flowers and sweeties, flowers and jewelery, and little dogous. Hae ye any thing your reflections! Has Sir Patrick left the inn?"

The reflections of Mr. Bishopriggs declined to be disposed of in any thing approaching to a summary way. On they flowed from their parent source, as slowly and as smoothly as ever!

"Noo ye've married to her, there's her bonnets and goons and under-clothin'—her ribbons, laces, furbelows, and falbals. A sair expense again!

"What is the expense of cutting your reflections short, Mr. Bishopriggs?"

"Thirdly, and lastly, if ye canna agree wi' her as time goes on—if there's incompatibeelity of temper between ye—in short, if ye think of a separation, heck, Sirs! ye pet yer hand in yer pocket, and come to an amicable settlement wi' her in that way. Or, maybe she takes ye into Court, and pets her hand in your pocket, and comes in to a similar understanding in that shape. Show me a woman—and I'll show ye a man not far off who has made expenses of that kind from the first beginning of time."

Arnold's patience would last no longer—he turned to the door. Mr. Bishopriggs followed, amicably on his side, turned to the matter in hand. "Yes, Sir! The room is e'en clear o' Sir Patrick, and the leddy's alone, and waitin' for ye."

In a moment more Arnold was back in the sitting-room.

"Well?" he asked, anxiously. "What is it? Bad news from Lady Lundie?"

Anne closed and directed the letter to Blanche, which she had just completed. "No," she replied. "Nothing of consequence, I hope. Why what did Sir Patrick want?"

"Only to warn me. They have found out at Windygates that I am at the inn."

"That's awkward, isn't it?"

"Not in the least. I am manage perfectly: I have nothing to fear. Don't think of me—think of yourself."

"I am not suspected, am I?"

"Thank heaven—no! But there is no knowing what may happen if you stay here. Let me tell me alone, and slip out the water about the rains."

Struck by the unusual obscurity of the sky at that hour of the evening, Arnold went to the window. The rain had come—and was falling heavily. The moor was fast disappearing in mist and darkness.

"Pleasant weather to travel in!" he said.

"If you must go," Anne exclaimed, impatiently, "it's getting late. See about the railway!"

Arnold walked to the door to look up the bell. The railway time-table hanging over it met his eye.

"Here's the information I want," he said to Anne; "if I only knew how to get at it. 'Down —Up'—A, B, C, D—I'm quite at a learned confusion! I believe they do it on purpose."

Anne joined him at the fire-place.

"I understand—I'll help you. Did you say it was the up train you wanted?"

"Yes."

"What is the name of the station you stop at?"

Arnold told her. She followed the intricate net-work of lines and figures with her finger—suddenly stopped—looked again to make sure—and turned from the time-table with a face of blank despair. The last train for the day had gone an hour before.

In the silence which followed that discovery, a first flash of lightning passed across the window, and the low roll of thunder sounded the outbreak of the storm.

LORD LYTTON.

LORD LYTTON, better known to American readers as BULWER, the name under which he has published his numerous novels, was born in 1806. It is said that he obtained from his mother, a clever and accomplished woman, many of his early teaching than boys generally receive from their mothers. He was of a studious and rather passive disposition in youth, and still was wont to pass much time at Knebworth, thirty miles north of London, his ancestral seat and the family, and he has described, with affectionate minuteness, the roomy and stately dimensions of that Elizabethan mansion, and the old vestiture of the park, with its trees, and with the placid sheet of water, upon the south side of which the boy used to lie on the waking visions of enthusiastic boyhood. He entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he took considerable interest to the classics than to mathematics, and won the Chancellor's prize for an English poem on "Sculpture." He left the University, and he traveled extensively in his own country and in Europe.

He published an anonymous novel. The list of his published novels begins in 1827 with "Falkland," and from that time he wrote one or more novels in each year. "Pelham," "Devereux," "Paul Clifford," "Eugene Aram," and many others, followed each other in rapid succession, and each met with a flattering measure of popularity. In 1836 he first entered the field of the dramatic writer. "The Duchess de la Vallière" was a failure; but "The Lady of Lyons" and "Richelieu" established and maintained ever since kept possession of the stage as popular acting plays. "Money," a later comedy, has also had a well received. His attempts at original poetry have not been very successful; "The New Timon," "St. Stephens," and "King Arthur," an epic, both published anonymously, the latter in 1849, were coldly received; but his translations from SCHILLER, his adaptations of old Greek legends in the "Lost Tales of Miletus," and his recent translation of the "Odes" of HORACE, display poetic feeling and talent of a very high order.

Lord LYTTON'S substantial reputation will rest upon works of a very different character from his earlier novels. Of these the best of which were often merely questionable. "Pelham; or, the Confessions of a Gentleman," and "The Disowned," would scarcely be admitted now into a "well-regulated" family library; while in "Paul Clifford" he plunged into the lowest haunts of vice and vulgar villainy, where he literally fell among thieves by his own willful fault. But the works that are most characteristic of Lord LYTTON's mind, and at the same time the most popular among his readers, are "The Caxtons" and "My Novel." "Pelham" is a work of thorough originality, and enduring popularity. The author, who bears this fourth an affectionate dedication to his brother, may be assumed to have meant, by the title, that he put it forth as his own view of the "Varieties in English Life." It is finally unlike every thing else in point of tone, better book, in the spirit which it breathes, than the which it sounds, in the repose of feeling, if breadth of conception, and purity of style, is been written by no English novelist of our day. The inhabitants of the world of fashion, Haselden, the squire's family; good Parson Dale and his quick-tempered wife; Dr. Riccabocca, Italian exile, with his quaint sagacity and his sixfoote oddity, are perfectly alive; while the ills in London—Mr. Mivvy Peploe, the statesman; Harley L'Estrange, his generous eccentric friend; the ambitious schemer, Randal Leslie; old John Burley, the fine old English strong Richard Avenel, the Radical who has been in America—are unequally drawn, but all are real. "What will he Do with It" is greatly inferior to either of the preceding. Lord LYTTON's latest work is a specifically comic novel, entitled "Walpole; or, Every Man has his Price," which will appear in the February Number of Harper's Magazine.

NUARY 1, 1870.

In 1838, Mr. BULWER's literary and social distinction, added to his consistent advocacy of the Liberal party, induced Lord MELBOURNE's government to confer a baronetcy upon him. In 1843, by popular profession, he took the name of LYTTON, instead of BULWER, for his surname, on coming into possession, by his mother's will, of the estates in Hertfordshire, to which she was sole heiress. The LYTTONS, formerly of Knebworth, were a knightly family, intermarried to the Twysdens, and to the old sovereignes of Hertfordshire. In 1858 Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, having attached himself to the Conservative party, though in many respects liberal, was returned to Parliament for the county of Hertford, after ten years' absence from political life. He was Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord DERBY's second Ministry, in 1858; and in 1859, Lord DERBY was created a Peer, minister, Sir EDWARD was raised to the Peerage.

Lord LYTTON, having been married in 1827, has a son, the Hon. EDWARD ROBERT BULWER LYTTON, born in 1831, whose poetical works, bearing the assumed name of "Owen Meredith," have been received with much favor. He is English Secretary of Legation at Vienna.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The custom of decking houses and churches at Christmas with evergreens is as old as the time of the Druids. It was an old and odd fancy that when the sipping Druids came to their spiritual meetings in the green trees, and remained there, unchilled, until midsummer days. Holly, rosemary, laurel, bay, mistletoe, thorn, and yew, were favorite trimmings at Christmas festivities, and bright berries and blossoms emblems of the deep growth. There was a thousand sawthorn in the church-yard of Glastonbury Abbey, which always budded on the 24th and blossomed on the 25th of December. After the change of style, it was observed that it blossomed on January 5, which would have been Christmas-day, O. S. It is said that sips from this plant are still in existence, which unlock on that day. Another custom, indicative of social enjoyment and friendly hospitality, was the kissing-bough—a holly tree, made of evergreens, the principal of which was called the Yule log, or Christmas block. This tree was kept burning brightly for many days, and sometimes for weeks.

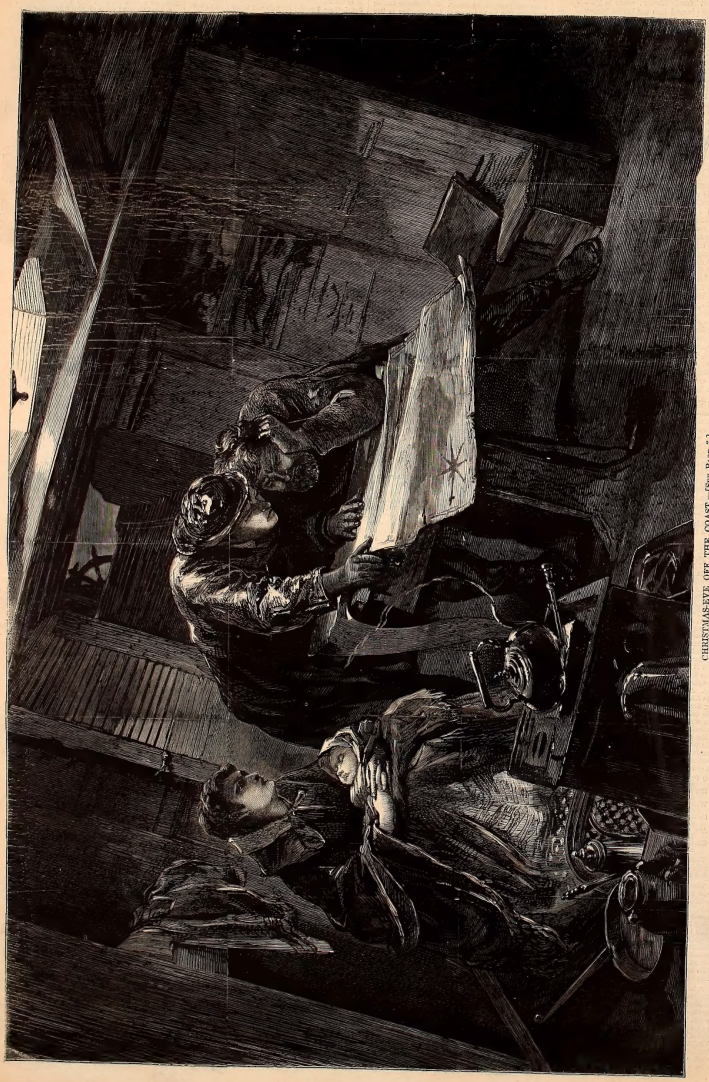
Many of the old customs have come down to us—and where they have been changed, the significance remains. Christmas is not only at the present day practically the "children's festival," but the time above all others when peace and good-will should prevail.

Then let us rejoice and Charity and Love be Christ-mas flowers
Whose blossoms can make glad at Yule this garden land of ours;
What wicked, that since that Nature's face is wreathed in crown of snow,
Or that the crimson tide of June within her grave lies low?
Are there not springing in our hearts perennial flowers still,
And gushing bright evergreens, of friendship and good-will?

There be a "hutest trip on record" across the Atlantic about every other week! The matter has become a standing controversy.

There are a goodly number of mothers in these days who are sending enough to clothe their little girls comfortably, when cold weather demands warm fashions. Yet there is good reason why the following question should be asked—and answered. Why should delicate, house-bred little girls wear open their legs only from the knees down to the bottom stockings, while the great strong men, who are their fathers, wear warm cloth boots for exercise and pantaloons, and leather boot-legs besides? Why should the little girls with their fine clothes and tender bare, while their fathers have skirts and fleecy coat-sleeves on their arms? Why?

A Milwaukee banker was lately the scene of a curious incident, and only just escaped a heavy financial transaction! An elderly, well-dressed gentleman entered the bank and drew a check in a business-like manner, which he passed to the paying teller. Upon looking at the signature the latter was somewhat surprised to find it that of no less distinguished a person than Cornelius Vanderbilt, and the check was drawn for the very handsome little sum of ten millions dollars. The gentleman appeared unconcerned, as he was accustomed to draw these little checks every day; and a scrutinizing glance convinced the teller that he was insane, and might be a dangerous customer. So he asked him if he was in a hurry, saying it might take some time to count the money. The stranger said he was not; that he had come on to Milwaukee to buy the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad; that he had made the purchase for $10,000,000, and if they would certify the check, it would answer all purposes. He continued to talk excitedly about what he was going to do with the cents, and what a great thing it would be for Milwaukee, until a policeman, who had been sent for, came in, and quietly persuaded him to be reasonable, and that he was unable to say whether he was insane or not, but he was certainly acting queerly. He was persuaded to go with the officer, and quietly to go with the officer, and quietly to go with the officer, and quietly



CHRISTMAS-EVE OFF THE COAST.—[See Page 7.]

A RAINY SUNDAY IN BRITTANY.—(See Page 13.)

I MIGHT HAVE DONE.

Is there a sadder word than this—
I might have done?
I might have filled life's cup of bliss,
At least for one!

I might have done! I might have made
One life so fair;
Rent from its robe of sombre shade
Each thread of care.

I might have done! So simple joy,
Love's world or wife,
Robs life of half its sad alloy,
Makes life a smile.

I might have done! While young life strewed
Her prescient mist,
Each foiled germ with love endued,
To bloom in deeds.

O love-fraught hours sail mutely on,
Die one by one!
Thy life to sigh when all are gone,
I might have done!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

BY THE BOOK.—BOOK XXX.

CHAPTER VIII.

CATCHING AT A STRAW.

During the first three weeks of his stay at Naples Sir John Gale appeared to be better than he had been for a long time previous. He did not pay many visits, but he received a considerable number of guests twice a week. These guests were chiefly gentlemen, but a few ladies came also.

Veronica's magnificent toilets were criticised by the women, and her striking beauty discussed by the men. She received homage and flattery enough to satisfy even her appetite for such tribute. She drove out daily in an elegant equipage. She had servants at her command. Her vanity and indolence were ministered to as assiduously as though she had been the most pampered invalid who ever dyed her fingers with henna. But although these things did afford her real delight at moments, they utterly failed to make her happy. A ceaseless under-current of anxiety ran through her life. She passed hours of suffering from unspeakable apprehension of evils to come.

Her pain of mind spurred her on to pursue the one object she had in view, with a courage and energy which she wondered at herself. The prospect of failure, exposure, and ruin—and in lieu of homage, flattery, and envy, was unbearable. It roused her in a passion of terror: and passion is powerful.

The strange indisposition which had so suddenly seized Sir John at the Villa Chiari had suggested to her the thought that he might die suddenly. For a time that accept was appeased by the improvement in his health after they had first reached Naples: it was appeased, but still it lived.

Her feelings toward him underwent strange revulsions. Sometimes she told herself that she hated him with all her heart; at other times she clung to him from the sheer necessity of having some human creature to cling to. She was unable to live solitarily self-sustained, and there were moments when she would rather have been reviled in anger than made to feel that she was an object of indifference.

But, to Sir John at least, she was not the latter. She occupied more of his thoughts than she was aware of. He had not forgotten the look of perplexed vengeance he had seen on Veronica's eyes to Bartletta. He often thought of it: especially as he got better, and had leisure to direct some of his private meditations toward other objects than himself.

When he thought of that look Sir John was jealous: jealous not so much with the jealousy of Love as with the jealousy of Power. He could have been jealous of Paul if he had suspected him of diverting any of the attentions due to his master into another channel. It was not displeasing to Sir John that Bartletti should admire Veronica. So long as he had that young lady belonging to him should be admired. It amused him to see Veronica play off her pretty airs on the prince, and treat him with an appearance of condescending smiles and stares of cold hauteur. But that Paul had intercepted implied interfering off of pretty airs: it expressed a confidential understanding, appeal, and reliance.

Veronica had been so perfectly persuaded that it was difficult for Sir John to conjecture what opportunity there could have been for the establishment of any thing like a confidence between her and Bartletti. She had not remained alone with him for a moment during the journey, and he had been careful to speak to him in Italian, so that the servants might understand what was being said. All this Sir John well knew, and was puzzled. He would have been glad to convince himself that his old mistress entertained no flagitious plans; but that could not be. It was such a look as Veronica had never given him—Sir John. The man who has a secret consciousness of sin has injured no, we know, very ready to find cause of offense or complaint against you. It balances matters somewhat.

Sir John was always telling himself how generous he was to Veronica: how he bumored her caprices; what a dull, wretched, miserable, poverty-stricken existence it was he had taken her from; and so forth. And he compared the flattering graciousness of her manner in the old days with the languor or violence which made up the present time. And then she teased him. She had learned the fact of the doctor's visits the need of sympathy and encouragement became paramount, and when Barletti was saying "good-night" she gave him her hand, and, with a warning pressure, conveyed into his a little folded paper with these words written on it, "To-morrow morning at eight o'clock I shall be walking in the Villa Reale. Be there. I wish to consult you."

The moment Barletti was gone, with the note in his hand, Veronica had a revulsion of feeling. She could not for the life of her say why, but she trembled at the thought of the risk she had run. But after a night's sleep she awoke, still unsay ing the frightened fear, but resolved to meet Bartletti at the hour appointed.

CHAPTER IX.

IN THE VILLA REALE.

"Why do you not be natural to me?" he said. "He has no living relatives; not one."

"To his friends?"

"His friends! I do not know any of his friends."

"You do not know any of his friends!"

"I—I know a man—a nobleman, in England, who knew him years ago in Rome. I know that Spanish attaché, and the Russian who came to Villa Chiari. I know the Duca di Torracina here, and his sister-in-law, the withered old Frenchwoman at the porch. These are scarcely the sort of friends who would be likely to afford me much support."

Barletti drew near her.

"I am only such a friend as these," he said, "but of course I have a right of acquaintance. And yet you speak to me with confidence."

Veronica raised her eyes to his sadly as she answered: "Yes; because I think you care for me, and feel for me, and would, perhaps, do a friendly action for my sake, if not for his."

She was not without a consciousness of the effect she was producing as the man beside her bent without any enjoyment of that consciousness. But there was truth enough in her words, and enough sincerity in her emotion, to send both the words and the look that accompanied them home to Barletti's heart.

The ecstasies of herself as Beauty in distress, to an admiring spectator, had a certain pleasure in it that could not be altogether denounced as the serious terrors and troubles that encompassed her.

Barletti glanced around him with the habitual caution of an Italian (and, be it said, of a lover. There is nothing more especially Roman as accomplished hypocrite in small precautions as a clandestine attachment). Seeing no one in the long alley of the Villa Reale where they were pacing side by side, he took Veronica's hand and pressed it to his lips. "You may trust me. I have been true to him in his eyes, and his voice was unsteady as he said:

"Ah, Veronica! There is nothing in all the world I would not do for your sake."

"I think you are a true friend."

"I hope I may ever so true, so devoted, as a wilbe if you will trust me."

Certainly the note had been written down do not display much eloquence on either side. But it seemed to both the speakers that they had said a great deal, and were waiting for a long time.

They walked on silently until they came to a little pier of masonry, railed in with iron bars, and abutting on the sea. They stood side by side, leaning over and looking out over the blue Mediterranean, which lay in the sunlight, the fishing barks flitted across the horizon. Near at hand, a little greyly-painted boat, moored to the masonry, rocked up and down, and the waters made a jogging sound around the stone.

White passers-by came from the beach, where a party of washer-women had established a drying-ground. The women talked and laughed shrilly and volubly, and the breeze carried the shrill sounds fitfully hither and thither. No other human beings were within sight. Behind them were the green alleys of the Villa Reale; in front, the blue sea and the blue sky.

Veronica and Signor de Barletti stood quite silent, she staring straight before her, he with his face upon her face, and looking at her only by his.

It seemed to him as though it were all a dream. She had come to him. He little guessed how far away her thoughts had been from him during all the interview. He little guessed how often they had been busy with persons and places he had never heard of. He had interpreted the downward droop of her eyes after the fervent fashion.

Veronica had flown away capriciously to the old days at Shipley, and the principal figure in her musings was Maud. But she broke the silence; and in the tones of her sweet lips she was back again in the present, and nervously alive to every detail of her position.

"I think you could find out from that doctor—I can give you his name—whether Sir John's illness is any of an alarming nature, whether he thinks there is immediate danger?"

Physicians will not speak of their patients to a stranger," answered Barletti. He, too, was prompt to enter into the prosaic actualities; but he was not at once cut of fairy-land with a sigh, and a little shock, such as we feel in sleep when a long, delicious flight on dream-wings ends with a sudden jar, and we alight.

"But you may not be a stranger to this physician for long. You may know him." Besides, if you spoke with him, I think you could easily discover what his impression was, without direct questions. It would be such a relief to my mind to know."

"Why do you not plainly ask Gale?"

"Oh, I dare not!

"You dare not! Is he harsh? Is he cruel? I know his temper is furious, but can he be harsh to you? These Englishmen are sometimes very brutal."

"When I say I dare not, I mean for fear of exciting him too much. You need not alarm yourself for me; nor expend any indignation, on that score, upon Sir John.

"Oh! Veronica, the thought of your being treated with unkindness is insupportable to me. Veronica, there can be no tie of affection between you and that man. He can not value you, he does not understand you. It is horrible to see you bound to him!"

Bartletti knew of a loveless and ill-assorted marriage was of very recent date. It was not long since he had looked upon the union of the rich Sir John Gale with the beautiful Veronica as a quite matter-of-course and expedient arrangement, transacted on fair principles of exchange.

"You must not speak so to me," said Veronica, in a low voice.

"Veronica, I have told you that there is nothing in the world I would not do for your sake. And it is true. But there are some things beyond my power. One of them is to feign not to love you. I would even do that, if you desired it, but I can not. You might as well ask me to fly to Cape Verde."

The strength of passion brushed away her small reserves and affectations like summer gossamer before a powerful wind. She felt frightened at the potency of the spirit she had evoked. She desired to be loved, but within a convenient measure. She had thought to conjure up a sprite to serve her, not to rule her.

Her instinct was to have appeal to his compassion. She did it genuinely, for she felt that she stood in need of help and tenderness.

"I trusted you," she said, brokenly, "and—and—you seemed to be true and gentle."

"You will not tell me that you did not know I loved you, Veronica! You did know it. Oh, my Dio, how I love thee!"

Men are selfish and cruel! There is none whom I can trust. You should not have said this to me now. You should not have said this to me at all."

The tears began to roll down her cheeks as she spoke. He was penitent when he saw tears, but he was penitent too. Veronica knew which end he was deeply in love with her, and, knowing it, had come voluntarily to claim the help and sympathy! Why, then, did she call it cruel and selfish that he should speak to her of his feelings? In the confidence of security, a word or a less devotion she wanted, and would have accepted, at any cost of pain to him.

She would not have him behave like Mr. Plece, at least for the present, or until the declaration of her own feelings should have been brought with risk or trouble to herself. But Cesare de' Barletti was not in the least like Mr. Plece. As for Plece's attempts at love-making all and getting nothing—was inconceivable to him. Cesare felt, after the manner of his race, far with the first deep and genuine passion of his life.

"What do you command me to do, Veronica? Tell me. I can not bear to see you shed tears," he said, speaking less vehemently.

"I can not command you—I do not wish to command you. But I ask you, as a friend, to ascertain from the doctor Sir John's illness. It is not a very great thing to do, perhaps. And yet it is more than I have any right to demand."

"I will do it. Tell me, Veronica, do you—are you so very anxious about your husband?"

"About—Sir John!"

"Don't frown! Your frown chills me like a cloud coming over the sun. Ah, how coldly you look! Veronica, you are heartless! In your veins, even though you have Italian blood in you, there must be ice instead of fire. You can not love that man! It is impossible."

"I said nothing of loving."

"Then you do not seem so anxious, so distressed—"

"Ah not you understand how terrible my position would be, alone here in a strange country, if—if any sudden misfortune should happen?"

"Alone! You would not be alone. Should I not be by your side? Ah, you speak of trust, you can not love that man! It is impossible."

"I said nothing of loving."

"Then I will not ask you now to

He started back as though she had struck him.

"Signora, I demand no price. It shall be as you choose."

She saw he was wounded to the quick, and was eager to soothe him; although at the same time she felt somewhat indignant at his indignation; as a spoiled child, accustomed to give way to its humors, is startled and hurt when its arrogant petulchness is taken seriously, and resented as an injury.

"Oh, forgive me!" she said. "I am very unhappy."

Those words melted him at once. But he had been deeply wounded. He could understand tears, caprice, frowns, even fury. But a bitter sarcasm, a pitiless probing of motives, was infinitely repulsive. It seemed to him so essentially unwomanly. A woman might die for you, if she loved you; or might kill you if she were jealous. That was in accordance with the arrangements of Providence. But to hear a satiric sneer from female lips was to the Neapolitan prince almost as shocking as to have beheld a lady with dissecting knife in hand, ready and ready to use it.

"I did not think you could have spoken so unkindly, Veronica, to one who is devoted to your heart and soul, as I am," he said, reproachfully. But he took her hand again, and kissed it.

"Perhaps," said Veronica, "it will be best that I should meet you here again, to-morrow. The place is a public promenade. There can be no reason why I should not enjoy the sunshine here of a morning. I will come."

"May I not walk with you now, until you are within sight of the Palazzo?"

"No. I will go home alone. It is best so. Addio."

"Addio! I shall see you this evening. But it will be like looking at the sky from behind prison bars. Veronica! Until to-morrow!"

As Veronica neared the porte cochère of the house she lived in, she became aware of a step close at her heels. She turned her head at the sound, and saw Paul.

"Good-morning, miladi," said Paul, with his habitual grave and respectful salutation.

"Where have you been at this hour?" asked Veronica, almost out of her self-possession.

"Sir John sent me to the Via Toledo, miladi. There is no more use for Codegna in his presence, and Sir John desired to have some got at once."

The Via Toledo was far enough from the scene of Veronica's interview with Barletti.

"I had a mind to delightful to delight that it tempted me out early. I have been walking by the sea," said Veronica.

She could not for her life have resisted the temptation to make this sort of excuse for, or explanation of, her having been out at that unusual hour; and yet she hated herself for the instant the words were said, and swept past Paul with intensified hauteur in her always haughty gait.

She did not think what had become of me —pardon, I mean of miladi," said the French maid, when Veronica re-entered her chamber. "And miladi cried herself! Mon Dieu!"

The Abigail cast up hands and eyes at the tremendous thought.

"I had a desire to go out by myself. I went to walk in the sunshine. This January sun is like June in England. It warms the blood in one's veins."

"Oh, it is very true, miladi. But it burns one's skin. See how basest all these Neapolitans are! But Monsieur Paul also had a fancy to go out this morning."

"I saw Paul. He must have sent him out, to the Via Toledo."

"Ah, Sir John sent him? That is different. But he must have made a long détour, for I saw him from my bedroom window coming from the Villa Reale."

II.

JACQUES LERONDE.

JACQUES LERONDE was a French Canadian, and as fine a specimen as ever trapped beaver, shot a bear, or trod upon a snow-shoe. He was tall, had a fine figure, a fine, manly countenance, with good features and modesty stamped upon it, a fine intellect, though uneducated—at least in book lore—and a fine fancy. He was also fastidiously dressed, but the dress was not of his own fancy; it was that of the region in which his lot had been cast, and consisted of a blue capote, with brass buttons, which was girt round him with a massive scarlet belt. The skin of the marten formed his cap, that of the moose-deer his moccasins. Scarlet leggings clothed his muscular legs, and brilliant garters of the same hung round them under the knees. His locks were black as the raven's wing, his eyes piercing like the eagle's, his nose was Roman, his mouth large and firm, and his mouth per— But why go on? It is not sufficient to say, in a word, that he was a fine, handsome fellow?

Jacques Leronde was in love—also in despair. The enlightened reader will not require to be informed that these two conditions are compatible. Indeed they are frequently, in and country or another, found resident in the same bosom.

At the time of which we write Jacques was a servant of one of the fur companies which, some forty or fifty years ago, opposed each other with all their energies in those wild wastes of North America which lie beyond the Canadas, and which were, and still are, the home of the red man.

Far, far beyond the utmost verge of the civilized world, in the lone wilderness, lies the great Lake of the Woods; and far beyond that, in the direction of the North Pole, stood Fort Matuan.

The fort was, we may say, buried there; for little more than the roofs of the few wooden huts which composed it were visible, all else being whelmed in superabundant snow, through which passages had been cut to the windows, and beaten tracks led to the doors. Winter, hard, bitter, hyperborean winter, had been reigning there for eight months; but he had five months' still to reign, for it was only the Christmas-time of the year, and his dethronement did not usually take place until May.

At the gate of this fort Jacques stood one evening gazing anxiously at the setting sun and the snow-flakes which fell thickly around him. He had been on post during the whole watch. Poor fellow! The snow on which he stood was cold, but not half so cold as his bosom was colder; as on the adjoining river was the ice, but not so cold was harder; the river itself was deep and dark, but unfathomably darker were the thoughts and meditations of Jacques Leronde.

The reason of this is easily explained. Twice in the year the lonely inhabitants of Fort Matuan were accustomed to receive letters from the civilized world. Twice by the same token, they were with supplies in spring, and once by a packet which was sent express through the country in the course of two more near the close of autumn. Mr. Ogilvie, who was in charge then, had told Jacques to be particularly attentive to the forward with the express to Fort Chimo, an outpost which lay upward of a hundred miles still nearer to the pole than Fort Matuan. He had therefore cheered that Annette Weston dwelt there. She was the pretty daughter of the chief of Fort Chimo, a man who had risen from the ranks to the position, if not the character, of a gentleman. This Annette was a beautiful mulatto, his acknowledged —the star of his hopes, the sun of his system, the bright centre of his being. Conceive, then, his disappointment when, at one of the posts on the line on which the packet was expected to arrive, Mr. Ogilvie announced to his men that no express and told him that a band of Indians, with plenty of furs, had been heard of in the neighborhood, and that he should himself go in search of them, and the fort, he meant to send him out after them.

"Bon, Monsieur," said Jacques, who spoke English so broken that it were vain for us to attempt to mend it, "a'sat of de winstair packit?"

"Oh, I'll send it on to you, or bring you to Fort Chimo," replied Mr. Ogilvie; "the furs are of more importance. Our opponents are sure to get some of them; so look out and be on safe as fast as you can. Take Finn with you, and you may turn your snow-shoes the wrong way."

"Oui, Monsieur," said Jacques, as he left the room cross-fallen, and wished with all his heart that he had not been the "best runner" at the fort.

That evening, in company with Flinn, Jacques started off, each man dragging a small sledge. They had not been many hours on their way ere miles when they came upon the Indian camp, and the sight of the furs they caused them to look at each other in dismay. The Indians were all lying about the fires in a state of helpless intoxication. The unfortunate fur-traders had reached the camp before them, and, of course, as soon as they having remained, did not as they thought, but in reality—that also Flinn and Jacques were mistaken; for no sooner did they approach than the Indians, who had purposely kept himself as sober as he could, staggered toward them, and said, while he swayed to and fro, little more than a drunken man's kind of ineffible gravity, "My white children are welcome."

"Some other white children have been welcomed before us, it would seem," replied Flinn, somewhat sternly, to the Indian chief, who, while he spoke fully better than his men.

"They have been," said the old chief, drawing himself up, and extending his hand, while he spoke with the dignity peculiar to his race; "but my red children are also here to welcome. As the sun rises in the sky, so red children shoot their faces—to their white visitors. But my white children of—his—Fort Matuan see the sun clear as at noonday. They have the water; we called them so; but we—have kept back all the good furs" (here he endeavored to look very knowing, but only succeeded in looking very foolish) "for our white—children of Fort Matuan."

At this point, being apparently unable to concentrate his faculties any longer, the old chief turned slowly round, staggered gravely to his seat, and flinging himself on a buffalo-robe, fell fast asleep almost immediately.

"If I have a voice, stat be good," said Jacques, as he and his companion blew up the embers of the fire in the chief's tent, and made themselves comfortable for the night.

An old squaw, who had partially recovered from the effects of the fire-water, now came forward woke up, and assured the traders that they had only sold the worst of their furs to the other party, and that they were overjoyed they had got all; but in reality they kept the best furs for their particular friends—the men of Fort Matuan.

Much delighted to learn this, the two traders sat down to eat some pemmican which Jacques, who was somewhat talkative, gave his comrade to long account of early old uncle in Montreal —"his only relative—who was said to be rich, and who was always writing letters inviting him to go to Canada and live with him.

"An' why don't ee go?" asked Flinn.

"Forcause me no live on nobody, s'long's can work for mesself."

"More fool you," said Flinn, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, and rolling himself in his blanket, and going to sleep.

Jacques sighed, followed his comrade's example, and dreamed overwhelmed. Being an enthusiastic trader, he dreamed of furs also, and he thought more than once in his dreams of what the missionary had said—that perhaps good might come of his disappointment.

II.

CHRISTMAS-DAY dawned; but there was no holiday for Jacques and Flinn. These energetic men spent the day in trading for the furs that the Indians had reserved. Toward the afternoon they set out on their return to Fort Matuan, with heavily-laden sledges and light hearts; for, in addition to the success that they had in securing a large quantity of valuable furs, Jacques now began to hope that he might, after all, be back in time to be the bearer of the winter packet to Fort Chimo.

In order to shorten the road they made a détour which led them to the Indian camp, and came down upon a frozen river. At a very lonely-looking and unusual part of the river they were surprised to observe a thin wreath of smoke curling above the trees. Hastening to the spot they found a man, the semblance of a living skeleton, lying beside a fire, and another man—apparently more emaciated than the first—sitting beside him with his face buried in his hands. A glance convinced the traders that they were in the presence

"Starving," observed Jacques to his comrade, with a look of compassion, as they hastened forward.

The man seated by the fire heard the sound, looked up, and gave an exclamation of "God be praised!" fell back in a state of insensibility.

"Must have been far gone, poor fellow, to faint so easy," said Flinn, stooping over him.

"Hallo! what have we here?" he added, pulling the man's head back a little. "I say, Jacques, why, here's the—the packet!"

Novais amid de packit," said Jacques, earnestly; "we must save dat one hand.

Nothing more was said when the two men found themselves in the presence of unfortunate travelers, neither of whom was able to speak distinctly for some time; but when Jacques had roused up the man who had fainted, and Flinn had brewed and administered a cup of hot tea, the tongue of one of them was loosed, and by slow degrees he told his tale. They had been set off with the packet three weeks before, and were to have reached Fort Matuan in about five days sooner had not his companion fallen and broken his leg. He had put him on the sledge with the packet, and dragged himself over the snow as fast as he could: but the snow was deep, and the way great. Provisions had failed. Animals were scarce at that time of the year. Day after day he had toiled on in the hope of finding it with Indians or reaching the fort. At last his strength had given way, and he had tried to die: He had not expected, he said, that they would both die that Christmas-day!

It turned out as they had suspected, that Flinn quickly transferred their furs to a place of hiding—put them in "cache," as fur-traders term it—harnessed the half-starved men to the sledges, dragged them and the packet into Fort Matuan before the Christmas-day was over.

We will not pause to tell of the delight experienced by these self-banished fur-traders when they received their mail, full of the box with trembling, eager hands, and tore open letters which had been written months before, and which contained the latest news of the loved ones "at home." Before Mr. Ogilvie had perused many lines of his letter from fresh quarters, he announced Leronde.

"I am ready, Jacques, to forward the letters and papers for Fort Chimo without a moment's delay. Get ready, therefore, to start to-morrow."

"Oui, Monsieur."

Jacques's manner was not now dejected.

"And here, Jacques, is a letter for yourself."

"From mes oncle, 'spose," said Jacques, as he received the package, and examined it with some interest. "Non," he added, "him's not dirty nuff for oncle's letter."

"Very true, Jacques," said our trusty leader, smile, he oil, and tell Flinn he is to accompany you, for I have a packet for him to take you work at the Christmas holidays; but it can't be helped."

Although the order had been given to get ready for a start on the morrow, the men were not dispatched until the following morning, when, with the packet and their blankets and provisions lashed to a small sledge, they left the fort, and turned their faces northward.

They had a long journey to reach the fort in time, and on the last day were obliged to walk fully thirty miles in order to accomplish their object, and arrived late in the evening, just as the inmates had reached the height and fullowing of what was termed a festival. That outlandish fort was inhabited by Mr. Weston, the commander-in-chief, an interpreter, and six men. These, with six Indian men, four Indian women, and the fair Annette—in fact, the entire population of the region—were, when the travelers arrived, dancing in the hall to the tones of a "home-made" violin, and a kettle-drum.

Those whose duty it is to correspond with men who dwell in the outlandish places of the earth, Christmas-day, and the arrival of the packet in spite of their duties, did they but witness the burst of joy with which the arrival of a "packet" is hailed in the Far North, would never spoiled the door of the "hall," and thrust his head in. Some of the dancers did not happen to know him; but they knew that he was a stranger. A new face was before them—a sight that had not greeted their eyes for such a length of time that it seem a thrill to their hearts. They also knew, instinctively, that the newcomer must be the bearer of the packet; and, incontinently, a rush was made at him. For a few minutes he was literally overwhelmed. Jacques's enthusiastic trader, he dreamed of furs also, and he rent, and allowed the tired men to look about them.

Need we say that Jacques looked for Annette? Their eyes met, and those of the latter fell, as she advanced, blushing to the roots of her glossy hair, to welcome her lover. Well was it for both of them at that time that all the "white men" of the fort were absorbed in news from home, for each exclusively intent on his own epistle, yet Christmas-like, ostensibly anxious to read scraps aloud, and crave the sympathy of his friends.

The lovers retired to a room which opened off the hall, where they were confided to each other their mutual hopes and sorrows.

"Father won't let me marry you, Jacques," murmured Annette, sadly.

Jacques kissed her with as little noise as possible, and said, "Annette, my love—"

"But I assure you he won't. He is kind and good, but very determined. He says you are too poor."

"Ah, me! an' hims would make me pooner, by taking you from me."

Hereupon Jacques sighed, and so did Annette; after which they— But it is not necessary to say more: enough to state that they were in the delightful case of the unfortunate pair.

Despite his sorrows Jacques danced that night with as much vigor as if he had walked only thirty yards instead of thirty miles; and he, with his friends and the Indians, kept it up all early morning, inspirited by the music of the drum and violin, and inspired only by tea!

Next morning Jacques, being a bold man, made a formal proposal to Mr. Weston for the hand of his beloved daughter.

"No, Jacques," said Mr. Weston, firmly; "you are not in a position to marry. You have no money. Annette can not live on air."

"Ah! Monsieur, but I can work."

"Very true, Jacques, but you must work to some purpose, before I can let you have my daughter. It will be time enough to think of it when you have made a fortune. Besides, Annette is yet very young."

"Ah! oui, Monsieur, she is beautiful!"

"Well, I believe she is," said Mr. Weston, with a laugh. "However, the thing is impossible. I am sorry to refuse you, Jacques, for I believe you to be a good fellow."

"Good, Monsieur," urged the disconsolate suitor, "she does love me! Her felicity vill—"

"Come," interrupted Mr. Weston, sternly, enough, but I can not allow it. We will drop the subject; it is a disagreeable one."

Poor Jacques sighed heavily, and rose to go to the room; but stopping suddenly, thrust his hand into his pocket and drew out a letter, which he handed to the trader.

"I vill ask von favor, Monsieur. Will you read me letter? I can not read him."

The trader took his eye over the epistle. As he did so, an expression of increasing surprise overspread his features, and settled down into gravity. Suddenly he grasped the hand of the rejected suitor, and shook it warmly.

"Have you any idea of the contents of this letter?" he asked.

"Non, Monsieur—can guess nothing."

"It is from a Montreal lawyer, telling you that your old uncle is dead, and has left you all his property, which, it would seem, amounts to two thousand dollars in cash, and a small farm near the Lachine Rapids. I congratulate you, Jacques, with all my heart."

This intelligence was received by the fortunate man with a degree of coolness and imbecility. For several minutes he did not speak. By degrees, however, his expression changed. A beaming smile lit up his handsome countenance, and a gleam of humor twinkled in his eye, as he said, with a air of profound gravity, "Dat is good, Monsieur, to retourn to de disagreeable subject. May I have de honor for prepose to de hand of your daughter?"

Need we inform you, reader, that the subject was not disagreeable after that? Mr. Weston had no objection whatever to the proposal, provided Annette was willing—and that, when Jacques soon afterward made the same proposal to Annette herself, he found that she had no objection whatever, provided her father was willing.

Before that week was out, Jacques had fitted up a dog-sleigh with the most gorgeous harness that Indian beads, scarlet cloth, bell-handle-trimmings, and little brass balls. In this vehicle he packed Annette, and her warm blankets, robes, and, walking behind on snow-shoes, drove her down to Fort Matuan. Flinn drove a less ornamental sledge containing the baggage. Annette's companion—and Mr. Weston, with one of his children, followed behind in a sledge to be present at the wedding. The missionary was, of course, delighted to perform the ceremony, and did not let the grass grow on the bridegroom how fortunate it was that he had been there to marry the happy pair before Christmas-eve; for, had it been otherwise, the packet would probably have lain undiscovered for many months, and the happy issue of events might have been indefinitely postponed. Jacques gazed at his bride, and willingly admitted the great truth, that, even in the strangest his plans, great or lower directs his steps.

When good spring unbound the icy fetters of the Far North, Monsieur and Madame Leronde stepped into a light canoe, and, leaving the wilderness behind them, went down the rivers that made to possession, as Jacques was wont to say, of their "oncle's estates."

In after-years, when Jacques and Annette were gray, and their children's children swarmed in and around their dwelling, the retired fur-trader used to discourse enthusiastically of his adventures during the "Canadian times," especially of that adventure—the most fortunate of his life—which occurred to him on a certain Christmas-day in the North, and put him in possession of Annette and happiness.

AN ATTACK.—[See Page 13.]

QUEEN VICTORIA.

WE present our readers this week with an admirable portrait of the English Queen, who is scarcely less revered for her amiable qualities by republican Americans than by her own subjects. It is engraved from a portrait drawn from life, and represents that eminent sovereign as she appears to-day. Nearly all the photographs of the Queen fail in conveying an impression of the singular mingling of sweetness and sadness that pervades her countenance, and which only at rare intervals gives way to a cheerful and animated expression. It is said that no sovereign's face has been so often painted, engraved, and photographed as VICTORIA'S, and that a "Victoria Gallery" would fill many portfolios. In Europe the traveler ravely enters a public room without finding her portrait beside that of the reigning sovereign of the country. It is scarcely less popular among ourselves; and it is said that in the most wretched hovels in Mexico—though we can not vouch for the truth of the statement—three portraits, generally coarse lithographs, can almost always be found: they are those of GEORGE WASHINGTON, ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT, and VICTORIA of England—a worthy triad of Patriotism, Wisdom, and Virtue. It should be borne in mind that the homage paid to the English Queen does not arise from a spirit of servile adulation, but from the genuine admiration which her womanly qualities command in the hearts of all people.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

AN ATTACK.

ALL the little folks among our readers who have ever had the happiness to pass a summer in the country, where the farmers' geese are allowed to wander by the road-side and on the common, will recognize the truth of our illustration on page 12; and children of a larger growth, who have not altogether outgrown the remembrances of early years, will doubtless smile, as it recalls a similar adventure of their own. Who has not been frightened, in the helpless inexperience of childhood, by the strange, angry chorus of hissing and gabbling, raised in evident menace by a flock of geese, straggling toward the intruder on their society with outstretched necks and gaping bills? The children in our picture have given no provocation to the enemy. They are passing quietly homeward through the pasture, with no intention of disturbing the feathered foe. The younger child has toddled on in advance, and so has received the brunt of the attack, from which she retreats in babyish terror to claim the protection of her older sister. As no creature understands better than the goose that "discretion is the better part of valor," we may be sure the flock will keep at a safe distance from that upraised sickle and determined attitude.

A RAINY SUNDAY IN BRITTANY.

THE pleasant little picture of which we give an engraving on page 9 is one of the finest works that has recently come from Mr. BOUGHTON'S easel. To appreciate fully the disappointment and annoyance depicted on the face of the fair Bretonne belle, it must be understood that the peasant girls of Brittany take special pride in their snow-white "coiffures," which are often costly as well as curious. We may not unfrequently see old point lace on the heads of these peasants, and caps so precious that they descend as heir-looms from mother to daughter; and when caught out in the rain, the women instantly cover their caps with a colored handkerchief. Of course this must disfigure and disarrange their dress; and we can well understand that, after making her elaborate toilet, our pretty Bretonne does not wish to be seen at church with her best Sunday cap all awry, and her dress draggled and wet. She evidently would like to wait in the porch until the shower is over; but unhappily, when it once begins to rain in Brittany, there is little hope of its leaving off in a hurry, and there is no telling how long the dispppointed belle may be kept imprisoned on the four-tep.

HOMELESS AND HUNGRY.—(SEE PAGE 7.)

The artistic merits of this picture are very great. The details are all in admirable keeping, and nothing of the kind could be finer than the drawing of the massive carved timber porch, which affords the necessary shelter, and which in character of the old houses found in the towns of Brittany, with their projecting stories resting on grotesquely carved brackets.

THE PIONEER TOBACCO FACTORY constitutes the entire block on Hicks Street, between Warren and Baltic Streets, Brooklyn.

The main building is of brick, and is two hundred feet long, seventy feet wide, and five stories high, being the largest Plug Tobacco factory in the United States. In the rear of the factory is the Machine and Box shops, Engineroom, etc.

The buildings are all occupied by the Pioneer Tobacco Company, who own the machinery in use, including some valuable improvements secured by letters patent, of which they have the exclusive use and control.

Over five hundred people are employed in the manufactory, which is under the personal superintendence of GEORGE H. LUFORD and WILLIAM J. FOUNTAIN.

The Company have manufactured and sold during the current year over two million pounds of plug tobacco, and have paid the Government nearly seven hundred thousand dollars in taxes, being more than the amount collected on all on tobacco in the whole State of Virginia for the year ending Dec. 30th, 1868.

The old impression that, because a portion of the raw material happens to be raised in Virginia, tobacco must necessarily be manufactured there, is giving way to the idea that Northern industry and skill can as well compete with Virginia in the manufacture of tobacco as with other Southern States in the manufacture of cotton goods.

The Pioneer Tobacco Company is incorporated under the Laws of the State of New York. W. HUNT, President; J. H. SANBORN, Secretary. H. W. HUNT & Co., Agents, 167 Water Street, N. Y., and 16 Central Wharf, Boston.

The business of the Company is thoroughly systematized, and conducted in accordance with places them among the few tobacco manufacturers who have had no differences with the Government, the Legislation of the Complete and their goods is known and established.—[Com.]

CHAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured by using the use of BREIDENBACH'S CHYMIC Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. So does this put in the gentlest. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—BREIDENBACH & CO., New York.

FEMALE COMPLAINTS should be cured, as they often can be, by a few doses of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the face, use Dr. SETH ARNOLD'S COMPOUND AND PIMPLE REMEDY. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, of Bond St., New York. Sold every where.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

No. 652 Broadway.

SWISS WATCHES,
of all styles and prices.

PARIS AND GENEVA JEWELRY,
FRENCH CLOCKS, BRONZES,
MANTEL ORNAMENTS,
CHINA VASES,
FANS, OPERA GLASSES,
MUSICAL BOXES,
and a large selection of PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES, well adapted for
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

V. J. MAGNIN, GUEDIN, & CO.,
Importers and Wholesale Dealers.
Sole Agents for the NARDIN WATCH.

A DOSE

for the stomach is shrewd. It nature with the food, and enters with the blood in all parts of the system, and weakens every part. Stop it, and the flow of time. WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT, at 183 Chatham Square, N. Y. A pint sent, free of express charges, on receipt of $6, or a gallon for $20, double strength.

EMPLOYMENT.

Very little capital required, and no risk. Success certain. Business highly respectable, and Profit from 66 to 100 per cent. For circulars containing lucrative employment should write for particulars at once. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, 24 Beekman St., N. Y.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HAGEN'S ANODYNE, MORDECAI, or HAGEN, the Great Physiological JOURNAL, $2, sent to one address for $3, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

TOYS FOR THE HOLIDAYS, at the Children's Free Bizaar, 618 and 620 Broadway, 675 Broadway, between Great and Bleecker Streets.

LEWIS F. TIBBALS.

WORKS OF THE
UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,
GILES, WALES, & CO., MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,
IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,
SALESROOM OF THE
United States Watch Company,
13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

Manufacturers of all the Grades of AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,
BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jewelled, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for our late improvement in STEM WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

WATCH No. 1044.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month. WILLARD DERBY.
Of Derby, Snow, & Fitzsimons, City, N. Y.

WATCH No. 1134.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by the United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months; its total variation from mean time being only six seconds.
A. L. DENNIS, President N. J. R. R. T. & T. Co.

WATCH No. 1121.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month.
F. A. HASKELL, Con. Hudson River R. R.

WATCH No. 1111.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only ten seconds.
S. FIELD, Jr., Cashier, U. S. Express Co.

WATCH No. 1027.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me since June, 1867: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.
HENRY SMITH.
Treas. Panama R. R., 38 Wall St.

WATCH No. 12613.—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months; its total variation from mean time being only one second per month.
GEO. LYONS, Gen'l Eastern Pass'r Agt'f Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

WATCH No. 1309.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months; its total variation from mean time being only eight seconds per month. Have been traveling through Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Iowa, 10,000 miles of railroad.
E. RICE, of Whitney & Rice, 179 Broadway, N. Y.

SUMMIT, Pa., Feb. 26, 1869.
WATCH No. 1176.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months; its total variation from mean time being only two seconds per month.
HENRY DE LANCEY, Engineer Phila. & Erie R. R.

WATCH No. 1205.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months; its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds per month.
A. R. ENGLISH, Vice-Pres't Elastic Cone Spring Co.
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
of MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 49 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York. ☞ Call or send for Price-List.

UNDEFINED AILMENTS.

There are many ailments, lying in their nature, but the symptoms of which are not sufficiently specific to enable physicians to classify them under any particular head. As a general rule, they arise from a general debility of the whole organization; but the primary cause, in at least three cases out of five, is a lack of brisk vital action in the stomach and liver. Stimulate and tone the relaxed digestive and secretive organs, and bodily ease, health, and vigor will follow the treatment. Among all the medicines which have been recommended as effective to this end, none has been so administered with such uniform and entire success as

HOSTETTER'S
STOMACH BITTERS

Its ingredients were selected from the vegetable kingdom, chiefly, with a view to the invigoration of the physique and the constitution, and also for their anti-bilious and slightly laxative properties. Twenty odd years of experience has proved that these herbs, restoratives were wisely chosen and have been judiciously apportioned in this celebrated preparation. Dyspepsia and indigestion, the most frequent of the many complaints, but as a household remedy for all the minor ailments incident to humanity, the Stomach Bitters has attained an unimpeachable testimony, which fairly eclipses that of any other proprietory official medicine in use.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for CASH during this month. Those who will call will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid; the rest to be let, and rent money applied if purchased. Fine 7-Octave Pianos for $175 and upward; New Organs for $46 and upward, for cash.

$60 a Week for Agents, local or traveling. No capital wanted. Address YOUNG & Co., 209 Broadway, N.Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

WILL CONTINUE TO OFFER

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

IN ALL THE DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT, and will supply them with

FRESH STOCK OF

SILKS, EMBROIDERIES,
POPLINS, LACES,
DRESS GOODS, SHAWLS,
VELVET AND CLOTH SACQUES,
LADIES', MISSES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITS,
GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS,
HOSIERY, LINENS, BLANKETS,
GLOVES, FLANNELS, CARPETS,
CURTAIN MATERIALS, &c.

Their customers and the residents of the neighborhood cities are respectfully invited to examine the above.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., AND 10TH ST.

MUSIC for HOLIDAY GIFTS.—BOOSEY'S Musical Dime-Series and Vocal Works, elegantly bound, suitable for presentation. Beethoven's Sonatas, complete; Mozart's Sonatas, complete. $7; The Operatic Album, containing 100 gems from the principal Operas, $3; Dressler's Royal Musical Album, $3; Christmas Edition of the Messiah, $1; Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words, complete, $3; Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte (German Text), Schumann's Album for the Young, $1 '58; Ball-Room Music-Book (12 Dances), $1; The Old Songs of Ireland (96 Songs), $3; The German Song-Book (85 Songs), $3; Opera Song-Book (98 Songs), $3; Verdi Album (25 of Verdi's best Songs), $3; English Ballad-Book (113 Songs), $3; Standard Song-Book (96 Songs and words), $3; New English Song-Book (44 new Songs), $3. Complete Operas, Orchestra, and large collections of Vocal and Piano-forte Music, in Books, 50 cts. each. Also, just ready, free to any address, BOOSEY & CO.'s CATALOGUE OF USEFUL PUBLICATIONS, in full sheet or music-form. BOOSEY & CO., 548 Broadway, New York.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address J. F. TILLOTSON & CO., Package Maker, Concord, Conn.

$290 for first-class new 7-Octave Pianos. Seat on trial. U. S. Piano Co., New York.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY

RAILROAD CO.,

in denominations of $100 and $500, bearing Eight per Cent. per annum interest, payable in Gold on the 1st of February and August, in each year, in New York, Boston, or Frankfort-on-the-Main, at the holder's option, free of U. S. Taxes. The interest for six months on $100 Bond is payable as follows:

In New York.....$4 00 Gold.
In London.....£3 4s. 4d.
In Frankfort-on-the-Main. 100 Florins.

On a $500 Bond, one half these amounts, respectively.

These Bonds have thirty years to run from August 14, 1869, payable at maturity, in Gold, in the City of New York; are Coupon Bonds, but can be registered, or converted into Registered Bonds.

They are secured by a first and only mortgage on 111 Miles of the Company's Road, from St. Joseph, Mo., to Marysville, Kansas, known as the Eastern Division of the Company's main line, which runs from St. Joseph to Fort Kearney, on the Union Pacific Road, including the Company's equipments, rolling stock now owned or hereafter possessed, rights of way, franchises, real estate, and personal property in Doniphan, Brown, Nemaha, and Marshall Counties, Kansas, now owned or which the Company may acquire by reason of the extension of their line to the City of Marysville.

This mortgage is executed to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company as Trustees. At the same time, the whole issue of $1,500,000 Bonds have been executed by the Railroad Company, placed in the custody of the Trustees, who have absolutely possession, to use only issue them, or their proceeds, in accordance with the terms of the Mortgage Deed, which is open a completed road, and for only 40 miles of the first 100 miles.

Bonds, to be valid, must be countersigned by the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company.

The only part of the road now completed, which is mortgaged to secure these Bonds at their par value, is $13,500, while the actual cost of construction and equipment of the road is much greater.

This line is mainly the extension of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, from the Missouri River, and East, and the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections with the Pacific Railroad, converging at St. Joseph and connecting at one with the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad, which runs through Eastern Kansas, into the heart of Nebraska, where it connects with the Union Pacific Railroad at the City of Fort Kearney, and has the shortest route known to California and the Pacific States.

The Company have issued of the $1,500,000, to which nearly $1,000,000 is subscribed and paid up by local subscriptions, which amount has been and is being expended on the road. The Company have 1,500,000 acres of agricultural land donated to them along the line, which was a grant from the United States Government, the alternate sections of which are selling for $2 00 per acre, and at this low price, the Company have an asset of value in

Lands.....$4,000,000
First Mortgage Bonds.....1,500,000
Capital Stock.....10,000,000
Total Resources.....$15,500,000
Total Length of Road.... 271 Miles.

While the only debt against the Company is this issue of First Mortgage Bonds, amounting to $1,500—a—that can be issued.

The portion of the road West from St. Joseph is now in successful operation, showing earnings, per mile, sufficient to meet the interest liabilities on this loan.

A Branch Company is building a line from this road to the Kansas Pacific Road, thereby giving a direct route to Denver City.

We are solicited to offer these Eight per Cent First Mortgage Bonds at 97½ and accrued interest in currency, with the reserved right to advance the price without notice. Pamphlets, maps, and information furnished on application.

Bonds sent and packages received free of express charges, and marketable securities converted without commission, at parties investing in these Bonds.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.,
Commercial Agents,
54 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO.,
Fiscal Agents,
49 Wall Street, New York.

Having had all the papers and documents relating to the loan examined by competent counsel and experienced business men, and having personally examined the same, which we find regular and perfect, and having had our own engineers examine the road and property, whose reports are satisfactory, we do, with the utmost confidence and satisfaction. recommend the EIGHT PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS OF THE ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY as a SAFE, SURE, AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT, worthy the attention of capitalists, investors, and others.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.
TANNER & CO.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 19 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning. Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 80 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

CATARRH.
RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the permeation (diffusion) of harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerfully healing—relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat," coil in the head," frequent sneezing, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and perhaps the worst of torture—the insidious progress it makes into the bony structure in all its forms forever, and cures the most desperate case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE MIRROR AND FARMER, published at Manchester, N. H., EDWIN CLARKE, Editor and Proprietor, is an eight-page paper, forty-eight columns, and has a large circulation in the Granite State, and has a larger circulation than any other New England paper north of Boston. The second Tuesday in June will be the first publication. 10 cts a Line; $1 20 on Inch of space, for each insertion. Six months' contract for 10 per cent. discount.

It circulates in large numbers in all the farming town, manufacturing villages, and cities of New Hampshire, and very largely in Vermont, and some in all the other States. For great advertising, and for the best price charged (which is the same to all), it has no equal in the Eastern States.

The MIRROR AND AMERICAN—three editions daily—is published by the same

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!
WITH A
Novelty Job Printing-Press.
The only Low-Priced Press ever invented that will do good printing. Printing can be done as well and as rapidly on this press as on the best job press made, and at one-fifth the cost. In places where artistical power is not used, or for circulars, noteheaders, programmes, business cards, &c., where desire to do their own printing, it is entirely without a rival. The Best Holiday Gift for Boys. Price of Press $15, $30, $32, and $50. Send for full descriptive illustrated circulars, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of plain and color printing done on the press, and specimens sheets of type, borders, cuts, rules, &c., to BENJ. O. WOODS, Proprietor, 31 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at 1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.
Also, Rich Cabinet Hardware, Locks, Bronzes, Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Improved domestic articles invented and manufactured. Bell Hanging promptly attended to. Contract for Gas Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

Carbolic Salve.

Prepared with Carbolic Acid, which is used in Hospitals, by direction of Physicians of most eminence in this city, every where. Possesses the most remarkable healing power of any Salve covered. 25 cts, per Box. John F. Henry, Proprietor, 6 College Place, N. Y.

AGENTS—LOOK HERE!
PICTORIAL FAMILY BIBLE
THE MOST POPULAR AND PROFITABLE OF ALL BOOKS.

Contains more than 1600 large and beautiful Illustrations, 1600 References, Directions for the Profitable Reading of Scriptures, numerous valuable Tables, a beautiful Family Record and Family Album, &c., &c. Send for Circulars and Terms.

Each Agent sells from three to ten copies daily. Editors pronounce the best. Sold by all Family. Agents, send for our liberal terms and to a few months. For Circulars and full particulars, address, HALE, CUSHING & CO., 614 and 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia. [3]

"As authority on all agricultural matters, it has few equals."

The New York HORSE-KEEPER says the above of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading agricultural newspaper of New England.
TERMS: Weekly, $3 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year.
Send stamp for specimen and premium list.
H. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

THE PIONEER TOBACCO FACTORY, Brooklyn, N. Y.
(See page 14.)

From the New York Weekly Tribune, Sept. 8, 1869.

THE COLLINS METAL WATCH.—The Collins Watch has reached us from Canton Mills, Maine. The Collins Watch has reached us from Canton Mills, Maine. The Collins Watch has reached us from Canton Mills, Maine.

OH!!!

C. G. Gunther's Sons, Waltham Watches.

502–504 BROADWAY,

Offer a Fresh Assortment of

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.,

AT REDUCED PRICES.

Velocipedes for Holiday Presents.

WOOD BROTHERS will offer the balance of their stock of Velocipedes, during the present month, at less than cost of manufacture. Comprising Two (2), Three (3), and Four (4) Wheel Machines, suitable for Children or Grown Persons, together with some adapted to carrying two persons.

These Velocipedes have never been equaled in this country or Europe for beauty, durability, or practical use in the Gell or on the Road.

This is a splendid opportunity to make a nefit as well as beautiful present at moderate cost.

WOOD BROTHERS, 590 Broadway.

Two Months

FREE! FREE!!

The Most Popular Juvenile Magazine in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Entirely Original and First Class.

All new subscribers for THE LITTLE CORPORAL for the next year, whose names and money are sent in before the last of December, will receive the November and December Nos. of this PAPER!

THE LITTLE CORPORAL has a larger Circulation than any other Juvenile Magazine in the world, and is better worth the price than any other magazine published.

Because of its immense circulation, we are enabled to furnish it at the low price of ONE DOLLAR A YEAR. Single number, 12 cents, or free to any one who will try to raise a club. Beautiful premiums for clubs.

Subscribe NOW. Back numbers can always be sent. Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL & CO., PUBLISHERS, CHICAGO, ILL.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER,

prepared and sold for 15 years past at Toledo, Ohio, is now manufactured and sold at wholesale at 49 New St., New York.—DOOLEY & BROWNE, Manufacturers.

BUYERS of watches at retail should be on their guard against buying watches represented as "American," and which are usually advertised in connection with the words "Oxoide," "Imitation Gold," and other words calculated to attract attention. Nine cases out of ten such watches are spurious, as our genuine movements are seldom, if ever, put into any thing but solid gold or silver cases. Large numbers of these worthless watches bear colorable imitations of our trademarks. To avoid imposition, buyers who do not know responsible jewelers should first procure a descriptive catalogue of the different styles of watches made by the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass. The catalogue contains, in addition, much useful information to watch-buyers. Address

ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents,
182 BROADWAY, New York.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY, Can not be Excelled.

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED,

and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, Conn.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 11 JOHN ST., N.Y.

SCHREIBER CORNETS and BAND INSTRUMENTS.—These splendid instruments are daily gaining favor in all sections of the country. One full premium is more than realized in practice. Superior in every respect to any other style in pounding it tenuity to its merits. Send for a Pamphlet.

J. SCHREIBER & SONS,
Manufacturers,
No. 1 Hudson St., N.Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE FAMILY MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides; and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Liberal terms. Circular Free. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
Send for Price-List. Baltimore, Md.

Holiday Presents.—A suitable Present is a Merrchaum Pipe or Holder, Cigar or Cane, of the best workmanship, large variety, at manufacturers' prices, 91 Nassau street, Johnson & Bros., late Dr. Ivory & Johnson, cor. John. Formerly 52 Wall. Send for Circular & Price-List. P.O. Box 6734.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,

and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

We are AGENTS for all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

Freeman & Burr,

MERCHANT

CLOTHIERS,

138 & 140 FULTON St.,

NEW YORK,

INVITE ATTENTION to their magnificent stock of Men's and Boys' Clothing. It is of unparalleled extent and variety, made up in strict accordance with prevailing styles from the most fashionable materials, and for novelty of design and excellence in workmanship can not be surpassed.

OVERCOATS for all seasons, $8 to $50.

SUITS for all occasions and occupations, $12 to $60.

BOYS' SUITS for all ages, $6 to $20.

ORDERS from any part of the Country promptly filled. Perfect Fitting guaranteed in all cases by our NEW SYSTEM FOR SELF-MEASUREMENT, of which hundreds avail themselves, ordering direct from us with entire satisfaction.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASUREMENT, Samples of Goods, and Price-List, sent free on application.

EPILEPSY or FITS.

FITS.—A sure cure for this distressing complaint is now made known in a Treatise on Fits by—SENT FREE—a Victim who was cured by a Self-Preparation, published by Dr. O. PARKER FITS.—HOOPER, 1164 Broadway, New York City, FITS.—by him in such a providential manner that FITS.—he can not conscientiously refuse to make FITS.—it known, as it has cured every body who FITS.—has used it for Fits, never having failed in FITS.—a single case. The ingredients may be obFITS.—tained of any druggist. Address, for FITS.—sending a copy and Address Dr. O. PARKER FITS.—Brown, No. 21 Grand Street, Jersey City, FITS.—N. J., inclosing stamp; six copies, three FITS.—stamps.

A SUPERB JOURNAL.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, a 16-page weekly journal—the largest of the kind in the world—full of superb illustrations. Has the largest circulation and is the most frequently read in the world devoted to Invention, Mechanics, Manufactures, Art, Science, Architecture, and General Industry.

In addition to contributions from able and popular writers, popular Lectures on Science will also be published; and it will be the constant study of the Editors to present all subjects relating to the Arts and Sciences in PLAIN, PRACTICAL, and POPULAR language, so that all may profit and understand.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:—$3 00 a Year; $1 50 for Six Months; $1 for Four Months.

To Clubs of Ten and upward the subscription is only $2 50 per annum each.

Specimen Copies will be sent gratis.

MUNN & CO., Publishers,
37 Park Row, New York.

HOW TO GET PATENTS.—A pamphlet of full advice in Inventions. Free.

Calistoga Cognac.

A pure California Brandy, of superior flavor. Recommended for Medicinal purposes by Dr. J. R. Nichols, Analytical Chemist, New York, and S. Dana Hayes, Boston.

Druggists and the Trade supplied.

S. BRANNAN & CO., 64 Broad Street, New York.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Burglars who are using it detect-

Holiday Goods

OF

REAL VALUE,

AT UNION ADAMS & CO.

PATENT MERINO VESTS.
PATENT MERINO DRAWERS.
FINE WOOL VESTS.
FINE WOOL DRAWERS.
SCARLET CASSIMERE VESTS.

CASHMERE AND CLOTH GLOVES.
CALF AND BUCK GLOVES.
KID AND DOGSKIN GLOVES.
CASTOR AND WOOL GLOVES.
KID AND CALF MITTENS.

BALMORAL STOCKINGS.
PATENT MERINO HOSIERY.
FINE WOOL STOCKINGS.
BLACK AND FANCY HOSE.
CASHMERE STOCKINGS.

SHIRTS, COLLARS, CUFFS.
TIES, STOCKS, SCARFS.
SUSPENDERS, ELASTICS.
GENTS' DRESSING CASES.
UMBRELLAS, CANES.

An Extensive and Superior Variety of Serviceable Goods at

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

No. 637 Broadway.

Largest Literary Folio in America.

MESSRS. BRADLEY, TROWER, & TALBOT, publishers of the AMERICAN UNION,

take pleasure in announcing that with the issue of their opening number, the Fourth Volume, 1870, and now for sale by all newsdealers throughout the country, the same appeared.

Enlarged to 32 Long Columns, equal to

46 Full Quarto Columns of the ordinary FORTY-COLUMN, EIGHT-PAGE, SIX-CENT WEEKLIES. It is the largest weekly in the universe of this "POPULAR FIRESIDE JOURNAL." But all its broad columns are filled with the MAGNIFICENT of the most INTENSE INTEREST. Most of the stories published in

AMERICAN UNION

are

COMPLETE IN ONE NUMBER,

though a short serial, together with

A Series of Startling Adventures, more or less connected, occasionally diversify its pages.

The first number of the enlarged paper contains the opening chapters of an

INTENSELY THRILLING STORY,

by a well-known popular writer, together with SIX OTHER CAPITAL STORIES, COMPLETE IN ONE NUMBER, and the usual thrilling variety of SPORTS, ADVENTURES, WIT AND HUMOR, MISCELLANY, &c., &c., the whole forming the Cheapest and Handsomest Paper for a Week.

☞ No Advance in the Price. ☜

6 cts. Single Copies; $2 50 per Year.

Sold by all Newsdealers, or sent by BRADLEY, on receipt of subscription price, by

ELLIOTT, THOMAS, & TALBOT, Publishers,
Boston, Mass.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

Depot, 811 Washington Street, New York.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Laws of Life," "Jesus of Nazareth," &c. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Dore, Delacroix, Durham, &c. Engraved. Elegantly printed on tinted paper. 8vo. Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Full Gilt, $4 00.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 200 elegant Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00.

DU CHAILLU'S THREE JUVENILE WORKS. Illustrated. 3 vols. Cloth, $3 75 each.

LOST IN THE JUNGLE.
WILD LIFE UNDER THE EQUATOR.
STORIES OF THE GORILLA COUNTRY.

THE PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LIFE of the Proprietor of Man and Nature to the Ancient and Authentic Religion of the Gibbs. By Rev. Abiel Abbot, Author of "Type Sets and Its Loving Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Church and the World." With Additional Chapters and 103 Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By Charles Lanman. Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "Adventures of an Angler," "Haw-ho-noo, or the Seven Cenes of London," &c. With 167 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $3 00.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: His Life and Teachings. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Laws of Life," "Old Testament Shadows of New Testament Truths," &c. Illustrated by Doré, and Particular Descriptions of the Plates. By Rev. Abiel Abbot. With Designs by Doré, Delacroix, Perne, and others. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
80 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 680.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

JACK-IN-THE-BOX.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1870.

THE NEW YEAR.

THE new year opens with the world outwardly at peace, except in Cuba and Paraguay. At home, the administration of General GRANT, which began with such high hopes, is stronger in public confidence than ever. The eager expectations of "a splendid administration" may have been shattered; for to complete the victory after a civil tempest, to encourage the return of industry to its proper channels, and to pay the debt are not precisely "splendid," although the most necessary policy. Those who anticipated splendor meant probably annexation. It was their hope that Canada and the West Indies would fall under our control. That is, perhaps, still their hope. It would not be surprising if President GRANT himself should expect or wish to signalize his administration by an extension of the national domain. Perhaps it has occurred to him that in some honorable way Canada might fall to us out of the Alabama complication. Perhaps he has supposed that Spain, no longer suspicious after the release of the gun-boats, might not be unwilling to think of selling Cuba.

But whatever the President's hopes or wishes may be, his character and his conduct equally show that the country has nothing to expect but what is most fair, most reasonable, and most patriotic. After ten months' strictest observation of General GRANT in his great office, for which it was alleged that, because a good soldier he might be, he was certainly not fitted, his sturdy honesty, his natural rectitude of feeling, his remarkable sagacity and quick apprehension, have impressed the country with a profound conviction that the public welfare is peculiarly safe in his hands, and that the trust as President LINCOLN was trusted, and as few other Presidents have been. His Cabinet, although not composed of party leaders, is evidently a body of wise counselors; and General GRANT would not be where he is if he were not capable of selecting around advisers of following good counsels. Undoubtedly the general feeling is that the Administration has no other purpose than the public good, and that the character of its members is an earnest of its devotion to that object.

During General GRANT'S Presidency the Union will be wholly restored, equal rights secured, the debt greatly reduced, taxation diminished, and the foreign questions satisfactorily adjusted. These results are foreshadowed by the experience of this year, and without transient exuberance certainly are entitled to the "splendor" enough to any Administration. Yet to increase the national territory is always a popular policy. Unquestionably Mr. SEWARD believes that he will be as gratefully remembered for acquiring Alaska as for defending freedom in California and Kansas. And, however inevitable the extension of our limits may be, the addition of a population foreign in race, language, and traditions of every kind is not an unmixed blessing. The consciousness of this fact evidently subdues the popular impulse that demands annexation. Formerly the impulse seemed more positive, for annexation was the political policy of a faction to strengthen slavery. Consequently, it was not the normal play. And, we repeat, if increase of territory is to be added to the trophies of the GRANT Administration, it will be in the most honorable and satisfactory manner.

Abroad, there is not only peace between the great states, but there is an especially friendliness toward us. If it is to be explained by the proved power of this country and certain accruing reputation elsewhere, that is by no means to be considered as a shrewdness which we did not conciliate other nations, and that we have not always avoided entanglements in international relations as any foreign government. The Christmas sun shines upon the English war steamer bringing ex-rebels to America the body of a noted American who had made both countries his home; while the last known act was the beloved act of sending friends during our struggle in a conspicuous manner of the British Government, which modified at our wish its old attitude of vigilance. In France LOUIS NAPOLEON speaks us fair. Spain sees that we are friendly. Germany also allows expatriation at our request. Austria gives her hand to us in freeing her schools from ecclesiastical control. Russia is our ally, and little Denmark, unwilling to be deceived, waits to see that our plighted faith be fulfilled.

So friendly and full of promise opens the new year. But for us its chief glory is that it dawns not only upon the Union restored, but consecrated to equal liberty and pledged to its defense. If any where in the land—in Texas, in Georgia, in Mississippi—the old tyranny asserts itself to abuse a single friendless citizen, the power of the whole is bound for his protection. Let us make that the American practice as well as the American principle. Let the cabin of the most unfortunate and forlorn of our brethren feel our protecting hand—feel that they are to have an honest chance to rise as men out of the brutishness into which we suffered them to be trampled, and they will indeed feel that the light of a new year shines upon their long night, and that they hear, as the Syrian shepherds heard, the divine gospel: "Peace on earth: good-will to men."

EDWIN M. STANTON.

SINCE he left the War Department the health of Mr. STANTON has been so impaired that no body could have been very much surprised by the news of his death. But there was no patriotic household in the land whose Christmas was not saddened by it, and which did not feel the singular felicity of the President's words in announcing the event—words that should be carved upon Mr. STANTON'S tomb. "He was unceasing in his labors; earnest and fearless in the assumption of responsibilities necessary to his country's success; respected by all good men, and feared by wrong-doers." A whole epitaph for a public man need not be written, nor truer words spoken of Mr. STANTON. How true are they that there was not an honorable American who did not feel that the highest praise of the dead Secretary was the vulgar and futile abuse of the New York World, poured out unceasingly during his life-time. Had Mr. STANTON devoted his great powers and tireless energy to perpetuating slavery and destroying the government, the World would have saluted him as a constitutional hero and a Christian gentleman.

Mr. STANTON'S services to the country during the war, like Mr. LINCOLN'S, like Governor ANDREW'S, like those of all the chief men of that time, are indefinable. It is only, as he knows, indeed, that there were not others who would have been as indomitable and efficient in the most trying and laborious of offices, but it will always be historical that his administration of his office was an inspiration to the whole country, and that every head was bared and every hand surer for the consciousness of the unquenchable energy at the centre. The words of one such intelligent friend was a thing immeasurable. Happily among the most faithful and eminent of the soldiers and civilians of that tremendous hour the country will not divide its gratitude. Its love and respect unite them. What Mr. LINCOLN thought of Mr. STANTON is well known. How fondly Mr. STANTON himself honored him the country has seen. They were worthy of each other, and the latest generation of faithful Americans will associate them in hallowed remembrance.

To the salvation of the Government Mr. STANTON gave every thought, every power, and a thought nor an act, however peremptory, was sullied with a suspicion of selfishness. In so vast and important an office mistakes were inevitable, but it was not culpable. Such men at such times are tested by purity of motive and by honesty of purpose. And they will not be forgotten that the man who, in a post like that of Mr. STANTON, is "earnest and fearless in the assumption of responsibilities necessary for his country's success," inevitably outruns a limited sympathy, and appeals to the general reason. He is in no sense a politician, and chides and passions of every kind to be invested with the least personal glamour. His immediate friends, therefore, are those whose sagacity of aspect which time will touch tenderly and soften into truth.

Mr. STANTON was greatest upon great occasions. With personal urbanity and magnetism he would have been a great leader of men. In the whole hour of our danger, when the President was assassinated by the spirit that sought to turn this country into a slave-pen, the spirit that would have made the name of GRANT as a butcher, and that now spits at STANTON as a bloated blackguard, the Secretary readied the heart of the people and showed us all that our Government, when intrusted to such men—and only then—is superior to every adverse fate. Besides the soldiers who died upon the field, the three most illustrious victims of the war are LINCOLN, BOOTH, and STANTON. Of the first two, all are among the most famous and honored Americans. ANDREW, STANTON, LINCOLN—the country, the world, knows them as the great Americans. In their characters we read the prophecy of our career. By their deaths let us be bound even more solemnly to fulfil it.

JONATHAN AND JOHN.

THE statement of the American view of the Alabama controversy made by Secretary FISH in his September dispatch to Mr. MOTLEY is clear and comprehensive, and of excellent temper. It tells what is certainly an old story in a way which shows that the feeling of the United States is still fresh and warm, and in a way also which will perhaps show our friends in England, if they choose to see it, that STANTON'S speech, the exact nature of "the wrong" done, still is felt in this country. A letter to the Tribune from one of the best known and most faithful of our English friends during the war, Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, written upon the receipt of the President's message, expresses his inability, and that of all our other English friends, to understand what we mean by alleging unfriendliness upon the part of England at the time of the rebellion. He states many of the facts which were mentioned by Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH in his speech at Manchester summer, and insists that, although a party in England was unfriendly, we ought not to call their sympathy the English feeling.

The dispatch of Secretary FISH is as good a reply as could be made to this inquiry and wonder of Mr. HUGHES. What the people of this country have always felt and still feel is this—that although England may, of course, as a sovereign power, assume a neutral attitude as her pleasure, yet that the circumstances under which she did so, in this case, necessarily implied an unfriendliness toward one of the belligerents which was incompatible with fair neutrality; and that the facts prove that fair neutrality was not observed. To declare the rebels equal belligerents with the United States after a single act of war like that at Fort Sumter—to use the double delay of the declaration—as this case it, despite remonstrance, upon the very day of Mr. ADAMS'S arrival, and all this without any necessity whatever, whether measured by the conduct of all other nations under similar circumstances, by the precedents of Great Britain herself, or by common reason—all this was unfriendly, and however technically excused, can not be construed otherwise than as unfriendly.

This attitude was the cause, was an immense encouragement of the rebellion. It raised a domestic insurrection into a civil war, of which England became virtually the maritime ally. The destruction of our commerce and of our commercial marine, by a belligerent who had its ships and ports and no prize court, is therefore immediately and justly attributable to this eager and unprecedented and, upon its face, unfriendly recognition. Then, in consequence of the unfriendliness which such a recognition implies, we say, and Mr. HUGHES says it is true, "England might have stopped the Alabama and didn't." Now if her municipal law was defective, and she had been friendly, Parliament would have amended it. Instead of that, however, a member of the House of Commons exults in the defective law, and Parliament cheers.

The people of the United States certainly did not suppose that Mr. BRIGHT cheered, nor Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, nor Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, nor Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, nor Professor CAIRNES, of whose masterly book Mr. HUGHES makes such just mention, that the official organs of England were the Ministry and Parliament; and the Ministry, in hot haste, had issued the unprecedented, unfriendly, and fatal proclamation of the ravages of the Alabama. It was a liberal Ministry. But Lord PALMERSTON, its chief, was notoriously unfriendly; and Earl RUSSELL, its Foreign Secretary, had publicly prejudged the case against us; while Mr. GLADSTONE was, as Mr. HUGHES confesses, "not friendly." Certainly fairly complain that the loyal people of the United States regarded Parliament, the Ministry, the action of the Government, and the official voice of the press as England, rather than the workmen, whose conduct was truly noble, and the few magnanimous men, like HUGHES, whose faith in us did not falter, and all of whom we most gladly recognized? When we say that England was unfriendly, we speak of the action of the Government and to the speeches of our English friends at the time denounced it. We do not say that in consequence of England's unfriendliness she was an unfair neutral, we point to the Alabama, and say that she might have been stopped, and Mr. HUGHES himself says: "No serious statesman or writer has maintained the contrary since the excitement of the war has cooled down."

Now we do not ask for moral damages. We do not ask that England shall apologize for pretending a act of sovereignty. We simply assert that the circumstances attending that exercise are a cardinal consideration in the estimate of her friendship. And we are sure that any fair Englishman will not deny it. But such an Englishman certainly ought not to say that he does not understand what we mean by asserting that England was unfriendly. If the United States had declared Ireland an equal belligerent with England after the rising of O'BRIEN'S rising, would Mr. HUGHES have thought it unfriendly? If not, he has a right to be surprised when we consider the British action so. It is very true, as in these columns we have often said, that the war in this country was terrible, and that there was good reason for a foreigner to doubt the issue. But that is not the kind of consideration upon which neutral action proceeds. That contemplates actual facts, not surmises and probabilities.

Meanwhile, now that this Government thinks the time has come when negotiations may be resumed, we hope that, if England is of the same mind, we shall state frankly what we wish. Lord CLARENDON, in writing to Mr. THORNTON of Secretary FISH'S dispatch, says, with perfect courtesy and with great force, that as the method of settlement proposed by the United States Government through Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, which was unreservedly accepted by the English Government, although against a decided public opinion, was subsequently rejected by that of the United States, the former can not make any new proposition nor run the risk of another unsuccessful negotiation until it knows upon what basis the United States would like to treat. This is not unreasonable, but it is unavailing. The correspondence has now reached a point at which the two nations are like the French army at Fontenoy, politely bowing, and entreating the enemy to fire first. The renewed correspondence brings the negotiation no nearer. Mr. FISH virtually says to Lord CLARENDON: "If you choose to have the question open with all its contingencies, we are content." This is, of course, skillful diplomacy, but there is a better, because a friendlier way.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

MR. WELLS, in his very able and elaborate report submitted to Congress, estimates the average adverse balance of indebtedness of the United States to foreign countries at about two hundred and ten millions of dollars per annum. The particulars of this amount are chiefly the following:

Excess of imports over exports.....	$78,666,738
Obligations for interest.....	80,000,000
Excess of freights in foreign vessels.....	30,000,000
Expenditures of Americans abroad	20,000,000
	$207,666,738

To meet this annual balance he states that, when the present abnormal condition of our cost of production in the United States, there remains but one resource, viz.: "to remit certain kinds of indebtedness—visible, invisible, or corporate." "This process," he adds, "is undoubtedly adopted, and goes on month after month, and year after year, without questioning, thus far, any marked disturbance in the trade and commerce of the country."

Assuming that these figures are correct, which appears to us to be the case from a careful examination of the report, and the conclusion is inevitable that this process must be stopped either voluntarily or compulsorily.

If the people of the United States are willing to contribute to the profits which foreign cousins to possess themselves of Mr. WELLS'S estimates, will know that they can encourage such imprudence by increasing their own profits. The 4th of December number of the London Economist, regarded in financial circles as a high authority, is afraid that speculative and other activities are considered as fully supplied. The process adopted by Mr. BOUTWELL of purchasing our bonds with gold, but not selling gold, may reverse from all sources exceeds largely our expenditures, has unquestionably given to the United States temporarily a full share of foreign gold, and it will be very difficult to decide when this process will come to an end through foreign investments; but not long, we apprehend, but foreigners, will be able to discover from this report that our enormous receipts of internal revenue are collected in currency which is our whole industry, and that our customs duties are made large through unparalleled extravagance and improvidence.

It is said that if we attempt to restrain our voluntary imports foreign manufacturers will press them upon us by underselling, therefore, but it is well known that since the raid in September large losses have been made upon consigned goods, and that the foreigner is now accustomed to the new order of things. Mr. WELLS'S showing, that this trade can not be repeated on a large scale except with the certainty of ruinous loss, will be met with satisfaction that orders for the purchase of foreign manufactures have been placed with more caution than usual during the past few months, for a considerable diminution in our imports.

The Secretary of the Treasury, however, estimates our receipts from customs for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1871, at very nearly the same rate as for the last fiscal year and for the one now commencing. The interest of attempting to check this ruinous policy of excessive imports, seems disposed to allow it to proceed, in order that the public income of ultimately placing a four and a half per cent. loan upon the markets of Europe in lieu of our present securities.

An ambitious banking-house, with branches at Frankfort, Paris, London, San Francisco, and other towns, has been established, has undoubtedly created the impression that if the Treasury can obtain from Congress the authority to hypothecate bonds drawing that rate of interest, money could be temporarily borrowed upon them to clear the market of the Five-Twenties—floated at par, or at par value at any time—so that thus we should be in a condition to offer the new loan at some rate under par to capitalists in Europe. The same telegram from Frankfort showing uneasiness among the holders of our six per cents was due probably to discussion pronounced by the Frankfort branch of the house in question on this point.

No well-grounded hope of changing the loan can exist until the country has developed its power under other circumstances. We must first reform our currency, stop excessive importations, and establish upon the whole industry upon a sound and profitable basis. We will then command the confidence of the world. All intelligent travelers abroad are informed by the leading bankers of London and the Continent that to begin to pay off our bonds while our currency is depreciated is beginning at the wrong end; the opinion is general among them that we should commence with lopping off our excessive issues of paper. When it is considered that our paper-money still stands at about seven hundred millions over and above the three per cent. certificates, and that the latter amount to over fifty-seven millions, and are convertible, to the extent of over forty-five millions, the reserve of our national banks, it can not be doubted that the whole total is momentarily convertible.

In our recent article upon specie payments it will be recollected that we expressed the opinion that, although the Attorney-General, in a recent letter, had stated that it was the duty of the Secretary to refer to special payments, yet it was apparent from the tone of his letter that no steps in that direction had been decided upon by the TREASURY. BOUTWELL'S Report clearly shows that the policy of placing a new loan is expected to precede that event. The time for returning to specie payments is thus indicated in the Report:

"So long as it is necessary to pay for merchandise imported by the transfer of previously-held or other evidences of indebtedness to other countries, so long it will be impracticable to resume specie payments. When the products of industry exported shall be equal substantially to the products of the industry imported, there will be no demand for specie for export, except what may arise from the interchange that our bonds held abroad are sent home, sold in our markets, and the money received for them. When the credit of the country shall be fully established in Europe, and there shall be no balance of our ability or disposition to meet all our obligations, specie payments will be made to a large extent held by merchants and bankers will be transferred in anticipation for permanent investment. When the change shall have taken place, we probably shall be in condition best seen home under the influence of political or financial disturbances in Europe which we have not seen, when, as a concurring fact, our exports, exclusive of public securities, shall be equal to our imports. Such movements may be resumed without even a temporary embarrassment to the business of the country."

The continued sale of gold and purchase of bonds in this market by the Treasury arise from the effort to carry out this scheme, by which the European capitalist is to be accredited with the power of this country. But when he shall have, as he will from the MR. WELLS'S showing, that our internal revenues are collected with ruinous effects upon our industry, and that the gold applied to the purchase of the bonds is a contribution derived from our imprudence in imports, and that these and other follies are paid for by an export of our securities, amounting to two hundred and fifty millions of dollars per year, payable in gold, the delusion must vanish.

The loss incurred by the people of the United States by pressing down the price of gold without any corresponding reduction of the currency, and with the certainty of a further advance to a price which shall conform to our paper circulation, is immensely larger than the whole amount of the sales which have been made by which the public debt has been reduced. The loss falls most heavily upon the producers of grain, as the foreign buyer pays for it in gold, which the seller changes into currency. The loss to the farmer prevents his payments for debts incurred to local merchants, and thus in turn fail in their payments to the jobber and importer. Throughout the country goods are marked down in sympathy with the fall in gold, but no expedients can animate trade while the value of gold continues. The policy is favorable to the foreigner who sells his products now held in excess in Europe, and obtains payment in our securities, and who at the same time buys our grain at a price below the cost of our bottom times. The planter in the South, enjoying the advantage of a staple not produced in excess, and of a limited supply even of more than usual strength, deals out his crop of cotton with much caution, in pursuance of an extensive combination, but the loss is moderate compared with that of Northern agriculturalists: but the expectation is quite general among them, as we learn from correspondents of the press, that gold will rise, and thus enable them to dispose with greater advantage of the crops which, it appears, absolutely require to be sent now purchasing. The depression which now prevails in all foreign manufacturing districts abroad may ultimately relieve the difficulty which the South should deliberately consider. But we do not propose to discuss the question.

We feel assured from the well-known high character of the Secretary of the Treasury that he has no motive but that of the welfare of the country. The time is ample for maturing a plan of Congressional action which will present a strong reaction in prices, and the question of suffering hereafter when that reaction shall be followed by the depression which must attend a return toward specie payments if that return shall be deferred.

The three per cent. certificates, which are held as a reserve by the banks, constitute the portion of the currency—if currency it can be called—upon which the proposed reduction in amount may well be employed. If they were cut off at the rate of two millions a month, without substituting any form of paper in their place, this decision to diminish their quantity would have great effect in preventing the reaction that otherwise is inevitable. If accompanied with the declaration on the part of Congress that the legal tenders after, say five or six years, shall not be tenderable for debts, we should be placed on the road to ultimate safety.

The national banks—relieved as they might be in that case from some portion of taxation—would be induced by these measures to hold on to a part of their circulation, if not convertible for gold interest; but if this is doubtful, they should be compelled by law to do so to the extent necessary, so that the resumption of specie or gold to meet the emergency would certainly accumulate in their coffers.

Contraction such as this would pay the regard which is due to the debtor interest, and would not only save us from the larger portion of the annual debt of $130,000,000 we are now incurring, but would secure what is the most important object now before us—a return to specie payments on the strength of a new gradual improvement it would encourage in the condition of the people.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

DURING the debate upon the Georgia bill a very pertinent question was asked by MR. DAWES, of Massachusetts—a question which has been frequently asked before, and which it has been hitherto. MR. VOORHEES, a gentleman somewhat associated in the public mind with the Democratic contingent doctrines of rebellion, asked in his speech by what authority the United States directed a State to organize its Legislature in a particular manner. Upon MR. DAWES inquired whether the Constitution, in requiring the United States to guarantee a republican form of government, did not require the maintaining such a form. MR. VOORHEES did not give a direct reply, but asked whether the organization of a State Legislature justified armed interference by the United States. MR. DAWES replied that it depended upon the circumstances of the case. They might be such as to require the National Government, with all its functions and capacities, to act. But the gentleman thought that the judiciary was the proper resort.

While slavery was the controlling interest of the Government, constitutional law was always of course the constitutional clause cited by MR. DAWES was not quoted. It was too search-ing and irrepressible. The whole system upon which had been inculcated as of the very essence of the Constitution, that a State had supreme power over its own domestic policy, and, therefore, prevented the political anti-slavery reform beginning and ending with the declaration that the United States Government possessed the moral to put an end to slavery in every State. But it was felt that to do this would be too heroic a method. The people were not prepared for such sophistry, and was wholly unprepared. Shall the United States maintain the republican form which they have guaranteed to a State? That was a question which, under the circumstances, was so awful, that nobody dared seriously to ask it. The obligation was felt, but it was felt to be an action of the fathers interpreting the Constitution, and to determine that slavery was recognized in accordance with republican government. Therefore, regarding it as the protector of slavery, the Abolitionists rejected the Constitution.

Indeed, the event had more than justified the declaration of ALEXANDER HAMILTON in the Federalist, that the guarantee of a republican government usurpation might rest its crest in each State and trample upon the liberties of the people. The National Government could legally do nothing more than forbid its encroachments with indignation and regret. It adopted it, but, notwithstanding its necessarily moral power, at the end of seventy years usurpation had destroyed half of the Republic, set up a republican government, and the national authority, at the hands of the usurpers, favored them with all its force. The Republic was for the time the creation of the slavery question. But it could not be applied. Had it been seriously attempted the war would have begun then.

When the war ended, and the rebel States were to be reorganized, MR. SUMNER, with great propriety, urged that the claimed that this clause should be the corner-stone of reconstruction. And it was made so. By insisting upon the ratification of the amendments, and upon constitutions recognizing equal rights, the United States guarantee a republican government to each of the reorganized States. But any of those States proceed to overthrow that government the duty of Congress is clear. It is clear in the case of the rebel States, and as less so in all the others. If the people of New York should change their Constitution so as to make the executive power of the State hereditary in the heirs male of MR. PETER B. SWEENEY forever, and should disfranchise every man with blue eyes in the State, is it the duty of the United States Government merely to behold such "encroachments with indignation and regret," or to interfere? Is a republican government that it has guaranteed? This is a political, not a judicial, question. Yet such an act in New York would not be more an overthrow of republican government than the methods of every old slave State. If the United States Government, in the case we suppose, would be bound to interfere in New York under the guarantee clause, not less was it bound to interfere ten years ago in Mississippi to establish the republican form which had really never existed there.

The object of the clause is evident. It is to secure the political supremacy of the Union. And this also is the urgent argument for the Fifteenth Amendment. The power of the United States to secure the guarantee was formerly exercised because the party of State sovereignty was supreme in the Government. But with the total interpretation of the Constitution as a bond of national union, not as the treaty of certain independent powers, comes the era of the assertion of the sovereignty of supervision which is essential to harmony. MR. VOORHEES speaks for the principle and practice that surrendered the Government to MR. DAWES for those that took possession of the Government with GENERAL GRANT. The words of the first are the dying echo of the fragile Union of the past; those of the second the prophecy of the true Union of the future.

NOTES.

THE Senate has virtually rejected the nomination of ATTORNEY-GENERAL HOAR to the Supreme Bench. The correspondent of the Times says, and undoubtedly it is true that the opposition is due to "a sense of the affronts which some Senators and Representatives have received at his hands. The correspondent adds, "He has no one to blame for his discomfiture but himself." This statement MR. HOAR has refused to be a mere party tool. When we heard, soon after his appointment, an authentic story of his reply to a Senator's application for a place, we foresaw the consequences. He was waited upon by a representative of the Senate, who asked him to remove A. and appoint B. "Gentlemen," he replied, "A. is a perfectly satisfactory officer. When you can show me that he is not, or can find a better man for the place, A. shall be removed." Of course MR. HOAR knew that a man who considers the public service before party interests is not an agreeable man to party managers, and he probably not expect to be confirmed for the nomination. We hope that a judge as able, learned, and upright, a Republican as steadfast upon the reconstructed conviction, a man of as spotless and lofty character may be found by the Senate to the place of which Judge ROAR is not thought to be a proper incumbent; and meanwhile it will be interesting to see whether a Senate that refuses to confirm MR. HOAR will confirm General SICKLES.

ANOTHER illustration of the charms of our civil service lately came to our knowledge. A thoroughly competent mechanic man, always a Democrat, was appointed a messenger in the Treasury Department. Upon his appointment he was waited upon by the Democratic committee—that is, by some of persons with private axes of interest to grind—and asked to appoint as subordinates certain Democratic partisans. "Certainly, gentlemen, when there are vacancies, I will see what can be done." "No, sir," was the reply; "appoint now and put in our men." "That, gentlemen, is impossible. My subordinates are honest, able, and faithful men. I don't know, nor care, what their politics are: nor should I appoint your friends because their politics are not only for their character and capacity." The next week his head dropped into the basket.

IT seems that it was the request of our Governor that the Fenian Senate negotiations should be resumed at Washington. The reason for the request, however, do not appear in the published correspondence. It is to be hoped that the British Government evident. But it may perhaps be assumed that the article in the London Times expressing a willingness to yield does not mean "inspired." It is difficult, however, to regard the Fenian question in any light that does not reflect upon our Minister in England. There is an inevitable impression arising from the transfer of the question that domestic Fenian influences are considered too seductive for American diplomacy. It is not easy to see, for instance, if the career of MR. REVERDY JOHNSON had not been just what it was: and it is certainly hard that MR. REVERDY should pay the penalty of MR. JOHNSON'S dinners. On the other hand, the power vested in that it is a subject of much interest; and as it could not be satisfactorily settled in England, it is but fair to try to settle it satisfactorily at home.

A VOLUME of the truest scholarship and completeness in its kind is the handsome quarto "Catalogue of the Collection of Engravings bequeathed to Harvard College by FRANCIS CALLEY GRAY: by LOUIS THIEK." (WELCH, BIGELOW, & CO.: Cambridge.) MR. GRAY was a gentleman of extraordinary knowledge and cultivated taste, and with a fortune so large that he could make both directly available to the public. MR. THIEK tells us that he went only and often to Europe, and gradually acquired this noble collection of engravings. They illustrate the history of art in every country and at all periods; and are not only remarkable for their completeness, but are often valuable in themselves for especial merits. The Gray Collection is, therefore, the result of the utmost intelligence and the richest opportunities; and as MR. THIEK, a gentleman of singular accomplishment in similar studies, was familiar with MR. GRAY'S wishes and plans, he has prepared, in accordance with MR. GRAY'S request, this remarkable Catalogue. It is undoubtedly one of the most thorough and satisfactory works of the kind ever written. It is a result not only of an exhausting study of all existing literature upon the subject, but of the most intelligent and constant personal observation. The monogram gallery and collection And as MR. THIEK has very wisely added a list of the works and published collections consulted by him, his Catalogue is an invaluable manual for every student of engraving. The price of a work of such thoroughness and high scholarship is necessarily great, and its appreciating audience must be small. But MR. THIEK may have the satisfaction of knowing that henceforth he will be a recognized authority in his department of intelligent study, and his book indispensable to every collector and student.

IS lately alluding to the State Fair at Macon, to which we were courteously invited as to a great feast of reunion and fraternity, and at which it was hoped that GENERAL GRANT and GENERAL LEE would appear in the renowned attitude of General Scott and General Gaines as 17—at the Philadelphia Johnsonian Convention, we said that we could hardly believe that the day for the United States was not displayed. But it seems that it was not only so, but more than so. The officers of the garrison at Macon sent a national flag to the Committee in charge with a request that it be raised. But the Committee—after a zealous debate—resolved not to raise the flag of their country because they did not wish to give the fair any political significance! What a beautiful compromise it would have been to display the flag of the United States and the flag of the rebellion of the United States! It was surely a comical feast of reunion at which the flag of the Union could not be shown for fear of hurting the feelings of the guests!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 20.—In the Senate a bill was introduced to authorize a company for constructing a ship canal between this country and Holland, under concessions from the Dutch Government. MR. SUMNER presented the more important bills introduced, was one in reference to the Alabama claims, another to equalize the tariff of raises of refined companies the liberty to import their sugars free of duty, also bills to abolish the franking privilege and to regulate labor in the Government service.

December 21.—In the Senate bill for the suppression of polygamy in Utah was reported. MR. SUMNER introduced a bill to repeal the test oath. A joint resolution was passed indemnifying loyal owners for property destroyed and appropriating $100,000 to meet during the war. The claims amount to $300,000. In the House a resolution was introduced by PENDLETON to make suitable arrangements for the reception of GENERAL LEE when he returns was agreed to. A resolution to provide cannon for the purpose of casting a statue of GENERAL SCOTT to be placed on the south terrace of the Treasury.

December 22.—In the Senate MR. SUMNER introduced a new bill for reconstruction in Virginia, which, he gave notice, he would call up on the 3d of January. A resolution was passed calling on the President for information in regard to the late MR. Peabody was elected a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society of London at Grant was referred. The President transmitted the report of the Commissioners, which had been called for by resolution. In the House the session was chiefly taken up with general debate, by Committee of the Whole, on various subjects. After the committee rose it was announced to the House that the Internal Revenue law, repealing the clause allowing street railway companies to add the government tax to the fare of passengers, and one companies the right to increase the fare to five cents. The House adjourned to January 10.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

On the 21st of December General Babcock, of the President's staff, who has been chief commissioner of the Georgia delegation, arrived at Washington with the bill for the reconstruction, and the results of his labors before the President and the Cabinet. On Wednesday last the Georgia Legislature, in regular session, takes possession of the bay and postmarks of Savannah, and on the 1st of January, at an annual salary of $2,000 in coin, with the privilege of purchasing at any time of the Bank of the United States. Every precaution for that actual possession has been taken by our Government, and every covering letter addressed to shortly be transmitted to the Senate.

It is said that the Administration cannot great excitement to have followed the announcement there of the death of Commodore Vanderbilt.

Despatches to the Cuban Junta at Nassau are reported to the effect that they have recognized.

The Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has reported Fort Gary, near the southern extremity of Lake Winnipeg, and a number of Generals Douglas's agents. The Provisional Government of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory have issued a Declaration of Independence, to the effect that the people, henceforth free from the control granted to the Hudson Bay Company, have a right to be independent, and that they will form a Government for themselves as subjects of the Dominion. They hold themselves ready to treat with Canada on the basis of this principle. Colonel Dennis, who organized the Indians in support of Governor M'Dougall, is said to have disbanded his forces.

FOREIGN NEWS.

IT is reported that the British man-of-war Iron Duke was accidentally wrecked while lying off Port Arthur to Malta, and Sir Stafford Northcote, formerly Secretary of India, and Sir Hugh Cairns, have declined to accept the vacant position.

The Fenian Senate probed, and will be introduced in the British Parliament. The object is to enable all loyal British subjects to divest themselves of national allegiance. The bill is stated to contain the germ of American naturalization.

The Monarch, with the remains of MR. Peabody, sailed on the first for this country.

In the Ecumenical Council the advocates of infallibility are reported to be losing ground.

A Republican Society has been discovered among the soldiers of the Paris garrison, and seventy-four of them have been arrested.

It is reported that General Sickles has submitted to the Spanish Government a project for securing the neutrality of ocean cables, to which scheme the British Government had previously given its approval.

"TOLL YE THE CHURCH-BELL SAD AND SLOW, AND TREAD SOFTLY AND SPEAK LOW, FOR THE OLD YEAR LIES A-DYING."

ARGUING THE POINT.—[SEE PAGE 27.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWELFTH. (Continued.)

"WHAT'S to be done now?" asked Arnold.

In the face of the storm, Anne answered without hesitation, "You must take a carriage, and drive."

"Drive? They told me it was three-and-twenty miles, by railway, from the station to my place—let alone the distance from this inn to the station."

"What does the distance matter? Mr. Brinkworth, you can't possibly stay here!"

A second flash of lightning crossed the window; the roll of the thunder came nearer. Even Arnold's good temper began to be a little ruffled by Anne's determination to get rid of him. He sat down with the air of a man who had made up his mind not to leave the house.

"Do you hear that?" he asked, as the sound of the thunder died away grandly, and the hard pattering of the rain on the window became audible once more. "If I ordered horses, do you think they would let me have them, in such weather as this? And, if they did, do you suppose the horses could face it on the moor? No, no, Miss Silvester—I am sorry to be in the way: but the train has gone, and the night and the storm have come. I have no choice but to stay here!"

Anne still maintained her own view, but less resolutely than before. "After what you have told the landlady," she said, "think of the embarrassment, the cruel embarrassment of our position, if you stop at the inn till to-morrow morning!"

"Is that all?" returned Arnold.

Anne looked up at him, quickly and angrily. No! he was quite unconscious of having said any thing that could offend her. His rough masculine sense broke its way unconsciously through all the little feminine subtleties and delicacies of his companion, and looked the position practically in the face for what it was worth, and no more. "Where's the embarrassment?" he asked, pointing to the bedroom door. "There's your room, all ready for you. And here's the sofa, in this room, all ready for me. If you had seen the places I have slept in at sea—!"

She interrupted him, without ceremony. The places he had slept in, at sea, were of no earthly importance. The one question to consider, was the place he was to sleep in that night.

"If you must stay," she rejoined, "can't you get a room in some other part of the house?"

But one last mistake in dealing with her, in her present nervous condition, was left to make—and the innocent Arnold made it. "In some other part of the house?" he repeated, testingly. "The landlady would be scandalized. Mr. Bishopriggs would never allow it!"

She rose, and stamped her foot impatiently on the floor. "Don't joke!" she exclaimed. "This is no laughing matter." She paced the room excitedly. "I don't like it! I don't like it!"

Arnold looked after her, with a stare of boyish wonder.

"What puts you out so?" he asked. "Is it the storm?"

She threw herself on the sofa again. "Yes," she said, shortly. "It's the storm."

Arnold's inexhaustible good-nature was at once roused to activity again.

"Shall we have the candles," he suggested, "and shut the weather out?" She turned irritably on the sofa, without replying. "I'll promise to go away the first thing in the morning!" he went on. "Do try and take it easy—and don't be angry with me. Come! come! you wouldn't turn a dog out, Miss Silvester, on such a night as this?"

He was irresistible. The most sensitive woman breathing could not have accused him of falling toward her in any single essential of consideration and respect. He wanted tact, poor fellow—but who could expect him to have learned that always superficial (and sometimes dangerous) accomplishment, in the life he had led at sea? At the sight of his honest, pleading face, Anne recovered possession of her genius and sweeter self. She made her excuses for her irritability with a grace that enchanted him. "Well! have a pleasant evening of it yet!" cried Arnold, in his hearty way—and rang the bell.

"THE PONY SHOOK HIS DARLING LITTLE HEAD, AND DASHED THROUGH IT."

The bell was hung outside the door of that Patmos in the wilderness—otherwise known as the head-waiter's pantry. Mr. Bishopriggs (employing his brief leisure in the occlusion of his own apartment) had just made a good deal of fun of her and comforting liquor called "toddy" in the language of North Britain, and was just lifting it to his lips, when the summons of the bell invited him to leave his grog.

"Haud yer screamin' tongue!" cried Mr. Bishopriggs, addressing the bell through the door. "Ye're waur than a woman when ye ainese be ill!"

The bell—like the woman—went on again. Mr. Bishopriggs, equally pertinacious, went on with his toddy.

"Ay! ay! ye may e'en ring yer heart out—but ye won't part a Scotchman from his glass. It's maybe the end of their dinner they'll be wantin'. Sir Fairrick can't an at fair begin-ning of it, and puir the colleegy, like the auld deevil he is!" The bell rang for the third time. "Ay! ay! ring away! I dout ye're gaun the clemon's little better than a belly-god—there's a scandalous haste to comfort the carnal part o' him in a this place. He knows nothing o' wine," added Mr. Bishopriggs, on whose mind Arnold's discovery of the watered sherry still dwelt unpleasantly.

The lightning quickened, and lit the sitting-room horribly with its lurid glare; the thunder rolled nearer and nearer over the black waste of the moor. Arnold had just raised his hand to ring for the fourth time, when the inevitable knock was heard at the door. It seemed to say "come in." The immutable laws of Bishopriggs had decided that a second ring was unnecessary. Storm or no storm, the second knock came—and then, and not till then, the sage appeared, with the dish of untasted "college" in his hand.

"Candles!" said Arnold.

Mr. Bishopriggs set the "collops" (in the language of England, minced meat) upon the table, lit the candles at the mantle-piece, faced about, with the fire of recent toddy flaming in his nose, and waited for further orders before he went back to his second glass. Anne declined to return to the dinner. Arnold ordered Mr. Bishopriggs to close the shutters, and to send in the fine hymsell.

He looks grave, and smells greasy," he said to Anne, turning over the collops with a spoon. "I won't be ten minut a dining. Will you have some tea?"

Anne declined again.

Arnold tried her once more. "What shall we do to get through the evening?"

"Do what you like," she answered, resignedly.

Arnold's mind was suddenly illuminated by an idea.

"I have got it!" he exclaimed. "We've the time to our cabin-passengers used to kill it at sea. He looked over his shoulder at Mr. Bishopriggs. "Waiter! bring a pack of cards."

"What's that ye're wantin'?" asked Mr. Bishopriggs, doubting the evidence of his own senses.

"A pack of cards," repeated Arnold.

"Cairds?" echoed Mr. Bishopriggs. "A pack o' cairds? The deevil's allegories in the devil's own colors—red and black! I wunna execute yer order. For yer ain soul's sake, I wunna do it. He's ye lived to your time o' life, and are ye no' awaur that the auld's seendulous o' gude bin' wi' the cairds?"

"Just as you please," returned Arnold. "You will find me an indulgent employer when I get a useful folly of feeling a waiter."

"Does that mean that they're bent on the cairds?" asked Mr. Bishopriggs, suddenly betraying sign of worldly anxiety in his look and manner.

"Yes—that means I am bent on cards."

"I tak' up my testimony against 'em—but I'm no' telling ye that I wunna lay my hand on 'em if I like. What do they say in my country? 'Him that will to Coupar, maun to Coupar.' And what do they say in your country? 'Needs must when the devil drives.' With that excellent reason for turning back on his own principles, Mr. Bishopriggs shuffled out of the room to fetch the cards.

The dresser-drawer in the pantry contained a choice selection of miscellaneous objects—a pack of cards among them. In search of anything for the cards, the wary hand of the head-waiter came in contact with a morsel of crumpled-up paper. He drew it out, and examined the letter which he had picked up in the sitting-room some hours since.

"Ay! ay! I'll do weel, I trow, to look at this while my mind's runnin' on it," said Mr. Bishopriggs. "The cairds may e'en feed hungry to the parlor by other hands than mine."

He found the cards—the cards (as he had by second in command, closed the pantry door, and carefully smoothed out the crumpled sheet of paper on which the two letters were written. This done, he trimmed his candle, and began with the letter in ink, which occupied the first three pages of the sheet of note-paper.

It ran thus:

"WINDYGATES HOUSE, August 12, 1868.

"GEOFFREY DELAMAYN,—I have waited in the hope that you would have ridden over from your brother's place, and see me—and I have waited in vain. Your conduct to me is cruelly unfair; I will bear it no longer. Consider! in your own interests, consider—before you drive the miserable woman who has trusted you to despair. You have promised me marriage by all that is sacred. I claim your promise. It matters not one thing less than to be what you vowed I should be—what I have waited all this weary time to be—what I am, in the sight of Heaven, your wedded wife. Lady Lundie gives a lawn-party to-day on the 15th. I know you have been asked—I expect you to accept her invitation. If I don't see you, I won't answer for what may happen. My mind is made up to endure this suspense no longer. Oh, Geoffrey, remember the past! Be faithful—be just—to your lawful wife,

"ANNE SILVESTER."

Mr. Bishopriggs paused. His commentary on the correspondence, so far, was simple enough. He'd clean forgot the bell—he ready to be a gentleman!" He ran his eye over the second letter, on the fourth page of the paper, and added, cynically, "A little scrubber (in parlors) from Piccadelmon to the leddy! The way o' the warld, Sirs! from the time o' Adam downwards, the way o' the warld!"

The second letter ran thus:

"DEAR ANNE,—Just called to London to my father. They have invited me to dine with me at the moor. Arnold had just raised his hand to ring for the fourth time, when the inevitable knock was heard at the door. It seemed to say "come in. The immutable laws of Bishopriggs had decided that a second ring was unnecessary. Storm or no storm, the second knock came—and then, and not till then, the sage appeared, with the dish of untasted "collops" in his hand.

"Candles!" said Arnold.

Mr. Bishopriggs set the "collops" (in the language of England, minced meat) upon the table, lit the candles at the mantle-piece, faced about, with the fire of recent toddy flaming in his nose, and waited for further orders before he went back to his second glass. Anne declined to return to the dinner. Arnold ordered Mr. Bishopriggs to close the shutters, and to send in the fine hymsell.

"

Anne looked up from the message.

"Ask him to wait," she said; "and I will send word to him again."

"Wi' mony loves and kisses," suggested Mr. Bishopriggs, as a necessary supplement to the message. "Eh! it comes as easy as A. B. C. to a man o' my experience. Ye can ha' nae better gae-between than yer pair servant to command, Sawmuel Bishopriggs. I understand ye baith prairfectly." He laid his forefinger along his flaming nose, and withdrew.

Winnie allowed herself to luxuriate for an instant, Anne opened the bedroom door—with the resolution of relieving Arnold from the new sacrifice imposed on him by owning the truth.

"Is that you?" asked Blanche.

At the sound of her voice, Anne started back guiltily. "I'll be with you in a moment," she answered, and closed the door again between them.

No! it was not to be done. Something in Blanche's trivial question—or something in the hope, in the sight of Blanche's face—roused the warning instinct in Anne, which silenced her on the very brink of the disclosure. At the last moment, the iron chain of circumstances made itself felt, binding her without mercy to the hateful, the degrading deceit. Could she own the truth, about Geoffrey and herself, to Blanche? and, without owning it, could she explain and justify Arnold's conduct in joining her privately at Craig Ferne? A shameful confession made to an innocent girl, a risk of feeling shaking Arnold's place in Blanche's estimation: a scandal at the inn, in the disgrace of which the others would be involved with herself—this was the price at which she must speak, if she followed her first impulse, and told, in so many words, "Arnold is here."

It was not to be thought of. Cost what it might in present wretchedness—end how it might, if the deception was discovered in the future—Blanche must be kept in ignorance of the truth: Arnold must be kept in hiding until she had gone.

Anne opened the door for the second time, and went in.

The business of the toilet was standing still. Blanche was in confidential communication with Mrs. Inchbare. At the moment when Anne entered the room she was eagerly protesting the lundisby about her friend's "invisible husband"—she was just saying, "Do tell me! what is he like?"

The capacity for accurate observation is a capacity so uncommon, and is so seldom exercised, even where it does exist, with the equally rare gift of accurately describing the thing or the person observed, that Anne's dread of the consequences if Mrs. Inchbare was allowed time to comply with Blanche's request, was, in all probability, a dread misplaced. Right or wrong, however, she deem that she felt hurried her into taking the step of dismissing the landlady on the spot. "We mustn't keep you from your occupations any longer," she said to Mrs. Inchbare. "I will give Miss Lundie all the help she needs."

Barred from advancing in one direction, Blanche's curiosity turned back, and tried in another. She hastily addressed herself to Anne.

"I must know something about him," she said. "Is he shy before strangers? I heard you whispering with him on the other side of the door. Are you jealous, Anne? Are you afraid I shall fascinate him in their absence?"

Blanche, in Mrs. Inchbare's best gown—an ancient and high-waisted silk garment, of the hue called "bottle-green," pinned in at the back, and trailing far behind her—with a short, orange-colored shawl over her shoulders, and a towel tied round her head for her hair, to dry her wet hair, looked at once the strangest and the prettiest human anomaly that ever was seen.

"For heaven's sake," she said, gayly, "don't tell your husband I am in Mrs. Inchbare's clothes! I want to appear suddenly, without any sort of warn hin of what a figure I am! I should have nothing left to wish for in this world," she added, "if Arnold could only see me now!"

Looking in the glass, she noticed that Anne face reflected behind her, and started at the sight of it.

"What is the matter?" she asked. "Your face frightens me."

It was useless to prolong the pain of the inevitable misunderstanding between them. The one course to take was to silence all further inquiries then and there. Strongly as she felt this, Anne's inbred loyalty to Blanche still made her deceiving her to her face. "I might write it," she thought. "I'd say it—if I were Mrs. Brinkworth in the same house with her!" Write it? As she reconsidered the word, a sudden idea struck her. She passed into the room door, and led the way back into the setting-room.

"Gone again!" exclaimed Blanche, looking uneasily round the empty room. "Anne! there's something so strange in all this, that I neither can, nor will, put up with your silence any longer. It's not just, it's not kind, to shut me out of your confidence, after we have lived together like sisters all our lives!"

Anne sighed bitterly, and kissed her on the forehead. "You shall know all I can tell you —all I dare tell you," she said, gently. "I only reproach me. It hurts me more than you think."

She turned away to the side-table, and came back with a letter in her hand. "Read that," she said, and handed it to Blanche.

Blanche saw her own name, on the address, in the handwriting of Anne.

"What does this mean?" she asked.

"I wrote to you, after Parkfield was left me," Anne replied. "I meant you to have received my letter to-morrow, in time to prevent any little impudence into which your anxiety might hurry you. All that I can say to you is said there. Spare me the distress of speaking. Read it, Blanche."

Blanche still held the letter, unopened.

"Let it come from you to me! when we are both together, and both alone in the same room! It's worse than formal, Anne! It's as if there was a quarrel between us. Why should it distress you to speak to me?"

Anne's eyes dropped to the ground. She pointed to the letter for the second time.

Blanche broke the seal.

She passed rapidly over the opening sentences, and devoted all her attention to the second paragraph.

"And now, my love, you will expect me to atone for the surprise and distress that I have caused you. I will atone, if I can. I will atone really is, and by telling you all my plans for the future. Dearest Blanche! don't think me untrue to the affection we have treasured with each other—don't think there is any change in my heart toward you—believe only that I am very, very happy woman, and that I am in a position which forces me, against my own will, to be silent about myself. Silent even to you, the sister of my love! —the one person in the world who is dearest to me! A time may come when I shall be able to open my heart to you. Oh, what good it will do me! what a relief it will be! For the present, I must be content. For the present, we must be parted. God knows what it costs me to write this. I think of the dear old days that are gone. I remember how happy we were when we could be a sister to you, when her kind eyes looked at me, for the first time, when her arm was first round me, and from heaven to mine! All this comes back on me now, and breaks my heart. But it must be so! I am writing to you, Anne, as well as to you. I will write often—I will think of you, my darling. Right or wrong, I will be happy if your wishes so again. God bless you, my dear one! And God help us!"

Blanche silently crossed the room to the sofa on which Anne was sitting, and stood there for a moment, looking at her. She sat down, and laid her head on Anne's shoulder. Sorrowfully and quietly, she put the letter into her bosom—and took Anne's hand, and kissed it.

"All my questions are answered, dear. I will wait your time."

Anne sighed, sweetly, generously said.

Anne burst into tears.

* * *

The rain still fell, but the storm was dying away.

Blanche left the sofa, and, going to the window, opened the shutters to look out at the night. She suddenly came back to Anne.

"I see lights," she said—"the lights of a carriage coming up out of the darkness of the moor. Is it a visitor for Mrs. Inch, from Windygates. Go into the bedroom. It's just possible Lady Lundie may have come for me herself."

The customary relations of the two toward each other were completely reversed. Anne was like a child in Blanche's hands. She rose, and withdrew.

Left alone, Blanche took the letter out of her bosom, and read it again, in the attitude of listening for the carriage.

The second reading confirmed her in a resolution which she had privately taken, while she had been sitting by Anne on the sofa—a resolution to submit to the new sacrifice required of her in the future than any provisions of hers could anticipate. Mr. Patrick was the person to decide—now on whose discretion and experience she could implicitly rely. She determined, in Anne's interests, to wait for his arrival, to ask no questions, and to tell him all that had happened at the inn. "I'll first make him forgive me," she thought to herself. "And then I'll see if he' thinks as I do, when I tell him about Anne."

The carriage came up at the door, and Mrs. Inchbare showed in—not Lady Lundie, but Lady Lundie's maid.

The woman's account of what had happened at Windygates was simple enough. Lady Lundie had, on receiving Blanche's letter, put her own interpretation on Blanche's abrupt departure in the pony-chaise, and had ordered the carriage, with the full determination of following the young daughter herself. But the agitations and anxieties of the day proved too much for her. She had been seized by one of the attacks of giddiness to which she was always subject after excessive mental irritation; and, eager as she was (on more accounts than one) to go to the inn herself, she had been compelled, in the first instance, to commit the pursuit of Blanche to her own maid, in whose age and good sense she could place every confidence. The woman —seeing the state of the weather—had thoughtfully brought a box with her, containing a change of clothes for Blanche, and had driven to Blanche, she added, with all due respect, that she had full powers from her mistress to act in all respects as the shooting-cottage, and to place the matter in Sir Patrick's hands. This said, she left it to her young lady to decide for herself what she would return to Windygates, under present circumstances, or not.

Blanche took the box from the woman's hands, and joined Anne in the bedroom, to dress herself for the journey home.

"I am going back to a good scolding," she said. "But a scolding is a novelty in my experience of Lady Lundie. I'm not uneasy about that, Anne—I'm uneasy about you. Can I be sure of one thing—do you stay here for the present?"

The worst that could happen at the inn had happened. Nothing was to be gained—now and ever thing might be lost—by leaving the place in which Arnold was in hiding. Once more, Anne answered that she proposed remaining at the inn for the present.

"Is your promise to write to me?"

"Yes."

"If there is any thing I can do for you—?"

"There is nothing, my love."

"There may be. If you want to see me, we can meet at Windygates without being discovered. Come at luncheon-time—go round by the shrubbery—and step in at the library window. You know so well as I do there is nobody in the library at that hour. Don't say it's impossible—you don't know what may happen. I shall wait ten minutes every day on the chance of seeing you. That's settled—and it's settled that you write to me, if I go, during the next days than are gone," she said, with a farewell wave of her hand. "Thank God for that! And now I have kissed the rest."

She threw open the bedroom door, and called to the maid, in the setting-room. "Miss Lundie is waiting for you." Blanche pressed her hand, and left her.

Anne stood while in the bedroom, listening to the sound made by the departure of the carriage from the door. Little by little, the clamp of the horses and the noise of the rolling wheels lessened and lessened. When the last sound had died away, in silence she waited for a moment thinking—then, rousing herself on a sudden, hurried into the sitting-room, and rang the bell.

"I shall go mad," she said to herself, "if I stay here alone."

Even Mr. Bishopriggs felt the necessity of being silent when he stood face to face with her mistress's letter.

"I want to speak to him. Send him here instantly."

Mr. Bishopriggs understood her, and withdrew.

Arnold came in.

"Has she gone?" were the first words he said. "She has gone. She was angry with me when you see her again. I have told her nothing. Don't ask me for my reasons!"

"I have no wish to ask them."

"Be angry with me, if you like!"

"I have no wish to be angry with you."

He spoke and looked like an altered man. Quietly seating himself at the table, he rested his head on his hand—and so remained silent. Anne was taken completely by surprise. She drew near, and looked at him curiously. Let a woman's mood be what it may, it is certain to feel the influence of any change for which she is unprepared in the manner of the man on whom her own interests her. The cause of this is not to be found in the variableness of her humor. It is to be found in the sudden appeal to the noble absorption of Self, which is one of the greatest—but by no means one of the worst—of the qualities of the commonest virtues of the sex. Little by little, the sweet feminine charm of Anne's face grew softly and sadly back. The inbred solicitude of the woman's nature answered the call which the man had unconsciously made on it. She touched Arnold on the shoulder.

"This has been hard on you," she said. "And I am so sorry for you. Try and forgive me, Mr. Brinkworth. I am sincerely sorry. I wish with all my heart I could comfort you."

He looked up at her, and kissed her hand.

"Anne!" he said, "you are my Guardian Angel. You have come to me, in my darkest hour, as you came to me in the days that are gone. You know so well as I do there is nobody in the library at that hour. Don't say it's impossible—you don't know what may happen. I shall wait ten minutes every day on the chance of seeing you. That's settled—and it's settled that you write to me, if I go, during the next days than are gone," she said, with a farewell wave of her hand. "Thank God for that! And now I have kissed the rest."

She threw open the bedroom door, and called to the maid, in the sitting-room. "Miss Lundie is waiting for you." Blanche pressed her hand, and left her.

Anne stood while in the bedroom, listening to the sound made by the departure of the carriage from the door. Little by little, the clamp of the horses and the noise of the rolling wheels lessened and lessened. When the last sound had died away, in silence she waited for a moment thinking—then, rousing herself on a sudden, hurried into the sitting-room, and rang the bell.

"I shall go mad," she said to herself, "if I stay here alone."

Even Mr. Bishopriggs felt the necessity of being silent when he stood face to face with her mistress's letter.

"I want to speak to him. Send him here instantly."

Mr. Bishopriggs understood her, and withdrew.

Arnold came in.

"Has she gone?" were the first words he said. "She has gone. She was angry with me when you see her again. I have told her nothing. Don't ask me for my reasons!"

"I have no wish to ask them."

"Be angry with me, if you like!"

"I have no wish to be angry with you."

He spoke and looked like an altered man. Quietly seating himself at the table, he rested his head on his hand—and so remained silent. Anne was taken completely by surprise. She drew near, and looked at him curiously. Let a woman's mood be what it may, it is certain to feel the influence of any change for which she is unprepared in the manner of the man on whom her own interests her. The cause of this is not to be found in the variableness of her humor. It is to be found in the sudden appeal to the noble absorption of Self, which is one of the greatest—but by no means one of the worst—of the qualities of the commonest virtues of the sex. Little by little, the sweet feminine charm of Anne's face grew softly and sadly back. The inbred solicitude of the woman's nature answered the call which the man had unconsciously made on it. She touched Arnold on the shoulder.

"This has been hard on you," she said. "And I am so sorry for you. Try and forgive me, Mr. Brinkworth. I am sincerely sorry. I wish with all my heart I could comfort you."

He looked up at her, and kissed her hand.

"Anne!" he said, "you are my Guardian Angel. You have come to me, in my darkest hour, as you came to me in the days that are gone. You make sure of doing that by keeping up appearances, and sitting down in the setting-room to-day. When we next meet it will be under pleasanter circumstances, I hope. I shall always be glad to think that in one of your worst trials in the present time I shall be most likely away to-morrow morning—and that you will be safe."

Anne held out her hand to take leave. Nothing could undo what had been done. The only hope was to keep appearances, and parted away.

"You have not befriended an ungrateful woman," she said. "The day may yet come, Mr. Brinkworth, when I shall prove it."

"I hope not," said Sylvester. "Good-by, and good luck!"

She withdrew into her own room. Arnold closed the sitting-room door, and stretched himself on the sofa for the night.

* * *

The morning was bright, the air was delicious after the storm.

Arnold had gone, as he had promised, before Anne was out of her room. It was understood on the inn that departmental business had compelled Mr. Brinkworth to leave Craig Ferne secretly called him south. Mr. Bishopriggs had been presented with a handsome gratuity: and Mrs. Inchbare's apprehensions informed that the rooms were taken for a week certain.

Left to herself, Anne put one little match of events had now, to all appearance, fallen back into a quiet course. Arnold was on his way to his estate; Blanche was safe at Windygates: Anne's residence at the inn was assured for a week to come. The one serious doubt was that which still hung over Geoffrey's movements. The one event still involved in darkness turned on the question of life or death in the estimation of Lord Holchester—otherwise, the question of Lord Holchester's health. Taken by itself, the alternative, either way, was plain enough. If my lord lived—Geoffrey would be free to come back, and marry her privately in Scotland. If my lord died—Geoffrey would be free to send for her, and marry her publicly in London. But could Geoffrey be relied on?

Anne went out on to the terrace-ground in front of the inn. The cool morning breeze blew steadily. Towering white clouds sailed in grand procession over the heavens, now obscuring, and now revealing the sun. Yellow light and purple shadow succeeded each other on the wooded brown surface of the moor—even as hope and fear chased each other over Anne's mind, brooding on what might come to her with the coming time.

She turned away, weary of questioning the impenetrable future, and went back to the inn.

Crossing the hall she looked at the clock. It was not yet eight. Hours must pass, and Geoffrey was due in London. Geoffrey and his brother were, at the moment, on their way to Lord Holchester's house.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LECTURE ON NATURAL SCIENCE.

Lecture matches are generally made of stick. They are made to burn. If your scholars can, they bear it with Christian fortitude, and don't try to hit back. Lecture matches are also made to be light handed, and free, and burn houses down. They are nice lyes to have about the house, and are very handy when you want to light a fire. Burn a number of a good many things. In London, the only ingredient which is extensively used in the lecture combination is cream. The butter of commerce is largely used, to grease the wheels of the luxury carriages when it agrees with them better than it does with the human beings who eat it.

"AMANTIS RES ADVERSÆ," OR, "A LOVER'S HARD LUCK."

A Homo had met one dear sight,
Puellus visitare,
And mashed him more to very late,
That illion constant care.

Puerl, walking by the house,
Saw puerl in fenestra,
Et sunt morari for a while,
To see all this fun.

Sonn, caput turn'd its nasum round,
In vim puerorum,
Agnoscet there the pedagogue,
Uh! maximum punishment!

Progressus pear to the door
Cum mentula, puerl,
Et turn'd the key to lick him in,
Maraud to his sire.

Then pedagogus rose to go,
Et feeling for his hat,
His non noticed to get out,
The key clos'd on that.

Accendit sweet-heart near the state
Cum fortunes pede,
Et runn'd upon their steep,
Sed, heheat not the door-key.

Then, certain doctor,
By her unnatural voice,
Came runn'd to the door,
Et obvenit the body.

"Forsaken puerl, by master roared,
"Why spoil you thus my nomium?
Excite from the house,
Si rogies have locked the front one!"

Puella trieth hang her head,
And look'd like a culprit,
Et cito from the other door,
Rie ought with Phillip.

Cum magna grade redit home!
Returning innocuous prodigius,
Et never asses eat again,
Except people with asses.

A little boy was washed and dressed one morning, and sent to Sabbath-school, being warned not to pass the candied "bottle-green," during the exercises of the teacher asked Georgie if he had ever been baptized. The little fellow looked puzzled, and then responded in George's stead, and hesitatingly answered, "Yes, sir." "Who baptized you?" "Why, I was baptized and vaccinated by the same doctor." "Where were you baptized?" asked he, promptly and somewhat pompously answered: "Yes, sir, I have been baptized five or six times, but it never took."

An ignorant but conceited fellow got aboard a steamboat, and, in order to show his knowledge, he took a while among the crowd, and seeing the captain upon the quarter-deck, he accosted him familiarly, thus: "The Lake Huron." "Yes, Sir," replied the man, "but the question is, going to or from?" "Why, to be sure," said he, "I am bound to the Lake." "Well, Sir," said the captain, "the name of the lake you're bound to is Erie." "Erie!" said the fellow, "Erie! The crowd were now smiling quite audibly, and the fellow knew not whether to jump overboard or take them back to port. "I'm on, is the lake I'm on. That's a polite captain, indeed."

A Yankee editor says: "The march of civilization is onward—onward—like the slow but intrepid tread of a jackass eating thistles."

A Parisian beggar meets a gentleman on the street corner.

BEGGAR. "Give me a sou, my dear Sir."

GENTLEMAN. "You are mistaken, enough by your appearance, to be my dear Sir."

BEGGAR. "I have no sou, but here is a ten-sou piece. You will owe me nine sous."

GENTLEMAN. "Ah, my dear Sir; I shall pray God to preserve your life until the day when I shall owe them back to you."

"Is there any thing the matter?" "There is, Sir," was the host's surest reply. "Have I ever given you cause to think that I am afraid of any man?" "Not of it." "Well, Sir, why do you ask me?" "Because, my dear Sir, what language! We were only talking about the weather." "Well, suppose I did?" "Why, Sir, it's not the custom of the house." "Then I'll begin by cutting out of the room—it's highly unbecoming language"—and passenger left the room. "Now, Sir, what have you have me say? I called the soup by its proper name." "No, Sir, you did not, and when ever you have occasion to speak of that particular soup again, never say Ox-tail soup! Say Polypheme soup—that's the proper word, Sir."

A merchant being unable to live as comfortably as he desired, and a little behind-hand pay his debts, failed seven times in succession. His numerous assignments of course, were chiefly he did. Among those who had claims upon him was a tailor. One day, meeting the case of his neighbors, was informed that Uncle Sam had taken the bill. "Ah!" said he, "I knew that sam" replied B—; "why didn't he make an assignment?"

EMANCIPATION
RED TAPE
1862
1861
1860
RING OUT A SLOWLY DYING CAUSE, AND ANCIENT FORMS OF PARTY STRIFE;
RING IN THE NOBLER MODES OF LIFE, WITH SWEETER MANNERS, PURER LAWS.

1860—18

WHEEL OF TIME
1864
1865
1866
1867
GRANT & COLFAX
A B C D E F G H I J K L M N
RING OUT FALSE PRIDE IN PLACE AND BLOOD,
THE CIVIC SLANDER AND THE SPITE;
RING IN THE LOVE OF TRUTH AND RIGHT, RING IN THE COMMON LOVE OF GOOD.

ER PAGE 26.]

1860—1870.

IN the striking cartoon with the above title which we present our readers this week, our artist gives an epitome of American history for the last ten years—a coup d'œil embracing the great events of the war for the Union and the period immediately succeeding the close of hostilities in the field. The year 1859 died with the shadow of war on his face. JOHN BROWN'S invasion of Virginia had roused the passions of the South; his ill-judged execution had strengthened Northern determination to resist the further encroachments of slavery. Then came MR. LINCOLN'S election, and the fierce agitation that culminated in the firing on the flag of the West in Charleston Harbor and the bombardment of Fort Sumter, followed by a war which whose magnitude all other wars sink into insignificance. Our artist, it will be seen, has aptly suggested the most important scenes of this great contest: the firing on Fort Sumter; the grand uprising in the North; the fight between the Merrimac and the Merrimac; the proclamation of emancipation; the campaign in the Wilderness; SHERMAN'S march to the sea; the sinking of the Alabama; the capture of Mobile; the death of PRESIDENT LINCOLN; and the surrender of LEE. Following the war is suggested the progress of material and civil reconstruction, the reclaiming of the Southern States, the construction of work-shops and factories, the education of the freedmen and the multiplication of common schools, and the general obliteration of all the traces of civil war all over the land. The wheel of Time, turning on, rolls the years of strife out of sight, and ushers in a new decade that brings peace and prosperity to the nation.

FROST WORK.

THEY are the ghosts of flowers,
The blossoms of fairer hours,
I see on the window pane!
They shall be the loneliest and brother,
But lo! in this wintry weather
Their ghosts unfold again.

O rare and wonderful flowers,
That bloom in these crystal bowers!
Now their spindens glance and gleam!
Now they glow where the silver selage
Fringes the rivulet's edge,
And flush in the morning's beam.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

IN TWO BOOKS.—BOOK FIFE.

CHAPTER X.

ADIEU OMEN.

VERONICA dismissed the woman and sat down to consider the situation. She was frightened to the bottom of her heart.

Paul coming from the Villa Reale at that hour of the morning—on that pretext—was alarming. But Paul denying that he had been there, and stating that he had come from an opposite quarter, was more alarming still. She had been watched—overheard; to what extent? How much had Paul told or betrayed to? She sat twisting a ring round and round on her finger, and pressing it pitilessly into the tender flesh until a deep red mark grew beneath the gold circlet—she who was usually so sensitive to bodily pain, and shrank from it with such abject dread!

Above the great fear that seemed to fill her being, there hovered over and again a certain sentiment of anger; like white foam surging over a dark sea. She was angry with Harlett. Why had he chosen that time to speak to her so ungandedly? True, the appointment to meet him was of her making, but she had never contemplated having a love-scene. She wanted sympathy and counsel, not a passionate declaration! The passion was good in so far as it betokened the service and fervor to the sympathy. The moment it shifted its voice to plead and complain on its own account, passion was a hindrance and an injury to her. It was impertinent. There might come a moment when it would be welcome. But not now. Who could tell the extent of the ruin that Barletti's rashness was bringing upon her? She pushed her hair up from her forehead, thrusting her fingers deeply through the rich rippling locks, and recked from side to side on her chair.

"What shall I do? what shall I do?" she murmured, in a kind of chant over and over again, making the verse out with a most regular monotonous inflection; as though she were trying to lull her terrors to sleep as a nurse lulls a baby, by the mechanical repetition of a song.

The hours went by. All was quiet in the house. Every thing seemed to be going on as usual. It was nearly twelve o'clock when a motion looked at her watch. She was a little reassured by the lull that reigned, and presently reassured, as she told herself, for the storm whose breaking she dreaded was not likely to burst forth in such sort as to startle the whole household.

Presently her maid tapped at the door, which Veronica had fastened on the inside.

"Will mikdi please to dress for the déjeuner?" said the woman. She had been scandalized by the fact of her mistress having dressed herself, and chose to ignore the possibility of her repeating as breakfast in a toilet achieved without due professional assistance.

Veronica admitted her.

"I shall not change my dress, Julienne," she said. "But you can throw a wrapper over me and brush my hair. I have a slight headache, and that will soothe me."

In fact, the regular passage of the skilfully-wielded brush through her long hair did soothe her. And under its influence she was enabled to collect herself and to think a little, instead of merely feeling and fearing, as she had done hitherto.

"Is Sir John coming to breakfast?" she asked, after a while.

"No, madame—miladi; I believe not. When Paul took him his chocolate at nine o'clock he said that he was not to be waited for at breakfast. Ah—h—h!"

The woman gave a long sigh, so elaborate, and evidently meant to attract attention, that Veronica asked, "What is the matter with you, Julienne?"

"With me, miladi? Nothing! But with Sir John—ah—h—h!"

A shudder ran through Veronica that her heart stood still for a moment, and then went on beating again with a speed long but sickened her. As usual she resented the painful sensation, and revenged herself on the maid. Veronica was a perfect conductor of pain. She transmitted it instantly to the nearest recipient.

"Julienne, you are impertinent! How dare you startle me in that manner? What do you mean? Are you crazy?"

"A thousand pardons, miladi, no; I am not crazy. But—"

Veronica saw the woman's face in the glass. It was a little sullen, but through the sullenness glanced an eager, self-important look. She had something to tell, and would not be satisfied to be hulked of saying it by resentment at her mistress's asperity.

"Well? Is Sir John worse? Is any thing the matter? Do you know any thing?"

"Miladi, I know this much; I saw the doctor who has been coming every morning—every morning—so quietly slipping in and out, I watch of him—that I saw him this morning, but not done. No, miladi, there was another with him —a consultation, you see! And as they were going away I heard them talking; and though I did not understand every word, I have Italian enough to make out that they were about to be called for saying it by resentment at her mistress's asperity.

"Well? Is Sir John worse? Is any thing the matter? Do you know any thing?"

"Miladi, I know this much; I saw the doctor who has been coming every morning—every morning—so quietly slipping in and out, I watch of him—that I saw him this morning, but not done. No, miladi, there was another with him —a consultation, you see! And as they were going away I heard them talking; and though I did not understand every word, I have Italian enough to make out that they were about to be called and case. And the new doctor said to the old one as they went, 'I give him a month.' Then the other muttered something, and the new doctor said again, 'Ah, but in this case the constitution is shattered.' And then I heard something else: I don't know what, miladi."

Julienne checked herself just in time to avoid repeating to "miladi" sundry criticisms respecting Sir John's temper, manners, and mode of life, which were by no means of a flattering nature.

It did not strike Veronica that the maid's mode of revealing her news, or intended to do so if her reveiling it at all, was a proof that "miladi's" affection for Sir John was not deemed very tender or deep. She was conscious of nothing so fear that she might be dealing a heavy blow to her mistress's heart in repeating the verdict of the physicians. But that consideration did not occur to Veronica.

After first hearing that Paul had watched her, traced her to the Villa Reale, and revealed what he had heard to Sir John, was driven out: but he was only driven out to be called in to receive approbation. Sir John was very ill; despaired of dying! Paul was specially made to call up her hair, keeping, herself, a dead silence. Her cheeks were very pale. The face that fronted her in the glass was a strangely different one from that which had been used to be mirrored in her old looking-glass. The harrowing fear which had been its most striking charm had faded in a great measure. Under her eyes were dark rims that made their brightness unnatural. The whole face seemed to have fallen. There were even some wrinkles about the mouth and eyes. Her youth still asserted itself in the satin texture of her skin, and the rich abundance of her raven hair. She was not changed, but she looked no longer that embodiment of Hebe-like, gladsome beauty that she had been a year ago.

She stared at her own image with a puckered brow, and pained compression of the lips. "I look old!" she thought. And then, "I look pitiable."

"Dame! She seems quite to take it to heart!" thought the maid, much surprised. "Can she be uneasy about his will? But these great folks are always provided for by the continuity of patronage." Mademoiselle Julienne had lived in very good houses.

After breakfast Veronica went herself to Sir John's apartments to inquire how he was. The answer returned by Paul was that Sir John found himself tolerably well; and would be glad to speak to madame. She would give herself the trouble of coming to his dressing-room in half an hour. That half hour was a terrible one to Veronica.

Her thoughts seemed to be hurt which way soever she turned them, like a bruised body to which the slightest movement is pain. If he had sent for her to reveal the desperate condition of his fortunes, and to propose that, for the sake of her children, if that were not the object of his interview, she should be his accused, reproached, how should she meet it? Embarrassment and defiance seemed her only resources. Approach from that side! She would be slow to arrive. And yet the idea of defiance was frightful to her. It would be decisive, irrevocable.

Veronica had a constitutional antipathy to a clearly-marked and unwavering course of action. She loved to leave the outlines of her conduct blurred, so as to have some imaginary margin for erasing here and there, for modification of her actions. The legitimate consequences of our actions are frequently cruel in their stern sharpness, and her unhappy temperament made shrank shuddering from the prospect of sustained endurance.

At the end of the allotted half hour she tapped at the door of Sir John's dressing-room; and the instant her fingers had made the sound she was overcome by an access of terror, and would have turned and run away had not Paul opened the door immediately upon her summons. He ushered her in respectfully; and she found herself seated—she scarcely knew how—on a low chair beside the sofa on which Sir John was reclining.

Her parts seemed to be for the moment reversed, for it was he who said in a tone of anxiety: "Good heavens! how pale you are! Have you not well?"

He held out his thin, white hand to her, and slightly touched her fingers with his lips as he spoke. The words, and still more the action, caused a sudden revulsion of feeling in her flustering heart. The blood rushed back to her cheeks and lips. Her eyes grew bright. The tension of the nerves of her face relaxed. He would not have greeted her so, had he suspected. She was safe! What a fool she had been to torment herself as she had done!

She answered sweetly, leaving her hand in his, as I was well. I had a headache this morning. I went out early to get rid of it. Perhaps I had only a—"

"Yes: Paul told me."

The tone of the reply startled her. She instantaneously glanced at Paul, who was arranging his master's dressing-case. Paul looked down, however, as Veronica looked at him.

"Basta! Go away, Paul, and don't come back till I ring for you," said Sir John, sharply. Paul obeyed.

When they were alone together, Veronica said:

"I feared you were not so well this morning, so I came to inquire for you myself."

"How considerate you are!" said Sir John, shading his eyes with his hand, and looking at her from beneath that shelter.

The words caused him to adopt a sneering tone, even in his best humors. But the ring in his voice made Veronica look at him with surprise. It might be that this was the effect of the fear which had left her nerves sensitive and quivering. At all events she would not display any mistrust of him at this moment.

"Are you feeling stronger this morning?" she asked.

"Stronger! Yes. Oh yes, certainly: a good deal stronger. And I have my reason for saying the contrary?"

Her movement she hesitated in a little embarrassment. Then she answered, "My reason was, as I told you, that you did not come to breakfast."

"Ah yes: true! Of course. But now—tell me—you were out early this morning, you say?"

"Yes."

She began to play with a string of amber beads that hung round her neck, and she shifted her chair a little.

"You are not comfortable," said Sir John, still watching her from beneath his hand.

"The—the light. There is such a glare."

"Ah, ha! Yes. You have had such a headache as yours—or even has had such a headache—the light is disagreeable. I am ashamed that you should have the trouble of moving that chair for yourself. But you see what a helpless creature I am—comparatively, that is—for in fact is, I am stronger, really stronger. Your kind anxiety about me does me good. It acts as a cordial."

"Then you do care for my kindness still?" she said, glancing up, and then letting her eyes fall again immediately.

"Care for it! What else have I to care for, Veronica? I live upon every thing to me. And it so precious, so infinitely precious in itself!"

She knelt down beside him. Her hand was still twisted to the string of amber beads, and she played with them nervously as she spoke. "And why do you not secure it, this kindness that you value, forever? Why do you not remake me from a mere chattel—confess it—makes my temper fretful and my spirits dull at times?"

"You do not doubt me, Veronica?"

"No, no. But suspense and procrastination are wearing."

"You do trust me?"

"Yes."

"You trust me as—as I trust you. And you shall find that your confidence will meet with its deserts. Do you know what news I heard yesterday?"

"No. News? News from England?"

"Don't confess yourself. You will make your headache worse."

"Oh, my headache is gone."

"Ay, but it will return. It is of a kind that may return at any moment."

Still the old man kept his tone! And something subdued and barking in his whole manner that she could not define to herself, but that made an impression on her.

"Your news! Did you send for me to tell it me?"

"Y—yes, partly, mia cara."

"Speak then!" she cried, with a flash of impatient temper that startled him a little.

"Well, the news I heard yesterday is, that Her Majesty's packet-boat would be here at noon under the command of my old acquaintance, Captain Reginald Hume."

"Well?" said Veronica, after a moment's pause of expectation.

"He is a very pleasant fellow, very pleasant indeed. I met him years ago at Spezia."

Veronica twisted her fingers more impatiently in the amber beads, and pressed her cheek brown together. She thought that Sir John had simply introduced this topic to avoid the turn their conversation had been taking, and to break the thread of it.

"What is his pleasantness to me?" she exclaimed, pettishly.

"His pleasantness? Not much. But his presence is a good deal to you."

"How? What do you mean?"

"Veronica, you know what I said just now about our trust in one another. Faith is to be crowned at last. It has not been my fault—as you ought to know—that you have been kept in expense so long. You have blamed me, but unjustly, as you will find."

She seemed stricken motionless, with her eyes fixed on his. Her hands under the beads came and went quickly between her parted lips.

"I am not well enough to travel to Florence," he continued, watching her eager face with a strange, gloating look. "But, listen, Veronica, miia bella! I—I—" He drew her close to his lips and whispered a short sentence in her ear.

Her face glowed and changed like a scorched, drooping flower after a sudden shower. She sprang to her feet and clasped her hands together. In the sudden gesture of withdrawing her fingers from the necklace the string snapped, and the amber beads rolled scattered hither and thither about the floor.

"You consent?" said Sir John.

"Yes, yes, yes!" she cried, wringed you sometimes in my thoughts. Forgive me!" she exclaimed, impulsively, taking his hand in hers and kissing it.

"You will remember that it was this day I conceived the plan. This day I took it up, kept in your memory the date of the day on which you went out so early to the Villa Reale for your headache."

"I am not likely to need any thing to remind me of to-day."

"No: but there is a good deal in association. Association aids memory so wonderfully. Now, dearest mia, you must go and leave me. I am a little tired and overexcited."

"I will not disobey you to-day of all days," she said. The compliment was evidently to her very elastic. Before she went away she stopped to gather up the amber beads.

"There is some superstition about losing amber you have once worn," she said, smiling.

"They say it is unlucky. And I believe the fallacy of the notion. My amber necklace broke and fell at a moment of great happiness and good fortune."

"Yes. You will prove the fallacy of the superstition again triumphantly. It is curious—ay, at least, may defy augury."

CHAPTER XI.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP THE "PURBOND."

THE Prince Alberto Barletti passed the greater part of his time in Paris. He was a poor man for his rank, and if he could have found some way of increasing his income without risk, he would have been very glad of the enrichment of it. But he shrank from the idea of speculation. As to earning money, that was out of the question. It had a detestable way of increasing his income without risk or trouble had not yet occurred to him. He, too, however, likewise seemed to remember him in a good-natured mood.

A company of English speculators commenced operations in Naples. They were rich and beautify. The first preliminary, of course, was to destroy. Many houses must be pulled down, and their proprietors indemnified. A good deal of diplomacy was expended on the powers that should such matters. People who possessed influence were canvassed diligently.

It chanced that Prince Barletti was, rightly or wrongly, supposed to be one of the influential. But how to obtain his good-will? The English speculators, many of them, would have been a little clumsy in conducting the affair. But they had a clever man in their pay who knew the world. This was Mr. Frost, the Private Secret, of the firm of Lovegrove and Frost, solicitors to the company. Mr. Frost learned that Prince Barletti was not rich in proportion to the illustriousness of his rank. In plain words, he might be open to a bribe. Mr. Frost set about offering the bribe was all-important. Mr. Frost, in consultation with the architect and surveyors, discovered that it would be very desirable to run a new road right through a palazzo owned by Prince Barletti. No one had the slightest idea that the road could pass within half a mile of the palazzo. But Mr. Frost's opinion was speedily adopted.

Negotiations were set on foot with the prince. He had hitherto been unwilling to express himself hostilely toward the whole undertaking of this foreign company of speculators. But Mr. Frost thought it so desirable to conciliate his Signoria Illustrissima, and to bring him round, that he returned to Paris from Naples and had been there but a short time, and went to Paris armed with a letter of introduction, and with schemes and plans in which the new road over the site of the Palazzo Barletti was not forgotten. The prince showed himself open to conviction. He became a strong partisan of the English company, and his change of mind was followed by a corresponding change in the minds of individuals in Naples. It was a pity, said the prince, to destroy that old house. It was connected with the family name for several generations. But he understood what was meant by public spirit, and he would not put himself and feelings interfere with it.

"This Prince Bah-letty charges a pretty long price for his private feelings!" observed one of the directors of the English company when Mr. Frost had before them the result of his mission to Paris. But Mr. Frost said he thought that the prince's private feelings were very dear, considering that he was a prince. And he added that he thought they would be found to come cheap in the end.

The arrangement of this affair caused Mr.

Frost to come in contact with the prince's younger brother, Cesare. The latter was charged by the head of the family to watch his interests. Cesare became greatly enamored with the combination in Mr. Frost of business shrewdness with an engaging manner. When he was another kind of man from the slow, snuffy, solemn old "legale" Dottore Chiappi, with whom he had transacted business for his brother in Florence. They met, Cesare de' Barletti and Sidney Frost, nearly every morning, either at the company's offices or at Mr. Frost's hotel.

About a week after the memorable day of the interview in the Villa Reale between the princess and Cesare, the latter was sitting with Mr. Frost in the reception-room at Lucia. They were quite near the window; and were vaguely looking out at the blue, sparkling sea, and settling some few last preliminaries relative to their business. For Mr. Frost was to leave Naples by the steamer for Marseilles, on his way to England, the next day—unless—which he thought unlikely—a telegram should arrive from England to detain him.

"You and the English squadron will depart almost together," said Barletti.

"Ay! The queen's ships are going away?"

"So I hear."

"Have you ever been over an English man-of-war?" asked Mr. Frost.

"No: I don't understand ships. When we were boys we used to go out sometimes from Capri, in a rowboat and, with an old lateen-sail. But I never cared about it."

"I'm!" grunted Mr. Frost, eying his companion aside. "I don't understand ships either; but a British man-of-war is a fine sight."

And the last words broke out into national boasting.

"Ah, you like it because you are proud of your fleet. I am not an Englishman, and I should not be proud of it, you know," said Barletti, quietly.

"Look there!" exclaimed Mr. Frost, staring out to sea. "Do you see that boat putting off from the squadron? I think, from the outline, she must be coming from the *Forlorn*d; but without a glass it is impossible to be sure. How they pull, the blue-jackets! Just watch them. It's artistic. Strength, and the kind of grace that comes from strength and good will. See how they bend and rise, and how the oars all flash together. They are pulling for this nearest landing-place."

Mr. Frost craned his head out of the window to watch. Barletti, too, rose and looked out also. On came the trim boat manned by trim sailors. She seemed to scud over the sea like a living thing. As she drew near, they could see the dark blue uniform of an officer, who was steering. And they began to make out also two other figures—a man and a woman.

Visitors to the squadron, whom they're going to put ashore," said Mr. Frost.

The landing-place to which the boat came was at a considerable distance from the villa, so that they could not distinguish the features of the persons in the boat. But they saw a carriage which had been slowly driven up and down once or twice close by. Two servants descended from it, and half supported, half carried the gentleman who had been in the boat into the vehicle. The lady followed, and they drove off. The ship's boat then was pulled back again toward the squadron; and swiftly diminished to a mere speck on the waters.

The carriage, however, passed close beneath the windows of the hotel, and Barletti gave a little exclamation as he recognized the coachman on the box. The blinds of the carriage were down, and it was impossible to see its occupants; but Barletti had no doubt that they were Sir John Gale and Veronica.

"Guess!" said Barletti, with a pleased people who have just come from the Furious—Furious—what do you call it?"

Mr. Frost was looking at his watch. "I am sorry to turn you out," he said, "but I have an appointment with some of our directors at half past ten. It is a quarter past ten now. I must be off."

"Nay," replied Barletti, pulling out his own watch. You are fast, I think. By my watch it is only five minutes past ten."

"Ah, you're wrong, prince. If minutes were as precious with you as they are with me you would regulate your watch better. Why, only your time as rich men reckon their money—in large sums: and know nothing of small subdivisions. But mine is a working man's watch, man's watch, right to a second. And I set it last night by Greenwich time. Will you go first, or shall I lead the way?"

The dialogue between Barletti, following the lawyer out of the room. "I didn't strike me at first, but now I think how early it is, what in the world could have brought him out at this hour in the morning!"

"Eh?" said Frost, half turning round on the staircase.

"Nothing. I was only wondering why my friends choose such an hour to visit the squadron."

"The gentleman seems to be an invalid."

"Yes, he is ill and regularly used up. I heard from his physician that his doom is sure. He can't last much longer."

"Ah, indeed!" returned Frost, indifferently. His attention was more occupied in finding the book in the hall marked twenty-seven, on which to hang the key of his room, than in listening to Barletti.

"He is very rich—one of your English millionaires. Perhaps you know him," said Baronet Sir John Gale.

"Gale! Tullis Gale?"

"Ah, you know him?"

"I know of him, and nothing to his credit. I'm sorry if he's your friend; but in England he bears a very bad character.

"Oh, I have no special love for him," answered Barletti. "I believe him to be a rout and a vaurien."

"He used that poor wife of his infernally ill."

"Used her ill? The brute! I have suspected it.

"Oh, it's not a matter of suspicion. The story is well known enough. Well, I must be off. I may not see you again, prince. But I suppose our little affair is settled. Good-by!"

"Good-by! You really start to-morrow? Well, then—adieu!"

Mr. Frost walked away briskly. Barletti remained in the doorway of the hotel. He stood there pondering with an anxious look in his hand, and was roused from a reverie by the consciousness that some one was behind him wanting to pass out. He looked round, and saw an officer in the uniform of the English navy.

"Pardon!" said the officer, raising his cap courteously. Barletti took off his hat.

The officer had moved away a few paces, when he stopped, came back, and said in French:

"Excuse me, but are you staying at this hotel?"

"No. I came here merely to see a friend."

"Then you don't happen to know whether there is any one of that name here?" said the officer, showing a card with a name written on it. "The porter is very surly, or very stupid. I can't make nothing of him. But I have an idea that my friend must be here, if I could but get at him."

Barletti good-naturedly went into the porter's little glass den, and began to speak in voluble Neapolitan to a man who was doing duty there. He proved to be the porter's deputy, that chief functionary being absent temporarily from his post.

"If you don't mind waiting a few minutes," said Barletti, returning to the doorway, "the porter will be back. The fellow is understanding, understands only two words of French, and won't confess his ignorance. I have rated him in the strongest vernacular."

The officer made his acknowledgments, offered Barletti a cigar, and the two stood side by side before the porter's return.

"You have a number of mine visiting the squadron this morning," said Barletti, glancing curiously at the square-jawed, smooth-shaven face of the officer, who stood there with a certain massive imperturbability.

"Indeed! I was not aware of it."

"Up in the Furious?"

"The Furious, yes. Do you mean that the lady and gentleman who were rowed to the Furious this morning are friends of yours?"

"The gentleman is old and feeble?"

"Yes; old, and very poorly, but awfully shady and used up."

"The lady is young and beautiful?"

"Magnificently handsome."

"Yes, yes. Oh, I know them well. I was surprised to see him out so early."

"I suppose he thought there was no time to be lost. Beautiful weather, and anxious to manage these matters so that they shall be over before twelve o'clock."

"Before twelve?" I had no idea that that was a rule in your navy."

"Oh, not obviously in the navy," answered the officer, smiling a little.

"How? I don't understand."

"About as many marriages take place with us before twelve at noon."

"Marriages?"

The astonishment in Barletti's face was so deep and genuine that the officer stared in his turn.

"Did you not know?" he said. "I thought you told me that the bride and bridegroom were friends of yours?"

"The—the—bride and—? Oh, it must be a mistake. I was speaking of the lady and gentleman who were rowed to the Furious, whose place, not a quarter of an hour ago, in a little boat."

"To be sure! I was steering. I was ashore on leave."

"He is an Englishman—a rich—"

"Sir John Gale."

"Sir John. And they were, you say—?"

"They were married at the Consulate. The old boy—the baronet, I mean—was not strong enough to go on the journey to Gibraltar, where they might have been married before the British minister. So, as he knows Captain Burr, he got him to allow the ceremony to take place aboard the Furiosd. The young lady has the prospect of a speedy widowhood before her, it seems to me."

Barletti had felt like a man groping in a mist. Now, the light began to dawn. An explanation came like a sudden ray clearing the dim confusion. They suggested a pathway for his conjectures to follow; solved, before, all his doubts and perplexities. His first and most impressive impulse was to get away from the spot where he had been alone. He touched his hat hastily in farewell salutation to the officer, bolted an empty fiacre that was passing, and jumped into it.

The driver, with that penury of articulate speech and abundance of gesticulation which characterizes the lower Neapolitans, asked in dumb show which direction he was to drive in.

"Anywhere!" cried Barletti, throwing himself back on the seat. "To—to—the Villa Reale. Drive on till I stop you!"

ARGUING THE POINT.

Our engraving on page 21 furnishes an amusing illustration of the Irishman's proverbial fondness for argument. He is always ready to talk on any subject; and, as a general rule, his loquacity increases in exact proportion to his ignorance. Witty, ingenious, and imaginative, he rarely lets a reverence of accuracy or probability get the better of him; while an argument with a brother Irishman is literally a contest of Greek against Greek, from which both generally retire victorious, unless, as is sometimes the case, the war of words ends in a set-to with cudgels, when the hardest head still wins the day. The scene of our picture is the interior of an Irish alehouse; and the argument appears to be between the old village schoolmaster and a well-to-do but chronically-dissatisfied tenant-farmer, who never has far to go in search of grievances. He appears to be "terribly in earnest," and to be getting the better of the mild old gentleman sitting opposite, who has lost his spectacles during the air of benign perplexity; while a third party, evidently a confirmed wag, is enjoying the fun. He argument, lays his hand on the speaker's arm in the hope of interrupting him a moment, and getting a word in edgeways. Even the bareheaded waiter-girl stops to listen on her way to the kitchen, her attention diverted from her beer-drawing intense interest and curiosity. We are left in doubt as to the point of the argument; but whatever it may be, we may be sure that to-morrow farmer has his own mind made up on the subject, and that nothing the mild old gentleman can say will change his opinion in the least.

ENNUI.

"Ennui" is enumerated by Dr. Noirot among things eminently destructive of life. We have scarcely an equivalent in the English language; but it is idleness in youth, surfeit in the midst of abundance, and, in short, all that Webster indicates moral depression is as baneful to existence as that which induces physical depression. "Ennui" will kill, therefore, as fast as the most powerful animic means. The seven cerebral passions, fear, hope, hatred, love, reminiscence, justice, and force. The seven moral sins, pride, avarice, idleness, luxury, envy, anger, and gluttony. Ennui is reported to be long life, the other fatal to it. The force of the will, by giving it a tone to the nervous fibrilla of the soul, strengthens the principle of life, and enables both mind and body to resist all that is pernicious and evil. Fear produces depression on the other hand, delivers it up helpless to the enemy. Hunger is long good while man sustaining thus even strength of will devoted to mere selfish ends. It is the feeling which enables a soldier to man to perform his duties with cheerfulness and impunity in time of pestilence and plague. Fabrizi, afflicted by a fatal complaint, withdrew to the country to die. A family of peasants supplicated his aid in the case of a disastrous accident; and their gratitude was so lively and sincere for the cure effected, that the physician felt that if his life was not utterly useless, he had at least a reason for existence that of others. He resumed his labors, recovered his health, and lived. Pinel, Esquirol, Broussais, Fodere, and Huefeld, all believed that great power of will could induce prolongation of life. It is certainly powerful to relieve. Many used to say that most nervous disorders are due to idleness and luxurious habits. Many conditions of debility, discomfort, distress, and anxiety arise, indeed, from mere fretful and cowardly giving way to unreasonable terrors. The good French Revolution roused many poor, sickly, and languishing persons to health and activity.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THERE is no more appropriate New-Year's gift than some one of the expository volumes now offered to the public, in which literary and artistic merit are happily combined. The most fastidious purchaser can not complain of the illustrations made produced in this country. Some imported works are more elaborately finished, it is true, in splendid and costly binding, but not more effective and beautiful. But a little examination of the volumes, which at this holiday season are laid out in the sales-rooms of our book-stores, will cause every one to feel exceedingly well satisfied with the taste displayed in this department. The literary atmosphere of these rooms is delightful; and, as we have said, the illustrations of many books there is no end, no one, be he ever so devouring a book-worm, can hope to read one-half the interest literature has sent her thing is to be the new books, to glance over the table of contents; or, if not the much to dip into the pages, and look at the glimpses of the outsides. If you can not do even the latter, get a good grasp of the publisher's circular, and then you will keenly enjoy reading over the titles of new books with the brief notice usually appended. It will be a refreshing thing to see if we are fond of knowing what is going on in the literary world.

WHEN Dickens wrote a novel—if you supposed that his daughters were left with very insufficient provision for the future. Mr. Collins's brother, the Elder, Thackeray's publishers, sent to them a check-book, with every check signed, for them to fill up as they pleased, and Mr. Collins, in afterward quoting the father left his daughters comparatively poor.

Paul de Cassagnac has published a book of friends among the young folks. And we fancy a good many children of older growth will confess to reading it. Lost in the crowd, at first, with little interest. The graphic narrative is most entertaining, and every top that draw a sigh of regret when he reaches the last page.

The immense collection of paintings belonging to the estate of Frederick Lawrence, Esq., Inc. of Boston, will not be exhibited in that city, but are now being arranged to be sold at auction in New York, probably some time in January, and after being exhibited in the public rooms for a week or auction.

The new Brooklyn Market is built of Philadelphia brick with Nova Scotia stone trimmings. It has a frontage of 150 feet on Adams Street, and contains eighty-eight stalls, which are handsomely finished. There is a comfortable restaurant attached to the building, and the upper stories are to be fitted up as a club-room.

Last winter the course of scientific lectures delivered under the auspices of the American Institute was most successful, and this year it promises to be better. The year promises to be equally interesting. The names of Professor J. C. Draper, Professor Barnard, of Williams College, Dr. Gould, of Cambridge, and Professor Newberry, of Columbia, who are the lecturers for January, are a sufficient guaranty. The subjects are: "The Air and Respiration." "The Connection of Natural Science and Mental Philosophy;" "The Constitution of the Sun;" and "The Colorado Plateau, its Canons and Ruined Cities." The lectures occur on Friday evenings, at the Cooper Union.

Except in the juvenal school-boy, and to the few young folks who indulge not only the wish but the opportunity of a jolly sleigh-ride, snow in New York is generally regarded as a nuisance. So, indeed, is the presence of a crowded streets. But on the inside the fleecy snow is a provident covering for the rootplants that would without it perish. In many sections of the country, where the ground is not artificially without snow to protect the crops from the frost. Snow is also a valuable fertilizer, which thrifty farmers appreciate.

"Madame How and Lady Why" is the title of a forthcoming publication of Charles Kingsley, everyone's new work is a second series of the "Idylls of the King." A Protestant version of the complete works of Longfellow will shortly be published in Paris.—George Cruikshank is illustrating John B. Gough's book for the English market.—Two profound and valuable books have recently appeared in the foreign market—one is "A New Method of Studying Languages," the other an "Icelandic-English Dictionary." The Icelandic Grammar of the British Parliament has been published in Japan.

Some enterprising Englishmen have purchased a large establishment, and fitted up with steam the 1200 head of cattle, and she is now reported on her way to Rotterdam, Texas to receive a similar number for the book. The intention is to supply the English market with fresh meat, which will certainly be dear in the genuine English breat and palate—as a prize will be in the reach of people of moderate means.

The Bible of William the Silent, a rare chromo just published, which will be likely to be a favorite, especially among those who admire of the arts. A splendid painting is by Thomas Bill. Another new chromo is from J. G. Brown's picture entitled "Why Don't Speak." Among the nice effects of light and dark, so marked in the original, are admirably reproduced. Among other chromos are "Rural Felicity," and the "Launching if the Life-Boat." "A Family Scene in Chapel," "Father Time of Ages," "Fruit and Flowers," &c.

The progress of the age is indicated by the acumen of juvenile critics:

"Mamma," a three-year-old boy, "what is Mr. —'s baby doing?" He pointed to the chromo of "Contemplation."

"She's reading," said the mother.

"Reading!" repeated the child of the realist of the "What do you think she is doing, then?" asked the mother.

"She's crying because Mr. —— won't buy her any clothes!"

A new and effectual remedy for small-pox is now extensively employed in the Empire City, and is said to be regarded as a perfect cure. When the preceding symptoms of fever, and just before the eruption appears, the chest is rubbed with croton oil and tartar emetic ointment. This causes the whole of the eruption to appear on the chest, and at the end of the third day. The disease is then a full and complete eruption, and never prevents the diseases from attacking the internal organs.

Woman suffrage in Wyoming is established by the following act:

"Every woman of the age of twenty-one years, residing in this Territory, may, at all elections to be holden under the laws thereof, cast her vote. And their rights in this respect shall forever be secured. It shall be the same under the election laws of the Territory as those of male citizens."

The opposers of woman's rights say that there are even stronger reasons in the Empire State for the act that they are all "on the stump" for Congress!

Those who are fond of wearing moccasins, garage we should more correctly say really recommended—as an ornamental and delicious dish for the table. This is the mode of preparing it:

Boil a teacupful of the best rice till quite soft in milk, seasoning with powdered sugar and ground pip it up a dish. Lay on it different pieces squirrel cut up and previously fried in butter, and then heap up the whites of five eggs to a stiff froth, with a little powdered sugar. Put the dish in a moderate oven or warmth. Add to this, when beaten very stiff, about a teaspoonful of fresh cream, and lay it over the top of the dish.

The meaning of the names given to some of our tea brands may not be generally known. "Hyson" means "before the rain;" that is, early in the spring; hence it is often called "Young Hyson." "Hyson Skin" is the refuse of the above, and therefore cheaper; and for which is "tea skins." "Bohea" is the name of the hills in the region in which it is collected. "Pecoe," or "Pecco," means the white tips, the down of tender leaves. "Pouchong" means folded plant; "Souchong," small plant. "Twankay" is the name of a small river in the region from whence it is brought. "Congo" is the coarsest and slightly labor, from the care required in its preparation.

Among the follies of the day may be mentioned a new-style wicker carriage recently built by Mr. Burdsall, of Long Branch. A gold ring was offered as a prize to the couple who should accomplish all complete. An admirable design couples started off gayly; at one only three remained on the road, and only one got there ever ago. At the end of the fourth hour blood began to trickle from the ends of the violinists' fingers; but still the dance continued. At three minutes past four one of the ladies fainted, and immediately afterward her partner followed her example. The ring was presented to the winners amidst the tumultuous applause of the spectators. The fleeting pleasure rendered than silver, were carried to their homes, with their limbs and bodies in a most extreme state. All the fun we now said to be in a precarious condition.

The radical signification of etiquette is a ticket. But as adopted in France it is the code of rules or rule of good-manners. Formerly, on cards of invitation, rules or instructions were given as to the hour the persons invited were expected to behave; or, in other words, they were furnished with a programme of the proceedings. From this custom it is said that the word has come to bear its present acceptation. It is a curious study to go back to the derivation of words, and see how far some of them have diverged from their original meaning.

A labyrinth of telegraph wires extends over housetops in some parts of New York city. Two hundred lines converge from the different stations of the telegraph offices are scattered over the city, which give employment to two hundred and fifty operators.

THE LATE EDWIN M. STANTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY AND CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

THE LATE EDWIN M. STANTON.

THIS eminent statesman and patriot, whose great services during the most trying period of our history have entitled him to the nation's lasting gratitude, died at Washington, D. C., on the morning of December 24. He was known to be in a delicate state of health, brought on by exacting labors in the War Department, and the intelligence of his decease was not altogether unexpected.

The record of Mr. STANTON'S life is honorable alike to himself and the nation which he served so faithfully and so well. He was born in 1815, in the village of Steubenville, Ohio; studied a year at Kenyon College in 1833; served as a bookseller's clerk at Columbus, while studying law; was admitted to the bar in 1836, and began the practice of his profession in Harrison County, where he soon acquired a high reputation for ability in the argument of abstruse questions of law, as well as for success with juries. He also became known as an active politician of the Democratic school, of which Senators ALLEN and TAPPAN were leaders in that State. In 1848 he removed to Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and thence, in 1857, transferred his residence to the National Capital, where his ability in the management of cases arising under the patent laws brought him constant and lucrative practice.

Until the troublous times of rebellion and secession came upon the nation, Mr. STANTON was chiefly known as a successful lawyer and energetic political partisan. The people at large had little knowledge of him until he was called, toward the close of President BUCHANAN'S term of office, to take the post of Attorney-General, vacated by Mr. BLACK, who had succeeded General CASS as Secretary of State. In this position he was associated with Judge HOLT, Secretary of War, and General DIX, Secretary of the Treasury; and it was chiefly owing to the patriotism and energy of these three men that the country was not involved in total ruin before the inauguration of Mr. LINCOLN relieved the country of an imbecile President. Mr. STANTON'S eminent services in that trying time were well known to Mr. SEWARD and other leaders of the Republican party, with whom he was brought into close and intimate relations; and upon Mr. CAMERON'S retirement from the post of Secretary of War, in President LINCOLN'S Cabinet, about a month before the capture of Fort Donelson revived the drooping spirit of the North, Mr. STANTON was chosen to succeed him; not only on account of the ability previously displayed in dealing with secession, but also because it was thought desirable to give a prominent part in the work of the Administration to some representative man of the war Democrats, who were nobly sustaining the President in his efforts to maintain the integrity of the Union.

At this time Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. STANTON were known to each other by reputation only; and their first meeting took place when Mr. STANTON called at the White House to receive his commission. But from that day until the President was stricken down by the hand of the assassin, the intimacy between these two remarkable men was distinguished by a cordiality and confidence such as history rarely records. While Mr. LINCOLN was scarcely ever seen at the other executive departments, he was a constant visitor at the War Office. His tall, spare form, wrapped in his familiar gray shawl, was usually seen making its way along the back alley that leads there from the White House at from nine to ten o'clock in the morning, or about four in the afternoon; and persons who were admitted to see the Secretary in his private rooms at these hours would often find the President stretched out upon a sofa there, as if the discussion between him and Mr. STANTON had not yet been concluded. How well founded was the confidence reposed in his integrity and ability was proved by the manner in which the Secretary discharged his duties when the awful catastrophe that robed the nation in mourning, for a brief space of time left the affairs of government entirely in his hands.

Of his history while in control of the War Department, of his tireless energy and pre-eminent ability in the management of the momentous trust committed to his charge, we have not space, nor is it necessary, to speak in detail. His record is written in the heart of the people, and it is not left for history to do his memory justice. Nor is it necessary to dwell at length on his course during the contest between Congress and President JOHNSON on the question of reconstruction, which resulted in his retirement from the post which he had filled with such great ability and honor. The facts of this memorable struggle are too fresh in the public mind to require repetition here. He finally retired from the War Department in June, 1868, on the acquittal of President JOHNSON, and since that time has held no public office. A short time since he was nominated by President GRANT to a position on the Supreme Bench of the United States, and was confirmed by the Senate, only a few days before his death, by a vote of forty-six to eleven.

In person MR. STANTON was of heavy frame, broad-shouldered, and about five feet eight inches in height. When in health his features were round and full; his complexion was rather sallow, and his hair dark though thin. Though his ordinary expression was thoughtful, absorbed, and even stern, especially when he was occupied with important affairs, his smile was sweet and winning, and among friends his manners were gentle and engaging.

MR. STANTON was twice married. His second wife, who survives him, was MISS ELLEN DICKINSON, of Pittsburg. He has four children: a son of some thirty years, by his first marriage; and one son and two daughters by the second.

HOME FROM THE WARS.

ON this page we give an engraving, from a picture by the eminent English artist, Mr. GEORGE THOMAS, representing a soldier lad, "home from the wars," narrating his adventures to his old father and mother, while his little brother listens, with eyes and mouth wide open, to the exciting story; and a regimental chum stands by, ready, if necessary, to corroborate his comrade's statements. The old farmer appears to be scarcely less interested than the little boy in the story—it may be of the Crimean or the Indian war; while the mother wears a look of calm contentment on her wrinkled face. She evidently cares more to have her boy back again safe and honored than to hear of the dangers and adventures through which he has passed. Not but that she is proud of him in his smart uniform and jaunty cap; and perhaps affectionately thinks of the difference between him and the rustics of his own age who have remained at home; for, after all that may be said against wars from a humanitarian point of view, it can not be denied that military discipline and the uniform do a great deal for a man. Our soldierly friend in the picture, with his big beard, his intelligent face, upright bearing, and frank, manly mien, was once probably a clumsy rustic, honest and good-hearted, but not overburdened with intelligence. It was a good day for him when he enlisted, and was sent off to fight the rebels in India or the Russians in the Crimea. Military drill and discipline and hard service have "made a man of him," as the drill-sergeants say, with justifiable pride in their profession. Our own recent war furnished thousands of incidents like this, and the truth and naturalness of our picture will be felt in many American households that still remember the happy day of proud rejoicing when the son and brother "came home from the wars."

HOME FROM THE WARS.—[FROM A PAINTING BY GEORGE THOMAS.]

THE SIREN.

"O mariner, O mariner,
Oh, turn thy bark to land;
O weary, weary mariner,
Look on this pleasant strand!
Full of death the wide seas roll
Still between thee and thy goal.
Here on this Elysian shore
I will sing such songs to thee,
Thou hast never, never more
Shalt know toil or misery.

"O mariner, O mariner!
The tempest breaketh black;
O weary, weary mariner,
About thy onward track.
Here no dread of sorrow flies
O'er joy's ever-crystal skies.
Here on this Elysian shore
I will sing such songs to thee,
That thou never, never more
Shalt know toil or misery.

"Here, mariner, O mariner!
Is life without a tear;
Here, weary, weary mariner,
Is life without a fear.
Here ambition never frets,
And hope e'en to hope forgets.
Here on this Elysian shore
I will sing such songs to thee,
That thou never, never more
Shalt know toil or misery."

"O Siren fair, O Siren false!
God's finger beckoneth me,
O Siren fair, O Siren false!
Across the stormy sea.
Peace dwells upon the mounting wave
More than in the living grave—
Grave of thy Elysian shore,
Death in life is life with thee;
Hearts outlive the tempest's roar,
Not thy false felicity.

GHOSTS, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

We shall appreciate more thoroughly the vast difference which has grown up between the primitive old ghost and the shadowy phantom to which he has now dwindled down, if we consider the means which were commonly adopted of old to get rid of each of them when the supernatural presence became insufferable. The average ghost of later times is a wicked soul that has escaped from the place of punishment, and has come back to trouble the world with merely spiritual mischief, and he is encountered with the weapons of the exorcist, who raises about him a devotional and unconquerable barrier from which he has no liking, as glad to retreat even to his penal fires. A very different line of conduct was adopted to meet the ghost of old. He was of the earth earthy, and so strictly local a personage, that it was as much the recognized duty of the landlord to see that a tenement was free from ghosts as that it was wind and water tight. "There is a ghost about the premises," said a farmer to his landlord one morning in the year of grace 1010; "he has killed a good many of my cattle, and one or two men; and folks think he will be the ruin of the whole country-side: if I can not get something done for me, I must throw up the farm." When the landlord heard this, says the old sagaman, he did not see his way out of the difficulty. If he was unequal to the task, the obligation devolved upon the lord of the manor, as the lawful authority who was responsible for the orderly state of the country. The way in which he proceeded to abate the nuisance varied with the habits and temper of the intruder. In the case of a tolerably reasonable ghost, the representative of public order would expostulate, pointing out the illegality of his conduct in coming out of his grave every night with a crew of dead men, and establishing himself before the fire in a house in which he had only a life interest which had now determined; and the ghost has been known to rejoin, "Well, we will go, I thought all along we had no locality;" when an amount of law-abidingness which was not invariably displayed by living Scottish ghosts, or, if, as usually happened, arguments were thrown away, somebody was obliged to undertake the more dangerous business of putting him out bodily, like any other trespasser; and old-sea-rovers were fond of boasting to their journeys of the speeches which in their young days they had brought to book. But if after such a forcible ejection he would not quiet in his grave, but persist in coming home to the homestead, threw the shepherd over a cliff on a frosty evening, or made other nights make such ghostly sounds outside the house as to worry men mad, the family would at last make up their minds to lay him at once and forever. Now he could exist so long only as those objects were still in being to be took daylight; if these, therefore, came to an end, he perished with them. Thus robber ghosts live on while their family flourishes, and bread its impending ruin as their own extinction. If the departed have been violently attached to some piece of property, let the treasure be destroyed, and the spectre will be seen no more. If the dead man has been a bad and degraded being, let his body be dug up and burned to ashes, and the ghost shall never trouble any one again. But some spectres there are which never can be effectually laid. If a man has been deeply skilled in forbidden arts, which he has exercised only to the injury of his fellow-creatures—if he can chant a song which drives his enemy to sleeplessness, to madness, or to death, or if his evil-eye can burn up the grass—the ghost of such a one will not perish with the body; for what the living man most loved is mischief; and although his corpse may be burned or buried in a pathless moor, or deep below the sea, "some wicked spirit still pervades the spot," and makes the neighborhood terrible forever.

The ancient ghost delighted in skulls, winding-sheets, and charnel-houses, haunted the scenes of former joys and crimes, could not cross a running stream, and so loved darkness that it swooned at the light of a candle. All this was very reasonable; for it had no new home in another world, was merely a fresh combination of earthly materials, and derived much of its power from an unholy alliance with monsters who dwelt in caves, abominated the light of the sun, lest they should be turned into stone—a calamity which befell many a loitering elf. But matters do not stand thus with the modern ghost; the bodiless spirit which hankers after the foul prison from which it has been set free, which appears to be still subject to the laws of matter, or which condescends to restrict its visits to

The silent, solemn hour
When night and morning meet, is plainly acting on no principle at all, but is only observing old forms from which life is departed, and is as unreal a being as the men in armor at the lord mayor's show. All his trappings hold a formidable meaning once, but no one fears the obsolete creature now; and only antiquaries can guess the object of the stage-properties in which he is arrayed.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER for Dec. 25 contains a splendid full-page engraving of the PRIZE FOWLS at the recent State Poultry Show —the best Poultry picture ever given in an American newspaper. Also, a magnificent CHRISTMAS PICTURE, and other fine illustrations. For sale by all newsdealers; price 8 cents. See advertisement of the RURAL in this paper.—[Com.]

CRAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LEGS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hegeman's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Fifty cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 50 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

FOR COLDS, COUGHS, BRONCHITIS, and all affections of the LUNGS, take AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS

LARGEST—BEST—CHEAPEST

MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER,

THE GREAT ILLUSTRATED

RURAL, LITERARY, AND FAMILY WEEKLY.

MOORE'S RURAL excels in CONTENTS, SIZE, STYLE, ILLUSTRATIONS, &c. SIXTEEN Double-Quarto Pages, of Five Columns each. Many Illustrations. Handsomely Printed, Neatly Printed, and Adapted to both Town and Country. The RURAL is prudently and splendidly Illustrated—the volume just closed containing Over Eight Hundred Engravings!

THE BEST TIME FOR 1870

will be the Largest, Best, and Cheapest ILLUSTRATED JOURNAL OF ITS CLASS in the World. Only $3 a Year; $2 50 in Clubs. All who form Clubs will get

"GOOD PAY FOR DOING GOOD!"

A choice of Over One Hundred Valuable Premiums! Specimens, Premium Lists, &c., sent free. Address

D. D. T. MOORE, 41 Park Row, New York.

STANDARD PHONOGRAPHY.—The best Short-Hand System used by many thousands, without a teacher. From GRAHAM'S MANUAL. $2 50, postpaid.—Outline, &c., Two Hours' Lesson, 25 cts. Reporting Phonographic Institute, &c., Weekly. Phonographic Visitor, 20 cts. a year. Address

A. J. GRAHAM, 563 Broadway, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS,

PERFECTED IMPROVEMENTS. Lightest, best, and now better than ever. Send for pamphlet to

WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, 916 Broadway, N. Y.

MUSIC for HOLIDAY GIFTS.—BOOSEY'S Standard Piano-forte and Vocal Works, elegantly bound, including Operas, Overtures, Songs, Quadrilles, complete, $8: MOZART'S Sonatas, complete, $7: BEETHOVEN'S Sonatas, complete, $7. Address the principal Operas, $3: Drawing-Room Music-Book, $3: Dance-Music-Book, $3: Sacred Music-Book, containing 100 Vocal and Instrumental Pieces, $3: Chopin's Mazurkas and Valses, complete, $2 50: Schumann's Album for the Young, $2 50: Gems of Strauss, 100 Waltzes, $2: Gems of Ireland (50 Songs), $2: Scottish Gems (50 Songs), $2: Gems of Germany (50 Songs), $2: Book (36 Songs), $2: Verdi Album (20 of Verdi's best Songs), $2: Balfe Album (20 of Balfe's best Songs), $2: Standard Song-Book (90 best Songs ever written), $2: English Ballad-Book (50 best Songs), $2: Complete Operas, Oratorios, and large collections of Vocal and Instrumental Music, at $2 50 per book. Any book paid for, postage ready, free to any address. BOOSEY & Co.'s CATALOGUE of Music, containing 1,000 works, sent free on application or sent free. BOOSEY & CO., 944 Broadway, N. Y.

A LITTLE SICKER

to make well, a false heir. Quit it, and try WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT, of 761 Chatham Square, N.Y. Sold by druggists.

MAN IN GENESIS AND IN GEOLOGY. Or, THE BIBLE ACCOUNT OF MAN'S CREATION, Tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin. By J. P. THOMPSON, D.D., LL.D. Price $1. Sold by booksellers, and sent first post by

R. H. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

22 Feet Front—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,

(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,

IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,

SALESROOM OF THE United States Watch Company,

13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

Manufacturers of 45 Grades of AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,

BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three plain Conical Pivots, Cap Jewelled, is Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for our late improvement in the STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and ACCURACY hitherto maintained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

28th Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

WATCH NO. 1064—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months; its total variation from mean time being only one second per month. WILLARD DERBY,
Of Derby, Snow, & Prentiss, Jersey City, N. J.

WATCH NO. 1124—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by the United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months; its total variation from mean time being only six seconds.
A. L. DENNIS, President N. J. R. R. T. & T. Co.

WATCH NO. 1121—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me four months; its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.
F. A. HASKELL, Com. Hudson River R. R.

WATCH NO. 1177—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months; its total variation from mean time being only an average of two-thirds of a second per day.
E. F. PHELPS, Con. N. J. Central R. R.

WATCH NO. 1178—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me since June, 1867; its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.
TREAS. PASSAIC R. R., 65 Wall St.

WATCH NO. 12012—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co. Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months; its total variation from mean time being only twelve seconds.
GEO. LOVEJ, Gen'l Eastern
Pass'r Agt. Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

WATCH NO. 1279—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months; its total variation from mean time being only eight seconds per month. Have been traveling through different sections of the country, from New York to Galveston, Texas, and back, by steamer and railroad.
H. H. RICE, Jr., Rice, Kendall, & Co., Brooklyn, N. Y.

SYRACUSE, PA., Feb. 26, 1869.

WATCH NO. 1176—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months; its total variation from mean time being only three seconds per day that time.
HENRY DE LANCEY, Engineer Phila. & Erie R. R.

WATCH NO. 1180—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months; its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds in the time.
A. H. KING, 7 Park Place, N. Y.,
Vice-Pres. Empire City Screw Dock Co.,
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., established and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $500 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run. Secured by a mortgage to the Trustees' Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The road is now under contract to be finished at the rate of $15,000 per mile, covers a completed road bed, and has the rails down for 100 miles from St. Joseph. The line connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney will make a short and through route to California. The Company have a Capital Stock of.....$10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Government of 1,000,000 acres, valued, at the present estimate, at.....4,000,000

Leaving a margin of.....1,500,000

Total.....$15,500,000

Lands of Road, $2 50 per acre. Price fifty and interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, for sale, $1,000,000 of the Bonds of the Company. These bonds being so well secured, and yielding a large income, are a desirable investment for parties seeking a permanent home.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,
No. 49 Wall Street, New York.
TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,
No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of Seventy-five Second-hand Pianos, of seven octaves, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for cash during the WEEK. Also, will take from $3 to $25 monthly until paid; the same to be let, and rent money applied if purchased. New 7-Octave Pianos for $178 and upward; New Organs for $65 and upward, for cash.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, MONTHLY, or BAZAR, $4, and THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, sent to one address for $6, by A. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

VINEGAR, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Circulars free. Address F. J. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

VICK'S

FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1870.

THE FIRST EDITION OF OVER HUNDRED AND THIRTY THOUSAND NOW READY. Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published and ready to send out. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, with about 600 fine wood Engravings of the choicest and Vegetables, and Colored Plate—consisting of seven varieties of Phlox Drummondii, magnificent.

BOUQUET OF PHLOXES.

It is the most beautiful as well as the most instructive Floral Guide published. Every plant and flower-garden directions for the CULTURE OF FLOWERS AND VEGETABLES.

The Floral Guide is published for the benefit of my customers, to whom it is sent free without application. It will be forwarded to all who apply by mail, for TEN CENTS, which is not half the cost.

Address JAMES VICK,
Rochester, N. Y.

HALF-DOLLAR MUSIC!

FOR THE MILLION.

Cheapest Musical Publications in the World.

BRAINARD'S MUSICAL ALBUMS.

No. 1 contains 19 Vocal and Instrumental Pieces.
No. 2 contains 20 Choice New Songs and Quartettes.
No. 3 contains 24 Popular New Comic Songs.
No. 4 contains 22 Beautiful Songs and Duets.
No. 5 contains 18 Instrumental Pieces for Piano.

Each number contains 48 pages, sheet-music size, beautifully bound. Price only 50 cents. Copies mailed to any address on receipt of price. Liberal discount to the trade. Other numbers will rapidly follow. Sold by music dealers generally. Send for catalogue of all orders to S. BRAINARD & SONS, Publishers, Cleveland, O.

1870. THE NURSERY. 1870.

The best, cheapest, and most richly ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1 00 a year, in advance. Simple number, 10 cents. Subscriptions may begin at any time. Specimen, 6 cents. Address

JOHN L. SHOREY, 13 Washington St., Boston.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
Mrs. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N.J.

S. W. GEERY,

IMPORTER,

Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 110 Broadway,

Established in 1858. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

FOUND AT LAST.—Watches Superseded.—The Dollar Time-Keeper. A Patent Self-Winding Keyless-cased in Oroide of Gold, Superior Compass Attachment, Second Hand, Hour and Minute. Stem Winding and Setting. Stands any shock, whether accidental or case, warranted five years, superb and elegant, entirety of material. The Key to Condition. It is surely new, patented. 650 sold in three weeks. Only 3 left, have for 1870. In sent on trial. Five Trials supplied. Address the sole manufacturers, MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Boston, Mass., 44 to 52.

HUNTER'S GUIDE—Revised, Enlarged, New Secrets added. 34,000 already sold. Twenty-seventh edition of 8000 copies NOW READY. Revised, twenty new tanning secrets added (three cost $5 each). THE HUNTER'S GUIDE AND TRAPPER'S GUIDE. PANNON tells how to hunt and trap ALL animals, from mink to bear, to make traps, bait, skin, How to tan and dress all hides, &c., &c., to color furs and feathers, to stuff birds and animals. The secrets given in this book would cost 50 any where else. Learn how to hunt, fish, has hunting narratives, &c., &c. A NEW BOOK, with practical secrets, 64 pp., 12mo. (not 81) but 48 cents: six for $1; mailed free. Beware of "Recipes." "Information for Everybody." Sold by all dealers. All wholesale newsdealers sell it. Send for one. Worth 10 to any hunter, farmer, or boy. Only a quarter. Address

HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

"IT STILL WAVES."—The old favorite, the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." January number just out: now a rare time to economize. Every number contains 40 long columns, 8 pages; Ledger size, 40 long columns of reading matter, 8 pages; 320 columns of "swelling music" each month. Remember, in fact, the whole paper is brimming with the Home, Fun, Music and Nonsense. Wit, Wisdom, Wild Fun, Fact, and Fancy. It is Rich, Rare, and Racy: Smart, Spicy, and Sparkling. Let subscriptions date last year, and is bound to "show up" rascality without fear or favor. Only TWENTY-FIVE CENTS LIKE IT. Is well instanced, unique, and will SAVE YOU MONEY. We give the vest-pocket plan. Only 25 cents in size, entitled "Evangeline," mount it on collet, and send 5 CENTS, and the paper till 1871 for 25 cents. For cents. Regarding alone sells for $2. It is NOT a "sell." That long-suppressed book, "Evangeline," the Largest circulation in New Hampshire. If you try it, you will be pleased with it. Don't fail to send for it, though it is astonishing. NOW IS JUST THE TIME. We will refund your money if you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED. IT IS TRULY A GREAT OFFER. Buy a copy of any newsman, or send six cents and receive one or more. Newsmen, you get the usual large parlor engraving "Evangeline" (richly worth $5), and the paper is a week's run, or half the money back. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED, or will return your cash. Address "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

WATCH SWINDLES. Humbug Music Boxes. No Begs Money. Poor confirms of "Institutions" in the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER."

S. S. B. "SO SAID BILL." The Star-Spangled Banner. Other saints has from sending for $50 to a swindler.

1 1-2 BY 2 FEET IS THE superb new plate "Evangeline," given free to all who send 15 cents for the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" for 1870.

PERFECTLY RELIABLE. Established 1863. Satisfaction Guaranteed. "Star-Spangled Banner" 75 cents a year.

DO NOT BE SWINDLED.—Read "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER."

IMMENSE SUCCESS

Emerson's Unequaled Church Music Book!

The Choral Tribute.

35,000 Now in Use.

Price, $1 50. $13 50 per dozen.

Sample Copies mailed free on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

C. H. DITSON & CO., New York, Publishers.

SUBSCRIBE NOW.

Either Harper's Monthly, Weekly, or Bazar, $4 00 each, and Maple Leaves, 50 cents, each one address for one year for $4 00, by G. A. ROORBACH, Box 5643, New York.

POCKET REVOLVERS, WEST'S Six Shooter. A neat, durable weapon: four-inch barrel, 32 rim fire, 7 charges, 22 inches. 36 G. AUSTIN, Elmir, Mich.

WESTERN FARMS, City and Suburban Lots. J. H. B. HENDERSON, 1104 Benchard st., Chicago.

Juvenile Books for the Holidays.

ABBOTT'S FRANCONIA STORIES. Numerous illustrations. Complete in 10 vols., 16mo, Cloth, 10 cents each. The volumes may be purchased separately, or complete in neat case, $2 00.

Mullenville.—Mary Bell.—Agnes Hine.—Wallace. —Beechnut.—Stuyvesant.—Agnes.—Mary Erskine.—Rodolphus.—Caroline.

ABBOTT'S LITTLE LEARNER SERIES. Harper's Picture Books for Boys and Girls. Beautifully illustrated. In 6 volumes, 90 cents each. The volumes complete in a handsome and neat pasteboard box. Or set complete in case for $4 50.

Learning to Talk.—Learning to Think.—To Read.—About Common Things.—About Right and Wrong.

ABBOTT'S MARCO PAUL'S Voyages and Travels in the Pursuit of Knowledge. Beautifully Illustrated. Complete in 6 vols. 16mo, Cloth, 70 cents each. The volumes may be obtained separately; or, complete in neat case, for $3 60.

In New York.—On the Erie Canal.—In the Forests of Maine.—In Vermont.—In Boston.—At the Springfield Armory.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Send by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the above.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—Evening Telegram, Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be run on climate.

C. E. COLLINS & Co., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

WILL CONTINUE TO OFFER

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

IN

ALL THE DEPARTMENTS

OF THEIR

RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT,

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, AND TENTH STREET.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

WILL OPEN, ON MONDAY, DECEMBER 27, A

LARGE AND CHOICE STOCK OF

GLOVES, HOSIERY, UNDERGARMENTS,

NECKTIES, SCARFS,

SILK AND LINEN CAMBRIC HANDKERCHIEFS,

Dressing-Gowns, Linen and Cotton Shirts, &c.,

AT EXTREMELY ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, AND TENTH STREET.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with employment at their own homes, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from $5 to $ per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of Home and Fireside, one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free. Address KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.

The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Everybody likes it. Three editions: DAILY, $6 a year. WEEKLY, $1; and WEEKLY, $1 a year. All the NEWS and Markets. Terms cash. Specimens free. Agents wanted and Paid Liberally. Address, The Sun, New York.

"One of the best-conducted agricultural journals in the country."

The favorable opinion above is given by the RURAL NEW YORKER of this week.

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading paper of its class in New England.

TERMS: Weekly, $2 00; Monthly, $1 00, per year. Postage stamps for specimens sent to applicants. Address

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

LANE HORSES.—Contracted feet permanently improved. Sore shins, ringbone, and diseases arising from contraction. Every horse-owner should have this work. 24,000 sold by the War Dep't. Used with great success for more than five years. Recommended and practiced by the most eminent horsemen in the country. Enclose $1 to HENRY BLAIR, Manchester, Vt.

1870.—THE NURSERY, the best, cheapest, and most entertaining Child's Paper. Only $2 50 a year. MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1 50 a year, in clubs. Sample number, 15 cents. Specimens free. Just got the two numbers of this year FREE. Address DIO LEWIS, SHOBEL, 17 West Washington St., Boston.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR PRIEST and NUN.

Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1305 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A HANDSOME FULL-SIZ Photograph Album, holding 26 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 25 cts.; 12 for $2. Circulars free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

$60 a week for Agents, Boys or Ladies, in their own town. No capital wanted. Address YOUNG & Co., 769 Broadway, N. Y.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD RUNTING WATCHES, Collins Metal Improved Oroide. These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their superiority for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, that we now offer them at reduced Prices:—Horizontal Watches, $10, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100; Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $20, equal to $300 Gold ones.

We have just commenced making a very fine American Watch, Jeweled, patent lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, and position, 4½ ounces dress weight, equal to $500 Watches, for time to a Gold Watch costing $200.

We guarantee all of these magnificent watches. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Collins Metal, $3 to $5. Also, a full line of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be run on climate.

C. E. COLLINS & Co., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The Great Pictorial Annual.

Hostetter's United States Almanac for 1870, for distribution, gratis, throughout the United States and all civilized countries of the Western Hemisphere, is now ready for distribution, and all who wish to understand the true philosophy of health should read and ponder the valuable suggestions it contains. In addition to an admirable medical treatise on the causes, prevention, and cure of a great variety of diseases, it embraces a large amount of information interesting to the merchant, the mechanic, the miner, the planter, the professional man; and the calculations have been made for each meridians and latitudes as are most suitable for a correct and comprehensive NATIONAL CALENDAR.

The nature, uses, and extraordinary sanitary effects of the staple tonic and alterative of more than half the Christian world, are fully set forth. Other articles are also interspersed with pictorial illustrations, valuable recipes for the use of invalids and farm, receipts for cordons, and other instructive and amusing readingmatter, original and selected. Among the Annuals appearing at the opening of the year, this is one of the most useful, and may be had for the asking. The proprietors, Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, are receipt of a two-cent stamp, will forward a copy by mail to any person who will procure one in his neighborhood. The BITTERS are sold in every city, town, and village, and are extensively used throughout the entire civilized world.

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS,

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S MEDICATED INHALER OF CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained, in the treatment of that most distressing and humiliating disease. They are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, healing, and curative. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in a reasonable time. The medicated breathing the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks up the morbid secretions, destroys the fetid odor of corruption, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, dizziness, loss of smell, taste, hearing, sight, voice, throat hoarseness, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, confusion, sadness, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome disease at all its forms and stages, and cures the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GEORGE NORTON, office 11 John St., N. Y.

AGENTS!—OUR NEW

PICTORIAL FAMILY BIBLE

THE MOST POPULAR, SELLING AND PROFITABLE BOOKS OF ALL BOOKS.

Contains more than 1600 large & splendid Illustrations, 50,000 References, Directions for the Profitable Reading of Scripture, numerous valuable Tables, and a Family Record, &c., &c. Sold by Subscription only. Address, for Circulars and full particulars, address JOHN E. POTTER & CO., 614 and 616 Sansom St., Philadelphia. $7 Publishers of over 200 styles of Bibles.

Look for advertisement next week.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S

Establishment for the sale of

HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 29th Street.

Also, Hall Stoves, Ranges, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Old Silver replated. Gasfitting. Bronze and Brass work. Job notice. They are also prepared to contract for Hall Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

For Family use, simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking sent free. HEMLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 153 Broadway, N. Y.

PERFUMERY,

FLAVORING EXTRACTS, and TOILET SOAPS.

C. B. WOODWORTH & SON, Rochester, N.Y. N. Y. Office: 385 Broadway, Room 18.

CURL YOUR HAIR!

A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent FREE. It is curls straight hair in beautiful curls on the first application. Address, with stamp,

PROF. STRON, GARRETTSVILLE, OHIO.

EUCHRE.—Rules and Directions on the Pack. By permanently cured in one day. No pain! no medicine! no danger! Address (inclosing stamp and samp) JAS. SMITH, Jr., Box 67, Charlestown, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers for all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for valuable pictorial contributions.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a high literary character.

The Editorial Management of HARPER'S WEEKLY combines one of its most prominent features: In addition to weekly articles upon Political Topics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics,

In No. 474, for November 6, we commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each ample subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of the story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for HER—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of Journalism, and is everywhere the favorite of every intelligent family paper ever issued. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion, the BAZAR is unrivaled. Every Lady of Taste finds in it her authority, furnishing great expense, with the publication of a single number of any other fashion publication. The Fashion Plates are published in New York simultaneously with those of the best in Paris or London.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining miscellaneous—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial matter is always fresh, and covers every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently maintain for the BAZAR the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, and in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Twenty-Fifth Volume. During the quarter-century by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. It has been able to present the highest social variety of its contents: in the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for it the services of the best literary contributions of English and American writers; in the generally excellent and judicious character of its Illustration; to the promptness, authenticity, and popular interest of its Record of Current Events; in the steady increase of its circulation from the first, and upon current topics; and in the uniform confidence of its Special Editorial Departments. Within a year a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The Literary contents of the Back Numbers of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be the leading characteristic of the Magazine. It is confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public, HARPER'S MAGAZINE may secure its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical published in the United States. Thus the subscription at the present rate of Three Dollars will enable them to treat fully of all the topics which they discuss.

The Publishers feel themselves under no little obligation and anticipating for the future a continuance of that favor which has been extended to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, for one year, for any two for $7 00.

The postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 52 cents a year, payable yearly or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be sent to accompany with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 52 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When Subscribers remit money to pay for a year, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to write a letter of instructions.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of the Publishers is preferable to cash or Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a long space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A NEW DISCOVERY!!

PHALON'S

"VITALIA,"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaculent matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N. Y.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER,

prepared and sold for 13 years past at Toledo, Ohio, is now manufactured and sold at wholesale at 69 New St., New York.—DOOLEY & BROTHERS, Manufacturers.

EDWARD SEARS,
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
45 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502–504 BROADWAY,

Offer a Fresh Assortment of

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c., AT REDUCED PRICES.

AGENTS wanted for our new work,

Our Home Physician.

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By Dr. Geo. M. Beard. It tells what to do and how to do it in every emergency. Quackery, Humbuggery, and Patent Medicines exposed. It is the only reliable Family Doctor Book published. Get it, and save Life, Health, and Money. E. B. TREAT & CO.,

Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.

FISHERMEN!

TWINES AND NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Price only $18. Every machine sold is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Correct Pamphlet, Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS, and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of N. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 61 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

The Most Recherché Novelty in Perfumery.

These Perfumes are of choice quality, and may be confidently recommended on their own merits; while the Locality especially commend them to all lovers of Fine Arts, Flowers, Rural Scenery, and Out-door Society, bearing Floral Decorations, and thus convey to the poetic mind the motives engraved beneath each design, in strict conformity with the recognized Language of Flowers.

E. LETCHFORD & CO., Manufacturing Perfumers, 12 Cornhill, London. ☞ For sale to the Trade only by the Agents, SARGENT, JOYCE, & HOLTON, 34 Vesey Street, New York.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

(Patented June 1, 1869.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY, DURABILITY, and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,

SOLE MANUFACTURERS,

Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods. Ladies Carved Work Boxes. Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N. Y.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 76 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.

JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,

924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A Holiday Present.—Polish & Sun manufacture warranted Genuine Meerschaum Goods. Stores: 519 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel, & 7 John St., middle of block. Send for circular to Letter-Box 3446. Also, Repairing and Boiling done.

AGENTS.—ORIOLE GOLD.—AGENTS.

A $30 color made easy. ORIOLE GOLD PAT. FOUNTAIN PEN. Is indestructible. Writes 4 pages with one dip. Sells at sight—looks like 18-carat Gold. Sample box, 18 pens, for 75 cents, postpaid; also other novelties. CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Harper's Popular Edition.

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF ALFRED TENNYSON,

WITH

Numerous Illustrations by Distinguished Artists,

AND

THREE CHARACTERISTIC PORTRAITS.

8vo, PAPER, 50 CENTS; CLOTH EXTRA, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Waltham Watches.

BEWARE of watches at retail should be on their guard against buying watches represented as "American," and which are usually advertised in connection with the words "Gouley" Imitation Gold," and other words calculated to attract attention. Nine cases out of ten such watches are spurious, as our genuine movements are seldom, if ever, put into any thing but solid gold or silver cases. Large numbers of these worthless watches bear colorable imitations of our trademarks. To avoid imposition, buyers who do not know responsible retailers should first procure a descriptive catalogue of the different styles of watches made by the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass. The catalogue contains, in addition, much useful information to watch-buyers. Address

ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, 182 BROADWAY, New York.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This can be set, locked in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits. Send for a Pamphlet.

E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS (SOAP MFG.) SAPOLIO

211 WASHINGTON ST. N. Y.

Guide-Book to Florida, with Map. By Dr. Bruton. $1 postpaid. S.W. Butler, 118 S. 7th St., Philadelphia.

Mt. Pleasant Institute. Private Classes for Boys. Annual term, Rev. M. A. 1846. H. C. Nash, A.M., Principal.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth: his Life and Teachings," &c. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Doré, Delaroche, Durham, and Parsons. Elegantly printed on tinted paper. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $4 00.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 200 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $6 00.

THE CHARLES THE TWELFTH JUVENILE WORKS. Illustrated. Hime, Cloth, $1 75 each.

LOST IN THE FOREST.
WILD LIFE UNDER THE EQUATOR.
SCENES OF THE GORILLA COUNTRY.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Tropical World," "Subterranean World," and "Aerial World." 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 75.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By John Georgi. With Number of "The Large Game of Ceylon," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE PICTORIAL CHILD'S HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Heroic Incidents, and of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 452 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1064 pages, Octavo. Hime in Cloth, $7 50; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco, $10 00.

HOMES WITHOUT HANDS: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, Classed According to their Principles of Construction. By J. G. Wood, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by Zwecker, from Original Designs made by F. W. Keyl and E. A. Smith, under the Author's superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled, $4 50.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: his Life and Teachings. Founded on the Four Gospels, and Illustrated by Reference to the Manners, Customs, Religious Beliefs, and Political Institutions of his Times. By Lyman Abbott. With Designs by Doré, Delaroche, Durham, and Parsons. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Selected and Edited by the Rev. Robert Aris Willmott. With English and American Additions, arranged by Evert A. Duyckinck, Editor of "Cyclopædia of American Literature." Comprising Selections from the greatest Authors of the Age. Superbly Illustrated with 101 Engravings from Designs by the most Eminent Artists. In elegant Small 4to Form, uniform with Longfellow's Poems. Cloth, Beveled, Gilt Edges, $5 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $6 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $10 00.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes de Fées Chrétiens). By Jean Mace, Author of "The Story of a Mouthful of Bread," "Two Servants of the Sixteenth, &c. Translated by Mary L. Booth. Handsomely Illustrated. Hime, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Fairy Tales of All Nations. By Edouard Laboulaye, Member of the Institute of France. Translated by Mary L. Booth. Blessedly Illustrated. Hime, Cloth, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The Best Popular Fairy Stories Selected and Rendered anew. Engravings. Hime, Cloth, $1 50.

GOLDSMITH'S POETICAL WORKS. Illustrated by Wood Engravings from the Designs of C. W. Cope, A.R.A., Thomas Creswick, J. C. Horsley, R. Huggins, A.R.A., and Frederick Taylor, Members of the Etching Club. With a Biographical Memoir, and Notes on the Poems. Edited by Bolton Corney. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Boards, $3 00; Turkey Morocco, Gilt Edges, $7 50.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XIV.—No. 681.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

WORN OUT.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1870.

SENATOR SCHURZ'S CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

IT will be long before so favorable a moment as the present will be found for the reform of the civil service. The President indicates his sympathy with it in saying in his Message: "There has been no hesitation in changing officials in order to secure an efficient execution of the laws; sometimes, indeed, in a mere party view, undesirable political results were likely to follow. Nor has there been any hesitation in maintaining efficient officials against remonstrance wholly political." Secretary Cox, in a most forcible and conclusive manner, urges the imperative necessity of some change in the system. He declares that for months after the appointment of the head of a Department it is almost impossible for him to become familiar with his duties because of the office-seeking pressure. Mr. Cox's testimony is most valuable, and confirms the judgment of all thoughtful men. Senator THURMAN, assuming, in the spirit of Mr. HENRY ADAMS's article upon the subject in the North American Review, to keep inviolable the constitutional functions of the Executive in the matter of appointments, has introduced a bill to prevent Congressional brokerage in office, and Senator SCHURZ, on the 10th of January, presented a comprehensive bill for the thorough reorganization of the civil service, which he explained in a few concise and luminous remarks.

The bill of Mr. JENCKES, in the House, affected only the officers appointed by the heads of Departments, but that of Mr. SCHURZ includes also those who are appointed by the President and Senate, excepting the members of the Cabinet, foreign ministers, judges, and clerks of the United States courts, and the officers of both Houses of Congress. The remarks of Mr. SCHURZ show that he fully comprehends the absurdity and the peril of the present system. The principle of his bill is that of Mr. ADAMS and of the English system, namely, examination and probation, which has been thoroughly tested and approved by experience. His proposal is based upon the commissioners—the Civil Service Board—to be appointed by the President and Senate. They are to be divided into three classes, of seven persons each: the first class to hold for four years, the second eight, and the third twelve, unless sooner removed, and their successors to be appointed for twelve years. The President may suspend a commissioner and report to the Senate, as under the present Tenure-of-Office bill. The annual salary of each commissioner is to be six thousand dollars, and there are to be three clerks and a messenger.

The Board is to prescribe the qualifications for appointment into each grade of the civil service; to provide for examinations and investigations of all persons who present themselves, attending the country into convenient districts; to examine personally or by those especially designated; and to report annually all proceedings and results to Congress. The preference for appointments by the heads of Departments is to be given in order of precedence in examination and probation; and if the three candidates for Presidential appointment, with the consent of the Senate, shall be sent to the President and Senate, with the certificate of the commission as to merit and fitness. When the Board begins its work any officer now in the service may be required by the President or head of Department to be examined, and if found incompetent may be dismissed; but if approved shall hold office for four years from the date of his commission, unless sooner removed according to the act; and all appointments hereafter made, with the exceptions named in the bill, shall be for eight years. The bill is very carefully drawn, and contains other provisions essential to a uniform and efficient system.

Mr. SCHURZ, like Mr. JENCKES, understanding where the opposition will be, wisely intrenched in his remarks that, of course, no examination can test business ability; but a year of probation and practice will be of such service that no trial at all, as at present. And during that year the appointing power may remove without question.

So, also, it would be unreasonable to order every soldier to be a small post-office, for instance, before an examining-board. The commissioners may, therefore, by general rules determine what inquiries concerning character and ability shall take the place of formal examinations—the result to be scrutinized by the commissioners.

Further, the bill preserves the constitutional prerogative of the President by merely presenting to him a list of candidates who have been found fit; or he may, at his pleasure, send a candidate to be examined. Thus the commission will not designate what person shall be appointed, but will simply certify that certain persons are fit for appointment.

The purpose of extending to five years the term of the present officers is to give a new administration, should it be composed of new persons, knowledge of the state of the service and experience. The term of eight years for Presidential appointments under the bill gives the country, in the first place, the services of experienced and efficient officers; and, secondly, will carry a large number of them through two administrations, and so practically show the people that the civil service need not be a mere party machine. And the provision that officers are to be removed only for cause, and upon fair trial, will inspire them to base their claims upon good conduct.

Mr. SCHURZ, in closing, said that the obstacles which such a reform must encounter were not unknown to him. Nor are they to any of us. Perhaps the strongest is suggested by its essential reason and good sense; in the economy and efficiency which it will introduce into the public service, the unscrupulous gained elevated reputation of that service and its officers; in the moderation of the perilous fury of a Presidential election; and in the purification of politics. Those who are persuaded that universal official corruption is unavoidable will wonder that any body should try to help it. Those who don't think so will try, and will rebuke it.

GOOD FAITH WITH DENMARK.

WE expressed the hope some weeks since that the Secretary of State would submit the letter would extend the time within which the St. Thomas treaty might be ratified; and we are glad to know that the letter was sent, and that the matter is now open until the 14th of April, 1870. Before that time we hope that the Senate will ratify the treaty. It must not be supposed, however, that little Denmark is a supplicant to the United States. The Executive of the United States has signed and submitted to the treaty, but Denmark declined. The enemy was renewed more urgently, and Denmark, in the most friendly manner, replied. And after ascertaining as accurately as possible what the probable action of our Government would be, submitted the question to the Rigsdag and the people of St. Thomas, accepted their decision, and negotiated the treaty. We, on the contrary, have treated it with the most contemptuous. The Senate does not ratify, and does not reject. It permits the stipulated terms of action to pass unnoticed, and the Danish Government agrees to conclude the negotiations for a West Indian station, in which the dignity of a friendly little power and its honor are involved, in order to be understood to be bargaining to hire another station.

The argument against the ratification of the St. Thomas treaty is, that the Executive Department of the Government has no right to bind the country by the act of its representative, and that the Danish authorities knew that the Senate is the treaty-making power. But what Denmark knew was that the Executive could make treaties with the consent of the Senate, and it had a right to infer, when the President and the Secretary of State signed a treaty for territory in the West Indies, just after the Senate had ratified a treaty for territory at the north pole very nearly the same magnitude, that the Senate would not reject it. Moreover, Denmark privately and properly consulted the distinguished Senators, and knew that they approved. If ever a country was drawn on by a treaty to conclude a treaty, Denmark was drawn by the United States. The Senate does not, indeed, officially acted. Technically, but not personally or honorably, the defense is valid.

Nor is it reasonable to allege that if the treaty is ratified every Secretary of State may make a treaty at his pleasure. After the experience of this treaty, known to every government, it will be surprising if the overture of the United States Ministers upon the part of the Executive are not received with the constantly mut by the remark, "Sir, the St. Thomas treaty was to take no steps whatever until we ascertain that you or the President or the Secretary are authorized to speak for the Senate of the United States." If neither the word and act of the President, who is a constitutional part of the treaty-making power, nor those of the Secretary of State, nor those of the foreign Minister, nor those of the ambassador of the United States to any other government, convince the Senate, even when opposed to furnish any clew to the feelings and wishes of the Senate, it will be but a sign of good sense and self-respect upon the part of other governments if they await some authorized expression of the Senatorial will. When it is proved that the action upon the part of other powers has misled him, that officer will, of course, become a wholly useless and unimportant personage. But meanwhile, those who have hitherto been effective will have all precedent and the proprieties of the case to plead for them.

If Mr. MORLEY should propose a treaty to the English Government, to which that Government assented, it would be justified in believing that it was the will of the President, who had nominated him, and of the Senate, which had confirmed him. If the treaty should then be left in contempt by the Senate, or unceremoniously rejected, it would be foolish to say that it was the duty of England to know that the Senate is the treaty-making power. England does know it; but it knows also that an agent unanimously confirmed, unless he is bribed or lunatic, necessarily represents the views of the principal. But to ask that other countries shall discriminate in the persons of our Ministers between those who do and those who do not sympathize politically with the majority of the Senate is ludicrous. Foreign governments know that the people are the government in this country; that the people elect a President; that the President nominates foreign Ministers; that the Senate confirms them; and these governments can not help supposing that, when the Minister arrives, he is actually the representative which his method of appointment implies. When he proposes, urges, entreats a certain course of action foreign government, it must, supposing him to be honest and competent, believe that he expresses the wish of his own government.

That is the position in which our little friend and ally, Denmark, finds herself at this moment. Drawing on our good faith, and yielding to our entreaties, she has polled the people of St. Thomas, and they vote to join us. She considers that our honor is fully pledged, and we can see why. Meanwhile, the necessity of a West Indian station has become so apparent that we are negotiating for hiring the Bay of Samana. Why, then, under all the circumstances, should the Senate hesitate to ratify the treaty simply for a central and valuable West Indian port, and a small and friendly population which is divided by no doubts of its desire of annexation to the United States? It is a question in all its bearings for statesmen, not for attorneys, to decide.

THE OPENING OF THE COUNCIL.

A WRONYEN has been in Rome is well acquainted with the Fiaxa Barberini," says Hans CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, in beginning the "Improvisatore." But still truer is it that happy the traveler is who has been in Rome the day before, as he reads the splendid story of the opening of the Œcumenical Council, at which he was not present, he may comfort himself by reflecting that most of the spectators were in the plight of Yankee Doodle, who "said he couldn't see no use in goin' home, and hadn't no home." The scene was memorable and unique, for it is but the nineteenth Council during all the duration of the Roman Church. In the long years of its immense, and the consequent obstruction so great, that undoubtedly the traveler who has only the ordinary ceremonies of Holy-week at St. Peter's has better appreciated the peculiar pomp of the Church, and more fully enjoyed it.

Fortunately, the literary skill of the writers our newspapers have had accomplished correspondents upon the spot, who could understand and describe it. The literary skill of the Rev. Dr. Abbé Shea vividly to reproduce the color and form of the great occasion. Indeed, nothing is more observable in the management of many of the papers than the increasing value and interest of their foreign correspondence. They are organizing the news of Europe as they have already organized that of the United States, and the world of foreign events of the winter—the opening of the Suez Canal and of the Œcumenical Council—have been described with a freshness and fullness unrivaled by the English or French press. There was nothing like it in history, except Mr. RAYMOND's admirable letters from the Crimea.

But what in that case was exceptional has now become the rule. Indeed the secondary in enterprise of the English daily papers over ours, which was formerly undeniable, is now wholly at an end. The day when the American press is as self-respectful as it is intelligent and enterprising, it will be what the press of a free country ought to be.

The most striking and suggestive fact in the development of the opening Council is that St. Peter's was crowded, not only that it was expected—and so crowded that the swaying of the dense multitude was appalling and menacing to life and limb. Indeed, by the time the procession moved from the Vatican, which is a part of the long line of building, to the church, it was impossible to stir in half of the great square in front of St. Peter's, so solid was the throng. The London Times says that the correspondent of the London Times was carried by the resistless, moving current out of sight and sound of the cere-was passing but a little way from them, yet quite beyond. Far away in the transept, which was the Council hall, screened from the nave, they indistinctly heard the lofty chant, and knew that the procession was entering, and the robed prelates seating themselves, like gorgeous clouds settling and clinging to the sides of the hall. Yet they saw nothing.

> "Clothed in white samite; mystic, wonderful,"

But we can fancy it all as well as the luckless sights who, standing in the glorious basilica of St. Paul and within easy seeing and hearing distance, were obliged only to imagine the scene which they had traveled so fast and far and furiously to behold. And again we say that those who on Easter-Sunday have heard the sublime summons from the Papal choir at the great doors of St. Peter's, answered by the choir within, and have then seen those great doors open and the Pope borne in his unshrinking throne with the baldacchino, flabella, above the glittering ecclesiastical multitude, then descending to kneel at the high altar beneath "the Confession that is in it," have had the utmost splendor of spectacle of which even the Roman Church is capable.

For more than seven hours the ecclesiastical ceremonies of every kind at the opening of the Council continued, and then the Pope retired; and those in the nave of St. Peter's and the Council were ordered to withdraw, and the Council itself adjourned. Its sessions were resumed on the 2d of the month, and proceeded with formal business; but the serious work will not begin until after Epiphany, the 6th of January. The air, of course, is full of rumors. The most interesting are those which relate to the great dogma of the Papal infallibility, one of the two points upon which the heart of the Pope has been fixed. The other, the exaltation of the Virgin MARY, he has decreed, and it has been accepted. But the infallibility can not be promulgated without a convulsion of his Church. The alienation, or opening speech of the Pope, is like the Encyclical Letter and Syllabus of 1864. In the breaking of chains, in the increase of knowledge, in the higher welfare of the greater number, in the freedom, in the removal of abuses, in the extinction of superstition, in the emancipation of civilization from the mortmain of papal ecclesiasm, Hope sees only the ravages of Satan; and if only he were proclaimed infallible Satan might be bound.

As the ultramontane defence of the nineteenth century is read and pondered the belief grows that it disappears, the gold and scarlet pomp of the Council hall away, the vast multitude is dissipated, St. Peter's itself vanishes like a mist, the amused human mind sees nothing but Sydney Smith's Dame Partington at Taunton. "In the midst of the sublime storm Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house, with mop and pattens, trundling her mop and sweeping away the sea-water, and vigorously pushing back the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic was roused. Mrs. Partington's spirit was up. But it need not tell you that the contest was unequal. The Atlantic was beaten," Mrs. Partington. She was excellent at a slop and a puddle; but she should not have meddled with a tempest."

CONSULS TO FURNISH STATISTICS OF FOREIGN CROPS.

OUR article on this subject, published on the 22d of October, urging that consular returns shall be required to furnish reports from time to time of the state and condition, before and after harvest, of those productions of the soil of foreign countries which enter into competition in British and other markets with our own, having been republished in the Contra Costa Gazette, of Pacheco, California, its editor has obligingly furnished us with the paper, and with information that Mr. Secretary BOUTWELL of Congress from the district of which Pacheco is a part, had on the 7th of December, 1869, introduced a bill to direct the House of Representatives designed to accomplish that object. The scope of the bill is thus announced "to procure and disseminate information relative to the state of the cereal and other crops in foreign countries, and to require our consuls abroad to furnish quarterly returns of the condition of those crops. The object of the bill is to furnish information to farmers, to enable them to sell or hold crops as the state of the demand in Europe may call for."

The success of all our industries in the United States depends, in great part, upon making the best use of our own and foreign markets. Agricultural labor and; but yet British India, which is regarded as our chief competitor in cotton, is known to us only through the newspapers, and our information of the quantity of food produced by imported foreign agricultural states is derived also from the press.

It is clear, as we present full and accurate statistics of what we are expected to produce from time to time, as well as of the actual production, that we ought to obtain equally full information of the crops expected and gathered in foreign countries. We shall not be on a footing of equality with purchasers from us until we can anticipate their wants as they are informed of our means of supply.

In former years the Consular Department was required to give information of the growth of tobacco, etc., on the continent of Europe and in some other localities, and reports were published by one of the Departments of the government which contained some other, but not very full statistics of any production.

In the last year of the experience of this country the price of our crop of cotton was fixed in 1868-1869 by the planters in the South. The famine in India, occasioned by turning their cultivation from grain into cotton, to satisfy the want produced by the disturbances to industry in the late Confederate States, called for a partial abandonment in Hindostan of the cotton cultivation, and before the proper equilibrium could be reached in India, the Southern planter had sold his crop. Although mills were stopped in Lancashire, and every effort was made to affect the price of cotton in America, the planter was firm, and he has been rewarded with contributions drawn from the cotton manufacturers of all countries.

Of the crop of 1868–1869 Europe took over fourteen hundred thousand bales; more than eight hundred thousand were consumed in the Northern and Western States of the Union, while less than two hundred thousand bales, was manufactured in Virginia and other Southern States.

Inasmuch as the manufacture of cotton, not only abroad but here, has lately been prosecuted, if not at a loss, certainly without the usual profit, it is not certain that the present price of the staple will be maintained during the year, unless the consumption of cloth shall be largely increased throughout the world. England is endeavoring to stimulate the production of the staple in India, with a view to obtain cheap cotton; and a powerful competition will arise between the producers in this country and the English as to which shall fix the price hereafter.

So far as concerns the market value of our breadstuffs, it has been ordinarily adjusted by the English, as they are the chief customers for what we export. In 1867–1868, under the scarcity of grain in 1867–1868, both here and in England, the price ruled high, as it was necessary, in order to supply the latter, the prices must induce the most distant farmers in Minnesota and elsewhere to haul their surplus to the nearest market. In 1868–1869, notwithstanding the severe drought in England and upon the Continent, the price of our grain was fixed at London and Liverpool by the rate from the use of uncommon activity, if not dexterity. Our agriculturist reports had furnished exact knowledge of what our crops would amount to be; and as they were thought to be large, the English, by abstaining from buying at New York, and by flooding all parts of the country with their agents, whose information was published by experts, produced the impression that they could get what they had to sell that they wanted; and they were ultimately able to purchase from us at their own limits. An active demand from England has been largely supplied during the present season from this country, under the disadvantage to us that her dealers have full information of the surplus in each every region can spare, and that we know only what we have to sell.

The drought which visited the sea-board from June until the autumnal storm, and the heavy rains at harvest time, so damaged our crops of corn and wheat that the question was not of vital interest to the United States—what ought to be charged to the foreigner for our diminished surplus? If the quotations current in England will be pinched to obtain from other countries her required import of seventy million bushels of wheat for the year 1869–1870, that is, as we can not supply this quantity, including what we shall send from California, it is very material to know what will be the scale of our future grain-growing countries. The duties of our consular establishment, now that our foreign commerce is so much less than it was in more active times, will not interfere with the most active prosecution of this inquiry. The service is indispensable to the United States, and it must be rendered with little expense, the appropriate means should instantly be used to obtain and spread the required information before the country.

We hurry our immense cereal productions to market, not knowing whether it is better to hoard or to sell. Speculation is more pressed upon the sea-board in excess of foreign or domestic wants; and the keen dealers from abroad then studiously obtain their information from other parts of the world in order that our market may be slaughtered from the supposed want of foreign demand, when they become cheap consumers.

The cry of cheap cotton, which now resounds over all England, means that the residue of the world is expected to supply those populations at the lowest point, while at the same time the rewards of her manufacturing industry are expected to be large.

Her command of capital, her grain agent scattered every where, and her influence over other nations enable her to prosecute the contest with us with great advantage; and this will continue until our consular establishment is carefully arranged under a competent head, and precise information of the character indicated shall be obtained from foreign countries and placed before our people.

We most respectfully urge upon Congress to pass this bill or some bill which will accomplish this object, and also that our consuls abroad obtain as accurate information of what other nations produce as we furnish to the world of our productions.

GERMAN WORKING-MEN AT HOME.

GERMAN "working-men," that is, mechanics and operatives as distinguished from agriculturists and laborers, now constitute a very important part of the European emigration to America. The treaties already negotiated between the leading powers of Germany and the United States greatly facilitate this; and there can be no doubt that the German emigration will hereafter largely increase. The character of these emigrants to this country, all of whom will become citizens, is therefore worthy of careful study. For this purpose we select Elberfeld and Barmen, two large manufacturing towns in Prussia, each containing nearly 70,000 inhabitants, and so contiguous that they may be considered as one city.

At the outset, the Prussian artisan, almost of necessity, must have received a fair education. Until he reaches the age of fourteen years, a boy is by law forbidden to be employed in a manufactory; he must be kept at school, and the Prussian schools are, without doubt, the best in the world. Next, he becomes a workman his hours of labor are indeed more than with us. Twelve hours is a regular day's work, and this is often considerably exceeded, the workman being paid extra for the overtime. The rates of wages for the different trades are much more equitable than with us. A knaben (say 70 cents) a day is a fair average. The rent for apartments may be set down at a thaler a week, or about two dollars and a pound, and is eaten once a day by respectable artisans and their families; the bread is commonly of rye, and the meat is of a small, light beer, which is the universal beverage, costs two cents a quart. Clothing is cheap; three or four dollars will buy a good everyday suit; a respectable Sunday suit of cloth will cost from five to six dollars. Putting these expenses together, it will be seen that the Prussian artisan has very little left for superfluities; but it is the unanimous testimony of all who have visited Germany that for his thaler a day he and his family have an amount of comfort and respectability greater than is enjoyed by a like class of laborers except our own. No wonder that the Prussian workman who, coming to America, retains his sober and industrious habits, almost always accumulates property. We say "sober" habits for while there is no country where so much beer is consumed, there is no thorough land in which there is so little drunkenness.

In Elberfeld and Barmen there are five prominent institutions, each of which, though specially devoted to their moral and intellectual improvement. Let us look at one of them—the Arbeiter-Verein (Working-men's General Culture-Union"). Its rooms are in a plain house in a quiet street. As we enter we pass a counter where beer, tobacco, and other refreshments are sold. The floor is strewn with clean white sand; and about the room there are many tables and chairs. At one end, where the assembly-room, a large airy hall, furnished in the plainest manner. At the farther end is a desk from which lectures are delivered on scientific, literary, social, and economical topics, politics being absolutely excluded. The floor is occupied by about 300 persons, some of which are half a dozen plain rush-bottomed chairs. During the ordinary lectures beer, coffee, tea, and tobacco are used freely. The ladies are frequently present, and then smoking, though not forbidden, is by tacit consent discontinued. The hall is used for no purpose during there is usually a debate. There are other rooms devoted to various amusements, and a very good library. In the winter evenings there are chess and draughts, all games of chance being prohibited.

Upon such days there are concerts and theatrical performances in this hall, but they are not largely attended by the artisans. A man who has labored hard all day has little inclination for amusement after his work is over. Sunday, or rather the afternoon and evening of the day, is the favorite time for holiday-making. Taverns are closed from nine o'clock till four, after which they, as well as places of amusement, are open. A favorite resort is the Zoological and Botanic-garden in the outskirts of the town. A saloon, open on one side, which overlooks the garden, is one of the favorite resorts. Here there is a stage for theatrical and musical performances, so placed as to be in view from both the saloon and the garden, so that the audience have the choice of the open air or of shelter. The garden has many trees, mostly chestnuts and limes, and is full of benches and rustic tables and chairs. The charge for admission is five cents.

There is at Elberfeld and Barmen a civil tribunal which is well worthy of imitation in this country. It is called Gewerbe Gericht, or Artisan's Court, and its object is to settle disputes arising between employers and operatives. When such a dispute arises, the husband arises, the gathers up his evidence and employer betore this court, the cost of a summons being six cents. During the year 1868 there were 416 cases brought before this court. Of these 1012 were arranged by agreement or arbitration between the parties; and of the remaining 203 every one of them was settled by the presiding judge, without litigation.

These Prussian artisans are certainly among the most desirable class of emigrants to this country. Every possible encouragement should therefore be presented to them to come to us, and every facility afforded them to become American citizens. To this end it is a wise treaty that we have made with Prussia, which relieves the emigrant from their country to this, who becomes a citizen under our existing laws, from all obligations and liabilities as a subject of Prussia. His rights, should he return to Prussia, are precisely the same as if he were a citizen of the United States by birth. When men so intelligent and orderly become American citizens, we may be confident that they will always be in the best sense conservative; and it behooves politicians, especially in the city of New York, to understand this, and to know that, by whatever name they may choose to designate themselves or their party, when they trample on emigrants or abet wrong, fraud or outrage, they will find the present and prospective German vote arrayed in solid phalanx against them, and that this vote will soon be sufficient to turn the scale against any corrupt "ring" or "clique."

THE STATE OF WINNIPEG.

WHEN we said last week that the world was outwardly at peace excepting in Cuba and Paraguay, we forgot the Red River war, and the declaration of independence there; a situation which, it is already asserted, lays us under the obligation of declaring our neutrality. But apparently the war is ending before the Government has an opportunity to move, and, indeed, even before it is generally known what the war is about. The facts, however, are few and simple. The Red River country is that part of the British Northwest Territory which is less immediately under the influence of Canada, and which is largely settled by French and half-breeds. The settlement has been subject to the Hudson Bay Company, within whose possessions it was included until its recent transfer to the Dominion of Canada. To this transfer the natives objected, and when Mr. McDOUGALL appointed Governor by the Canadian authorities, arrived with his council of Canadians to take possession, he was warned, repulsed, and driven over the United States line. He has since been recalled, and the colony theoretically resets to the control of the Hudson Bay Company.

The war seems thus far to have been very one-sided. Governor McDougall was warned that it was said that Governor M'DOUGALL meant to call upon the Indians as allies, and had he done so doubtless a third race might have been serious results. But it is at least doubtful whether the settlers will peacefully return to the rule of the Company. The impression is that it has no interest in them, and a provisional government has been established under a declaration of independence, "in the name of the people of Rupert's Land and of the Northwest Territory." Who the leaders are who have made this movement, or what their purpose may be, does not plainly appear. But if they persist, the result is tolerably clear. The Dominion of Canada can obtain control of it; and when Canada relinquishes the attempt, which always is by force, the whole Winnipeg will begin immediately to look upon the northern horizon of the Union.

NOTES.

MR. SARGENT WAS had become a name so familiar, and his book such a rural classic, that there must be a very large circle in the country who will welcome the news of the recent death of FREDERIC S. COZZENS. He had been always engaged in business until his misfortunes, but he had always been in literature; and he had a very sincere reverence for the Nestors of our letters—Irving and Halleck. His mind was clear and bright, and his humor was genuine. It was in quality not unlike that of "Artemus Ward" or "Petroleum V. Nasby"—humor transparent as water, flowing, sparkling, pure; and at the same time without any very rising level. Some one not justifying a place among humorists. Mr. COZZENS's—or, as he was always called, Frederic Sargent's—delight was literary humor, the company of men of a certain cultivation and refinement, and the table-talk of books and men and tell anecdotes, with many a quip and crank of the way, and with the sparkling gloss not for "the million," but for readers. His humor was different from those of many of his friends, and there was a certain touch of severity in his partisanship. But yet it was with him as with many others, partly impatience with what he regarded as the general humanity and sensibility of other years Mr. COZZENS was a constant frequenter of the Century Club, and those who knew him there will always pleasantly remember his clever sallies at themselves and others, and sometimes his kindly with many a lively and friendly hour.

A VERY ingenious NEW YEAR'S swindle, and so common that the attention of the POST-OFFICE Department has been drawn to it, is the sending through the mails to country postmasters and others specimen copies of periodicals, with tempting offers of enormous commissions to solicitors of subscribers, and the most urgent requests to forward names and subscriptions at once, so as to begin with the year. These offers are so tempting that thousands of subscribers are obtained and their money forwarded. Up to this point every thing goes well. But at this point the swindler disappears, except the proprietor of the magazine, who retires from business, and sets off upon his travels. He has simply rented to one of these swindlers, scores of parcels of letters from every part of the country written in response to the circulars, and specifying the amounts of money inclosed. During the occupation of the rooms they were furnished in the most expensive and luxurious manner, so that if any body in the rural districts was suspicious and wrote to some friend to investigate, every thing should appear to be satisfactory. The Department will do what it can to baffle these swindling efforts. But the only safe way for country postmasters, and all who receive prospectuses of magazines, with "great inducements" to agents and subscribers, is, notwithstanding the enormous numbers, to satisfy themselves whether there are such magazines, and whether there is likely to be a February and March as well as a January number.

To those who know MR. PEABODY there is something very touching in the refusal to allow VICTOR HUGO which associates JOHN BROWN and GEORGE PEABODY as the common donors. There could not be a more unlike pair of benefactors in every way, nor more entirely unsympathetic in carrying out bought and opinion. Probably MR. PEABODY's view of JOHN BROWN was not very different from that of VALLANDIGHAM and JAMES M. MASON; and if he had been aware of the poet's drawing of the Charlestown executioner, he undoubtedly thought VICTOR HUGO a charlatan. Mr. PEABODY's political sympathies were those that VICTOR HUGO detested, while the one man in the country who would most have been unsympathetic to the soft conservative soul of GEORGE PEABODY was the fiery red republican VICTOR HUGO. That he should have been considered to write "a word" about him is droll; that he should have replied, "couldn't in one thought of gratitude and respect JOHN BROWN, the friend of the slave, to GEORGE PEABODY, the friend of the slaver," is, however just the association, inexpressibly amusing.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A SUMMARY, digested by a number of property holders, and signed by Messrs. Wetmore, Bertine, Cornell, was on December 3 presented to the President by Mr. VINCENT COLYER, representing the feeling of loyalty and attachment to the Queen, in view of the threatened secession from the sanctuary, that was consulted by duty to themselves and their families to the Dominion Government, and the assurance of protection to insure future prosperity. They set forth the dissatisfaction of the people with the Canada rule, and the fact that the Canadian Legislature threw out the Dominion of Canada, for the reason that it can afford them neither protection nor the privileges of self-government—nor can it satisfy any sentiment of loyalty or devotion. They ask for their interests as settlers, and for the Indian tariff would rule Columbia; and, on the other hand, that the Hudson Bay Company be left in undisturbed annexation to the United States. This memorial, it is said, has been signed by one of the Hampton Family and by the inhabitants of other British Columbian towns.

The memorial was presented to the President by the Secretary of State.

The Governor of Canada has been recalled, it is reported, by the Dominion Government, and Mr. MACDONALD appointed from the Red River country. The territory is to be governed by the Canadian and the Hudson's Bay Company, whose agents are suspected of instigating the late rebellion. Governor MACDONALD regressed the insurrection as a trifling affair.

The Secretary of the Interior has announced his intention to recommend in his message to the next Legislature the appointment of the Board of Commissioners on the subject of diverce. The Legislature will not meet until early in April.

The Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House, says that the public lands in the Southern States remaining unsold and unappropriated are 64,320,000 acres. Of this amount 46,080,000 acres are in Florida, and the United States have no public lands within their limits.

The funeral of the late Edwin M. Stanton took place at Washington December 29. The procession, notwithstanding a heavy rain and the absence of official display, was imposing in the number, character, and distinguished position of those present. To-day he is interred in Oak Hill Cemetery.

The body of the late ex-Vice-President Wm. R. King, who died on New Year's Day, will be taken to Selma, Alabama, and certainly wounded Alfred Randall, father of the latter, a prominent lawyer and politician of that place, and a relative of Mrs. Bachman, is said to have been the cause of the tragedy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE new ministry of FRANCE is constituted as follows: President of the Council and Minister of Justice—M. Chevandier de Valdrome. Minister of Foreign Affairs—M. Daru. Minister of Commerce—M. le Deputé Louvet. Minister of Public Works—M. Plichon. Minister of War—The members of the old ministry retain their positions in the War Office. Minister of Marine—M. Rigault. Minister of War; and Admiral Rigault, Minister of Marine.

The trial of Troppmann, for the murder of the Kinck family, began in Paris December 30, in consequence and was a failure.

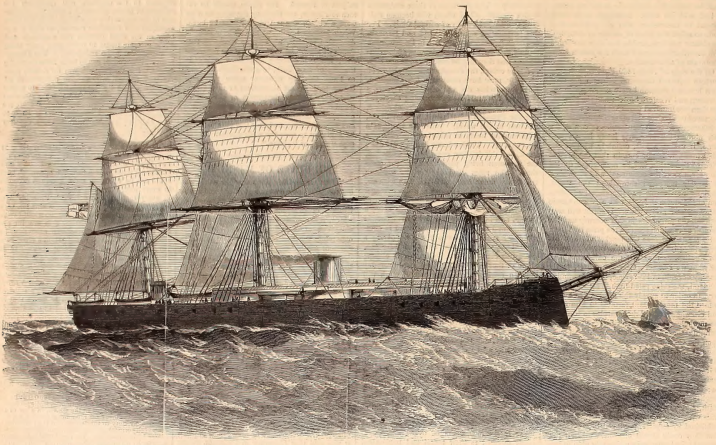
The French Director-General of Telegraph Lines announces the establishment of the Prussian Telegraphic rotating to the examination and control by the French Government of messages by the Prussian lines, and says the Government does not control dispatches sent from Prussia to other countries. He declares that messages are transmitted in the order in which they are given in and received at Paris, and that wherever the dispatches are sent, and the Government thus declared of the control of the press, the Government of the telegraphic business of the French Government.

The Spanish Government has sent Count Rancomofo to the Sultan to consult on the question whether Spain can declare war.

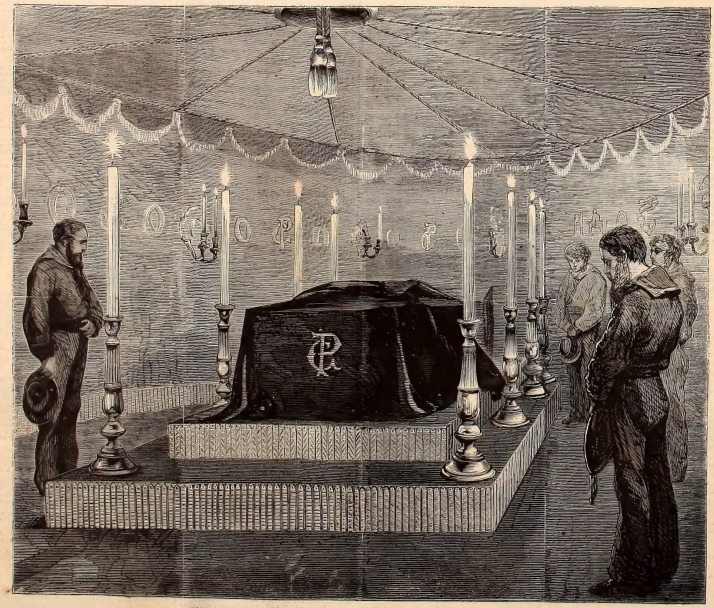
M. Lesseps quadricate the stories of danger to navigating the Suez Canal, and says that the passage of the shallowest parts has been considerably increased.

Portsea Prussia, on the 29th December 17 by the revolution. Salzwedel Prussia made but little resistance, and "nobody was hurt."

Advices from Cuba, in regard to the revolution, are so vague and contradictory as ever. Reports received in Washington announce that 700 Cuban insurgents had laid down their arms to Valmaceda, and that the Cubans are in a state of great destitution. Other Spanish successes are also spoken of. A report that Gen. Lopez had arrived in New York and landed 500 insurgents to give up the contest in consequence of the refusal of the Spanish Government to allow the United States is contradicted by authority of the Junta.



HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "MONARCH," BEARING THE REMAINS OF THE LATE MR. PEABODY TO THIS COUNTRY.—[SEE PAGE 37.]



THE MORTUARY CHAPEL ON BOARD THE "MONARCH."—[SEE PAGE 37.]

HENRI ROCHEFORT, MEMBER OF THE FRENCH CORPS LEGISLATIF.

HENRI ROCHEFORT.

On this page we give a very striking likeness of HENRI ROCHEFORT, one of the most advanced, most audacious, and most dangerous of the radical politicians of France. Educated in newspapers, he first made his mark as a sharp, caustic, and fearless writer for the penny press of Paris, where his articles frequently drew down upon him the displeasure of the Government. The journals for which he wrote were often seized; but such was his popularity that the proprietors could well afford to lose an edition now and then, and regarded a seizure as rather a good card with the public. A few months ago he established a journal called The Lantern (La Lanterne), in which he attacked the Emperor and his government with great severity, and exposed them to the ridicule of the people. For this offense his paper, which speedily attained an enormous circulation, was confiscated, and ROCHEFORT was obliged to seek personal safety in flight. The Opposition party in Paris resisted their confidence in him by electing him, while an exile, to represent them in the Corps Legislatif. It was supposed that the Government would prohibit his return, and certainly prevent him from taking his seat. Nevertheless ROCHEFORT ventured upon French soil again shortly before the commencement of the session; and beyond a slight annoyance from the police authorities when he made his reappearance, he has not been interfered with. The Emperor had learned wisdom, and came to the conclusion that the best way to deal with such a man was to let him alone. His popularity was, however, only partly the result of political persecution. Paris adores wit and courage, and ROCHEFORT possesses both in a very high degree. He is not a wise nor a great man, nor in any sense a statesman. He is only a smart and fearless journalist, on the right side of politics, who has the daring to seek popular notoriety by proclaiming aloud what thousands think in secret, but are afraid to speak above a whisper.

FROM ENGLAND TO AMERICA.

OUR engraving on page 36 shows the British iron-clad Monarch on her voyage from England to this country, with the remains of the late Mr. GEORGE PEABODY on board. The body rests in a mortuary chapel, a view of which is given on the same page, erected in the stern of the ship, near the officers' cabins. The chapel is surmounted with a cupola, and is draped with black cloth, looped up from the centre of the dome with white silk cords. Around the higher part of the structure are festoons of black drapery, fringed with white lace, and at the sides the initials "G. P." are picked out in white satin stitches. Alternately with the monograms are wreaths of immortelles and silver sconces of wood-work. The coffin is placed on a bier in the centre of the chapel, and has on each side four huge silver-plated candlesticks; each three feet high, containing wax-candles of a proportionate size. Facing the entrance is an American eagle in a device of silver, with the inscription, "E Pluribus Unum." Heavy folds of black cotton separate this construction from the rest of the ship. During the voyage the chapel was closed, and a guard of royal marines was stationed at the entrance.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

THIRD SCENE.—LONDON.

CHAPTER THE FOURTEENTH.

GEOFFREY AS A LETTER-WRITER.

LORD HOLCHESTER'S servants—with the butler at their head—were on the look-out for Mr. Julius Delmayn's arrival from Scotland. The appearance of the two brothers together took the whole domestic establishment by surprise. All inquiries were addressed to the butler by Julius; Geoffrey standing by, and taking no other than a listener's part in the proceedings.

"Is my brother alive?"

"His lordship, I am rejoiced to say, has astonished the doctors, Sir. He rallied last night in the most wonderful way. If things go on for the next eight-and-forty hours as they are going now, my lord's recovery is considered certain."

"What was the illness?"

"A paralytic stroke, Sir. When her lodyship telegraphed to you in Scotland the doctors had given his lordship up."

"Is my mother at home?"

"Her ladyship is at home to you, Sir."

The butler laid a special emphasis on the personal pronoun. Julius turned to his brother. The change for the better in the state of Lord Holchester's health made Geoffrey's position, at that moment, an embarrassing one. He had been positively forbidden to enter the house. His one excuse for slitting that prohibitory sentence at defiance rested on the assumption that his father was actually dying. As matters now stood Lord Holchester's order remained in full force. The under-servants in the hall (charged to obey that order as they valued their places) looked from "Mr. Geoffrey" to the butler. The butler looked from "Mr. Geoffrey" to "Mr. Julius." Julius looked at his brother. There was an awkward pause.

Geoffrey spoke, and solved the problem.

"Open the door to one of you fellows," he said to the footmen. "I'm off."

"What a mind!" Julius interposed his brother. "It will be a sad disappointment to my mother to know that you have been here, and gone away in a manner seeming strange. There are no ordinary circumstances, Geoffrey. Come up stairs with me—I'll take it on myself."

"I'm blessed if I take it on myself!" returned Geoffrey. "Open the door!"

"Wait here, at any rate," pleaded Julius, "till I can send you down a message."

"Send your message to Nagle's Hotel. I'm at home at Nagle's—I'm not at home here."

At that point the discussion was interrupted by the appearance of a little terrier in the hall. Seeing strangers, the dog began to bark. Perfect tranquility in the house had been absolutely insisted on by the doctors; and the servants, all trying together to catch the animal and quiet him, simply aggravated the noise he was making. Geoffrey solved this problem also in his own decisive way. He swung round as the dog was passing him, and kicked it with his heavy boot. The little creature fell on the spot, whining piteously. "My lady's pet dog!" exclaimed the butler. "You've broken its ribs, Sir."

"I've broken it of barking, you mean," returned Geoffrey. "Ribs be hanged!" He turned to his brother. "That settles it," he said, jocosely. "I'd better defer the pleasure of calling on dear mamma till the next opportunity. Tie-to, Julius. You know where to find me. Come, and dine. We'll give you a steak at Nagle's that will make a man of you."

He went out. The tall footmen eyed his lordship's second son with unreflected respect. They had seen him, in public, at the annual festival of the Christian-Pugilistic-Association, with the gloves on. He could have beaten the biggest man in the hall within an inch of his life in three minutes. The porter bowed as he threw open the door. The whole interest and attention of the domestic establishment then present was concentrated on Julius. Julius went up stairs to his mother without attracting the slightest notice.

The month was August. The streets were empty. The vilest breeze that blows—a hot east wind in London—was the breeze abroad on the day. Even Geoffrey appeared to feel the influence of the weather as the cab carried him from his father's door to the hotel. He took off his hat, and unbuttoned his waistcoat, and lit his everlasting pipe, and growled and grumbled between his teeth in the intervals of smoking. Was it only the hot wind that wrung from him these demonstrations of discomfort? Or was there some secret anxiety in his mind which assisted the depressing influences of the day? There was a secret anxiety in his mind. And the name of it was—Anne.

As things actually were at that moment, what course was he to take with the unhappy woman who was waiting to hear from him at the Scotch inn?

To write? or not to write? That was the question with Geoffrey.

The preliminary difficulty, relating to addressing a letter to Anne at the inn, had been already provided for. She had decided—if it proved necessary to give her name, before Geoffrey joined her—to call herself Mrs., instead of Miss. Silvester. A letter addressed to "Mrs. Silvester" might be trusted to find its way to her, without causing any embarrassment. The doubt was not here. The doubt lay, as usual, between two alternatives. Which course would it be wisest to take?—to inform Anne, by the first post, that an interval of forty-eight hours must elapse before his father's recovery could be considered certain? Or to wait till the interval was over, and be guided by the result? Considering the alternatives in the cab, he decided that the wise course was to temporize with Anne, by reporting matters as they then stood.

Arrived at the hotel, he sat down to write the letter—doubted—and tore it up—doubted again—and began again—doubted once more—and tore up the second letter—rose to his feet—and groaned to himself in unspeakable languor. And he couldn't for the life of him decide which was safest—to write or to wait.

In this difficulty, his healthy physical instincts sent him to healthy physical remedies for relief.

"My mind's in a muddle," said Geoffrey. "I'll try a bath."

It was an elaborate bath, proceeding through many rooms, and containing many pipes and applications. He steamed. He plunged. He simmered. He stood under a pipe, and received a cataract of cold water on his head. He was laid on his back; he was laid on his stomach; he was respectfully pounded and kneaded, from head to foot, by the knuckles of accomplished practitioners. He came out of it all, sleek, clear, rosy, beautiful. He returned to the hotel, and took up the writing materials—and behold the unidentified indecision seized him again, declining to be washed out! This time he hid it all to Anne. That infernal woman will be the ruin of me," said Geoffrey, taking up his hat. "I must try the dumb-bells."

The purest of the new remedy for stimulating a sluggish brain took him to a public house, kept by the professional pedestrian who had the honor of training him when he contended at Athletic Sports.

"A private room and the dumb-bells!" cried Geoffrey. "The heaviest you have, got."

He stripped himself of his upper clothing, and set to work, with the heavy weights in each hand, waving them up and down, and backward and forward, in every attitudinizing variety of movement, till his magnificent muscles seemed on the point of starting through his sleek skin. Little by little the animal spirits roused themselves. The strong exertion intoxicated the strong man. In sheer excitement he swore cheerfully—invoking thunder and lightning, explosion and blood, in return for the compliments profusely paid to him by the pedestrian and the pedestrian's son.

"Pen, ink, and paper!" he roared, when he could use the dumb-bells no longer. "My mind's made up: I'll write, and have done with it!" He sat down to his writing on the spot; he actually finished the letter: another minute would have dispatched it to the post—and, in that minute, the maddening indecision took possession of him once more. He opened the letter again, read it over again, and tore it up again. "I'm out of my mind!" cried Geoffrey, fixing his big bewildered blue eyes fiercely on the professor who trained him. "Thunder and lightning! Explosion and blood! Send for Crouch."

Crouch (known and respected wherever England smashed is known and respected) was a retired prize-fighter. He appeared with the third and last remedy for clearing the mind known to the Honorable Geoffrey Delmayn—namely, two pair of boxing-gloves in a carpet-bag.

The gentleman and the prize-fighter put on the gloves, and faced each other in the classically-correct posture of pugilistic defence. "None of your play, mind!" growled Geoffrey. "Fight, you beggar, as if you were in the Ring against, with orders to win. No man knew better than the great and terrible Crouch what real fighting meant, and what heavy blows might be given from with such apparently harmless weapons as stuffed and padded gloves. He pretended, and only pretended, to comply with his patron's request. Geoffrey rewarded him for his polite forbearance by knocking him down. The great and terrible now with unfeigned confusion. "Well hit, Sir!" he said. "Try it with the other hand now." Geoffrey's temper was not under similar control. Invoking everlasting destruction on the frequently-blackened eyes of Crouch, he threatened instant withdrawal of his patronage and support unless the polite pugilist hit, then and there, as hard as he could. The hero of a hundred fights smiled at the dreadful prospect. "I've got a family to support," remarked Crouch. "If you will have it, Sir—there it is." The fist of Geoffrey followed, and shook the house. He was on his legs again in an instant—not satisfied even yet. "None of your body-hitting!" he roared. "Stick to my head. Thunder and lightning! explosion and blood! Knock it out of me! Stick to the head!" Obedient Crouch stuck to the head. The two gave and took blows which would have simultaneously have killed—any civilized member of the community. Now on one side of his patron's red head, and now on the other, the hammering of the prizefighter's gloves fell, thump upon thump, horrible to hear—until even Geoffrey himself had had enough of it. "Thank you, Crouch," he said, breaking softly to the man for the first time. "That will do. I feel nice and clear again." He shook his head two or three times; he was indeed clear like a horse in the professional manner; he drank a mighty draught of malt liquor; he recovered his good-humor as if by magic. "Want the pen and ink, Sir?" inquired his pedestrian host. "Not I!" answered Geoffrey. "The muddle's out of my nose. Pen and ink be hanged! I shall look up some of our fellows, and go to the play." He left the public house in the happiest condition of mental calm. Inspired by the stimulant application of Crouch's gloves, his torpid cunning had been shaken up into excellent working order at last. Write to Anne? Who but a fool would write to such a woman as that until he was forced to it? Wait and see what the chances of the next eight-and-forty hours might bring forth, and then write to her, or desert her, as the event might decide. It lay in a nut-shell, if you could only see it. Thanks to Crouch, he did see it—and so away, in a pleasant temper for a dinner with "our fellows" and an evening at the play!

"MEN OF MY SORT ARE NOT EASILY KILLED."

CHAPTER THE FIFTEENTH

GEOFFERY IN THE MARRIAGE MARKET.

THE interval of eight-and-forty hours passed—without the occurrence of any personal communication between the two brothers in that time.

Julius, remaining at his father's house, sent brief written bulletins of Lord Holchester's health to his brother at the hotel. The first bulletin said, "Going on well. Doctors satisfied." The second was firmer in tone. "Going on excellently. Doctors very sanguine." The third was the most explicit of all. "I am to see my father in an hour from this. The doctors consider me his recovery. Depend on my putting in a good word for you, if I can; and wait to hear from me further at the hotel."

Geoffrey's face darkened as he read the third bulletin. He called once more for the hated writing materials. There could be no doubt now as to the necessity of communicating with Anne. Lord Holchester's recovery had put him back again in the same critical position which he had occupied at Windygates. To keep Anne from committing some final act of despair, which would connect him with a public scandal, was, in his view, so far as his expectations from his father were concerned, was, once more, the only safe policy that Geoffrey could pursue. His letter began and ended in twenty words:

"DEAR ANNE,—Have only just heard that my father is turning the corner. Stay where you are. Will write again."

Having dispatched this Spartan composition by the post, Geoffrey lit his pipe, and waited the event of the interview between Lord Holchester and his eldest son.

Julius found his father alarmingly altered in personal appearance, but in full possession of his faculties nevertheless. Unable to return the pressure of his son's hand—unable even to turn in the bed without help—the head of the noble old lawyer was as keen, the hard mind of the old lawyer was as active, as ever. The moment ambition was to see Julius in Parliament. Julius was offering himself for election in Perthshire, by his father's express desire, at that moment. Lord Holchester entered eagerly into politics before his eldest son had been two minutes by his bedside.

"Much obliged, Julius, for your congratulations. Man of my sort are not easily killed. (Look at Broughton and Lyndhurst.) You won't be excluded the Upper House for a year, will begin in the House of Commons—precisely as I wished. What are your prospects with the constituency? Did you see exactly how you stand, and where I can be of use to you."

"Sorely," Julius's son hardly recovered enough to enter on matters of business yet?"

"I am quite recovered enough. I want some present interest to occupy me. My thoughts are beginning to drift back to past times, and to things which are better forgotten." A sudden contraction crossed his livid face. He looked hard at his son, and entered abruptly on a new question. "Julius!" he resumed, "did you ever head of a young woman named Anne Silchester?"

Julius answered in the negative. He and his wife had exchanged cards with Lady Lundie, and had accused themselves from memorandum, invitation to the lawn-party. With the exception of Blanche, they were both quite ignorant of the persons who composed the family of the Windygates.

"Make a memorandum of the name," Lord Holchester went on. "Anne Silvester. Her father and mother are dead. I knew her father in former times. Her mother was ill-used. I was a bad business. I have been thinking of it again, for the first time for many years. The girl is alive and about the world she may remember our family name. Help her, Julius, if she ever wants help, and applies to you." The painful contraction passed across his face once more. "We have insulted enough people back to the memorable summer evening at the Hampshire villa? Will be see the deserted woman swooning at his feet again?" Julius's face clouded. "Don't be asked, impatiently. "My mind is not used to be idle. I want something to do."

Julius stated his position as plainly and as briefly as he could. The father found nothing to object to in the report—except in so far as it arose from the field of action. He blamed Lady Holchester for summoning Julius to London. He was annoyed at his son's being there, at the bedside, when he ought to have been addressing the electors. "It's inconvenient, Julius," he said, peulsatily. "Don't you see it yourself?"

Having previously arranged with his brother to take the first opportunity that offered of risking a reference to Geoffery, Julius decided to "see it" in a light for which his father was not prepared. The opportunity was before him. He took it on the spot.

"It is no inconvenience to me, Sir," he replied, "and it is no inconvenience to my brother either. Geoffrey was anxious about you too. Geoffrey has come to London with me."

Lord Holchester looked at his eldest son with a grimly-satirical expression of surprise.

"Have I not already told you," he rejoined, "that my mind is not affected by illness? Has Geoffrey anxious about me? ARNSTY is one of the civilized emotions. Man in his savage state is incapable of feeling it.

"My brother is not a savage, Sir."

"His stomach is generally full, and his skin is covered with linen and cloth, instead of red ochre and oil. So far, certainly, your brother is civilized. In all other respects your brother is a savage."

"I know what you mean, Sir. But there is something to be said for Geoffrey's way of life. He cultivates his courage and his strength. Courage and strength are fine qualities, surely, in their way?"

"Excellent qualities, as far as they go. If you want to know how far that is, challenge Geoffrey to write a sentence of decent English, and see if his courage doesn't fail him there. I gave him his books to read for his degree, and, strong as he is, he will be dead set against the sight of them. You wish me to see your brother. Nothing will induce me to see him, until his way of life (as far as I can tell) is altered altogether. I have had one hope, of its ever being altered now. It is barely possible that the influence of a woman whose mind—possessed of such advantages of birth and fortune as may compel respect, even from a savage—might produce its effect on Geoffrey. If he wishes to find his way back into this house let him find his way back into good society first, and bring me a daughter-in-law to plead his cause for him—whom his mother and I can respect and receive. When that happens, I shall begin to have some belief in Geoffrey. Until it does happen, I shall continue to consider him into any future conversations which you may have with him. To return to your election. I have some advice to give you before you go back. You'll do well to go back to-night. Lift me up on the pillows."

I shall speak more easily with my head high."

His son lifted him on the pillows, and once more summoned attention to spare himself.

It was useless. No remonstrances shook the iron resolution of the man who had braved his way through life, and who had left the splendid humanity to his own high place apart from the rest. Helpless, dying, snatched out of the very jaws of Death, there he lay, steadily distilling the clear common-sense which had won him all his worldly reputation to the last drop. If he was a hut was missed, not a caution was forgotten, not a point passed over, that could assist his son's political ways which he had trudden so safely and so dextrously himself. An hour more had passed when Julius descended to the drawing-room with eyes, and consented to take his nourishment and compose himself for the night. But words, rendered barely articulate by exhaustion, still were the princes of party manœuvres and political life. "If I am not well enough to go to the House of Commons, Julius, as I miss nothing else!"

Left free to pursue his own thoughts, and to guide his own course, Julius's first journey crossing from Lord Holchester's bedside to Lady Holchester's dressing-room.

"Has your father said any thing about Geoffrey?" was his mother's first question as soon as he entered the room.

"My father gives Geoffrey a last chance, if Geoffrey will take it."

Lady Holchester's face clouded. "I know," she said, with a look of disappointment. "His last chance to be read for his degree. Hopeless, my dear. Quite hopeless! If he had only been something rather than; something that resisted with me—"

"It does rest with you," interposed Julius. "My father wishes Geoffrey to marry. Choose Geoffrey's last chance is (in one word) Marriage!"

"Oh, Julius! It's too good to be true!"

Julius repeated his father's own words. Lady Holchester looked twenty years younger as she listened. When he had done she clasped her hands.

"No matter who calls," she said to the servant, "I am not at home." She turned to Julius, kissed him, and made a place for him on the sofa by her side. "Geoffrey shall take that chance," she said, gayly—"I answer for it! And now three women in my mind, any one of whom would suit him. Sit down, my dear, and let us consider carefully which of the three will be most likely to attract Geoffrey, and to come up to your father's standard of what the future mistress should be. When we have decided, don't trust to memory. Go to ourself and see Geoffrey at his hotel."

Mother and son entered on their consultation with unaffected zeal. They had found the secret of the servants' harvest to come.

CHAPTER THE SIXTEENTH.

GEOFFREY AS A PUBLIC CHARACTER.

TIME had advanced to after noon before the selection of Geoffrey's future wife was accomplished, and before the instructions of Geoffrey's mother were sufficiently precise to justify the opening of the matrimonial negotiations at Knight Hotel.

"I don't leave him till you have got his promise," were Lady Holchester's last words when her son started on his errand.

"If Geoffrey doesn't jump at what I am going to offer him," was the son's reply, "I shall agree with my father that the case is desperate, and I shall end, like my father, in giving Geoffrey up."

The strongest language for Julius to use. It was not easy to rouse any feeling in the equable temperament of Lord Holchester's eldest son. No two men were more thoroughly unlike each other than these two brothers. It is melancholy to acknowledge it of the blood-relation of a "stroke oar," but it must be owned, in the interests of truth, that Julius cultivated his intelligence. He read history, biography, and dipped books—and couldn't digest beer. Could learn languages—and couldn't learn to row. Practised the foreign vice of perfection himself in the art of playing on a musical instrument—and couldn't learn the English virtue of knowing a good horse when he saw him. Got through life (Heaven only knows how!) without either a hack or a betting-book. Had openly acknowledged, in English society, that he didn't think the barking of a pack of hounds the finest music in the world. Could go to foreign parts, and see a mountain which nobody had ever gone to the top of yet—and didn't instantly feel his honor as an Englishman involved in getting to the top of it himself. Such people may, and do, exist among the inferior races of the Continent. Let us thank Heaven, Sir, that England never has been, and never will be, the right place for them!

Arrived at Nagel's Hotel, and finding nobody to inquire of in the hall, Julius applied to the waiting lady who sat behind the writing-table in bar." The young lady was reading something with so deeply interesting in the evening newspaper that she never even heard him. Julius passed into the coffee-room.

Here, at a long table, our honour, was shoarded over a second newspaper. Three gentlemen, at three different tables, were absorbed in a third, fourth, and fifth newspapers. They all alike went on with their reading without noticing the entrance of the stranger. Julius ventured on disturbing the waiter by asking for Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn. At the sound of that illustrious name the waiter looked up with a start. "Are you Mr. Delamayn's brother, Sir?"

"Yes."

The three gentlemen at the tables looked up with a start. The light of Geoffrey's celebrity fell, for the moment, on Geoffrey's brother, and made a public character of him.

"You'll find Mr. Geoffrey, Sir," said the waiter, "in the billiard-room, next door to the Cod and Bottle, Partner."

The expression of Julius's face changed. "I expected to find him here." I had an appointment with him at this hotel."

The waiter opened his eyes on Julius with an expression of respectful astonishment. "Haven't you heard the news, Sir?"

"No."

"God bless my soul!" exclaimed the waiter and offered the newspaper.

"God bless my soul!" exclaimed the three gentlemen—and offered the newspapers.

"What is it?" asked Julius.

"What is it?" repeated the waiter, in a hollow voice. "The most dreadful thing that's happened to the Fancy. It's all up, Sir, with the Great Foot-Race at Fulham. Tinkler has gone stale."

The three gentlemen dropped solemnly back into their three chairs, and repeated the dreadful intelligence, in chorus—"Tinkler has gone stale."

A man who stands face to face with a great national disappointment, and doesn't understand it, is a man who will do wisely to hold his tongue and enlighten his mind without asking other people to help him. Julius took up the waiter's newspaper, and sat down to make (if possible) some sense of it. There was the word—"Tinkler" did, or did not, mean a man. Second, as to what particular form of human affliction "gone stale" might be described as being—"gone stale."

There was no difficulty in finding the news. It was printed in the largest type, and was followed by a personal statement of the facts, taken on the waiter's authority, and challenged by another personal statement of the facts, taken on the waiter's authority. More particulars, and further personal statements, were promised in later editions. The royal salute of British journalism thundered the announcement of Tinkler's appearance before a people prostrate on the national heart-strings.

Divested of exaggeration, the facts were few enough and simple enough. A famous Athletic Champion, by name Tinkler, had challenged a famous Athletic Association of the South. The usual "Queer" was to take place at cricket, running, jumping, "putting" the stone, throwing cricket-balls, and the like—and the whole was to culminate in a Foot-Race of considerable length and difficulty in the annals of human achievement between the two best men on either side. "Tinkler was the best man on the side of the South. "Tinkler" was backed in innumerable bets against the field. And Tinkler's lungs had suddenly given way under stress of training! A prospect of witnessing a prodigious achievement had collected (in spite of unfavorable stuff) a prospect of winning and losing large sums of money, and suddenly withdrawn it from the eyes of the British people. The "South" could produce no second opponent worthy of the North; and of its own champion nothing remained but the athletic world in general, but one man excepted who rejoiced in the name of Geoffrey Delamayn, and it was doubtful, in the last degree, whether he would consent to come forward under the circumstances. Such was the sum of Julius's First read it with horror—was Geoffrey Delamayn.

Julius threw down the paper in the coffee-room. Julius laid down the newspaper, and looked about him. The waiter was busy, in his corner, with a pencil and a betting-book. The three gentlemen were busy, at the three tables, with pencils and betting-books.

"Try and persuade him!" said the waiter, piteously, as Delamayn's brother rose to leave the room.

"Try and persuade him!" echoed the three gentlemen, as Delamayn's brother opened the door and went out.

Julius called a cab, and told the driver (busy with a pencil and a betting-book) to go to the Cock and Bottle, Putney. The man brightened into a new betting prospect. No need to hurry him; he drove, unasked, at the top of his horse's speed.

As the cab drew near to its destination the signs of a great national excitement appeared, and multiplied. The idle pair of people pronounced, with a grand unanimity, the name of "Tinkler." The heart of a people hung suspended (nearly in the public houses) on the chances for and against the possibility of replacing "Tinkler" by another man. The scene in front of the inn was impressive in the highest degree. Even the London blackguard rose above himself in the presence of the national calamity. Even the irrepressible man with the spoon, who always turns up to sell nuts and ornaments in a crowd, plied his trade in silence, and found few indeed (to the credit of human feeling be spoken) who had the heart to crack a nut at such a time as this. The police were on the spot, in large numbers, and in most sympathy with the people around them to see. Julius, on being stopped at the door, mentioned his name—and received an ovation, which brother! (in the Fancy sense). The people closed round him, the people shook hands with him, the people invited blankness on his head. Julius was half suffocated, when the police rescued him, and landed him safe in the private parlor on the back side of the public house door. A deafening tumult broke out, as he entered, from the places above stairs. A distant voice screamed, "Mind yourselves!" A bashes shouting man tore down through the people congregated on the stairs. "Geoffrey! Hooray! He's promised to do it! He's entered for the race!" A hundred cheers on hundreds of voices took up the cry. A roar of cheering burst from the people outside. Reporters for the newspapers pressed, in close succession, on the inn, and rushed into cabs to put the news in print. The band of the Guards, marching Julius carefully up stairs by the arm, trembled with excitement. "His brother, gentlemen! his brother!" In those vague words it spread from mouth through the throng. At those magic words the closet door of the council-chamber flew open; and Julius found himself among the damsels of his native country, in full parliament assembled. In any description of Geoffrey's public life, the description of Geoffrey applies to them all. The manhood and muscle of England resemble the bodily parts in the human body, in this respect, that there is about as much variety in a flock of sheep as in a flock of sheep. Ladies talk about him, and saw the same man in the same dress, with the same health, strength, tone, temper, modesty, conversation, and paralysis, repeated infinitely in every part of the room. The one distinguishable individual (except the unintiated stranger) something at once hideous and terrifying to behold. Geoffrey had been lifted bodily into the table, in his chair, so as to be visible to the whole room. They sang round him, they danced round him, they cheered round him, they swore round him. In the midst of the maudlin terms of endearment, by grateful giants with hearts of children, "Tinkler" was called "Villainous, noble, splendid, beautiful fellow!" They hugged him. They patted him on the back. They wrung him by the hands. They kissed and punched his muscles. They embraced the noble legs that were to run the great Foot-Race—and, At the opposite end of the room, where it was physically impossible to get near the hero, the enthusiasm expressed itself in the usual signals and acts of destruction. Hercules I. cleared a space with his powerful arms, and laid waste—and Hercules II. took him up in his teeth. Hercules III. seized the poker from the fire-place, and broke it in the air in two. Hercules IV. dashed with the tongs, and shattered them on his neck. The smashing of looking-glasses, and the pulling down of the house seemed likely to commence when Geoffrey's eye lighted by accident on Julius, and Geoffrey's voice, rising literally like his brother, hushed the will assembly into sudden attention, and turned the fiery enthusiasm into a new course.

Hooray for his brother! Geoffrey sprang up with his brother on our shoulders! Four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, on our heads, to the other end of the room! See, boys there! the hero has got him by the collar! the hero has taken him on his back! the hero, hemted red-hot with his own triumph, welcomes the new champion with a shower of kisses and oaths. "Thunder and lightning! Explosion and blood! What's up now, Julius? What's up now?"

Julius recovered his breath, and arranged his coat. The noise was over, when his last muscle enough to fit a Dictionary from the shelf, and just training enough to play the fiddle, so far as could be ascertained by the instrument accorded to him, appeared to feel no other sentiments in relation to it than a sentiment of unmitigated contempt.

"You're not frightened, are you?" said Geoffrey. "Our fellows are a roughish lot, but they mean well."

"I am not frightened," answered Julius. "I am only wondering—what the Scotch and Universities of England turn out such a set of ruffians as these—and what the Schools and Universities of England will last."

"Mind what you are about, Julius! They'll cart you out of the window if they hear you."

"They will only confirm my opinion of them, Geoffrey, if they do."

Here, the assembly, seeing but not hearing the colloquy between the two brothers, became uneasy on the subject of the postponement. A roar of voices summoned Geoffrey to announce it, if there was any thing to announce. Controlled the meeting, Geoffrey turned again to his brother, and asked him, in no amiable mood, what the devil he wanted there?

"I want to tell you something, before I go back to Scotland," answered Julius. "My father is willing to give you a last chance. Prove don't take it, my doors are closed against you as well as his."

Nothing is more remarkable, in its way, than the sound common sense and admirable self-restraint exhibited by the youth of the present generation, when confronted by an emergency in which their own interests are concerned. Instead of resenting the tone which his brother had taken with him, Geoffrey instantly descended from the pedestal of glory on which he stood, and placed himself without a struggle in the hands which vicariously held his destiny—otherwise, the hands which vicariously held the purse. In five minutes more the meeting had been dismissed, with all needful assurances relating to Geoffrey's share in the coming Sports—and the two brothers were closeted together in one of the private rooms of the inn.

"Out with it!" said Geoffrey. "And don't be long about it."

"I won't be five minutes," replied Julius. "I go back to-night by the mail-train; and I have a great deal to do in the mean time. Here it is, in plain words: My father consents to marry me again, if you choose to settle in life—with his approval. And my mother has discovered where you may find a wife. Birth, beauty, and money, are all offered to you. Take them—and you recover your position as Lord Hawkester's son. Refuse them—and you go to ruin your own way."

Geoffrey's reception of the news from home was not of the most reassuring kind. Instead of answering he struck his fist furiously on the table, and cursed with all his heart and soul every woman unnamed.

"I have nothing to do with any degrading connection which you may have formed," Julius went on. "I have only to put the matter before you exactly as it stands, and to leave you to decide for yourself. The lady in question was formerly Miss Newsham—a dressmaker of one of the oldest families in England. She is now Mrs. Glenarm—the young widow (and the childless widow) of the gray-moustached old man with Birth and fortune—the unites both. Her income is a clear ten thousand a year. She is pretty, and well, under the circumstances, remarkably lucky enough to persuade her to marry you. My mother assures me that she has succeeded. And my wife has met her at our house in London. She is now, as I hear, staying with some friends in Scotland; and when I get back I'll take care that an invitation is sent to her to pay her next visit at Hawkester. I consider that will be seen whether you are fortunate enough to produce a favorable impression on her. In the mean time you will be doing every thing that my father can ask of you, if you make the attempt."

Geoffrey impatiently dismissed that part of the question from all consideration.

"If she don't cotton to a man who's going to run in the Great Race at Fulham," he said, "there are plenty as good as she to who will! That's not the difficulty. Bother that!"

"I tell you again, I have nothing to do with your difficulties," Julius resumed. "The rest of the day to consider what I have said to you. If you decide to accept the proposal, I shall expect you before you are up to-morrow morning me at the station to-night. We will travel back to Scotland together, and complete your interrupted visit at Lady Lundie's (it is important, in my interests, that you should retain a character for politeness in the country with all due respect); and my wife will make the necessary arrangements with Mrs. Glenarm, in anticipation of your return to our house. There is nothing more to be said, and no further necessity of my staying here. If you join me at the station to-night your sister-in-law and I will do all we can to help you. If you refuse, you will land alone, don't trouble yourself to follow—I have done with you." He shook hands with his brother, and went out.

Left alone, Geoffrey lit his pipe and sent for the landlord.

"Get me a boat. I shall scull myself up the river for an hour or two." And put in some towels. I must take a swim, too."

The landlord received the order—with a caution addressed to his illustrious guest.

"Don't go out of reach of the house, Sir! If you let the people see you, they're in such a state of excitement, the police won't answer for keeping them in order.

"All right. I'll go out by the back way."

He took a turn and down the garden. When were the difficulties to be overcome before he could possibly be the golden prize which his brother had offered to him? The Sports? No! The committee had promised to defer the day. If he wished it—and a month's training, in his physical condition, would be amply enough for him. Had he any pecuniary objection to trying his luck with Mrs. Glenarm? Not he! Any woman would do—provided his father was satisfied, and the money was all right. The obstacle which was really in his way was the obstacle of the woman whom he had married. Annie! The one inexpressible difficulty was the difficulty of dealing with Annie.

"We'll see how it looks," he said to himself, "after a pull up the river!"

The landlord and the police inspector smuggled him out by the back way unknown to the expectant populace in front. The two men stood on the river-bank seeing him, as he pushed off from them, with his long, powerful, easy, beautiful stroke.

"That's what I call the pride and flower of England!" said the inspector. "Has the being on him begun?"

"Six to four," said the landlord, "and no takers."

Julius went early to the station that night. His mother was very anxious. "I don't, he Geoffrey find an excuse in your example," she said, "if he is late."

The first person whom Julius saw on getting out of the carriage was Geoffrey—with his ticket taken, and his portmanteau in charge of the guard.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE total average daily receipts of Stewart's great retail establishment on Broadway and Tenth Street are stated to be $60,000. This immense business demands an army of employés; and twenty-two hundred persons are usually required to attend to the duties connected with it. The most careful espionage is necessary from the fact that such a multitude are employed; and experienced detectives are constantly employed as a protection against the cupidity of both shop-girls and shop-boys. Customers are likewise watched the employes pass through a private door opening into Tenth Street, and any suspicious package can readily be discovered. The clerks are required to be present both in the morning and at night, and to be attentive to business. Notwithstanding all the superintendence which is necessary to prevent the many defalcations connected with it, and all are anxious to retain their situation.

The average daily number of persons visiting the store is estimated at fifteen thousand, and on some special occasions there have been as many as fifty thousand. The most polite attention is given to all, with rich and poor alike have an equal welcome. Perhaps may go all over the establishment without being spoken to, unless he exhibits some perplexity, when an attendant will at once proffer assistance and attention. Every thing is quiet and orderly, and multitudes do pass through the building actuated by various motives of interest and curiosity alone.

Mr. Stewart has given some personal supervision to this store every day; and his superintendence is always present. He visits the establishment daily, so that he may understand the exact condition of each department. He never allows any class of people to remain in the store after closing hours, or to come a drag in the market.

As the operations of every industrial school at Leith, Dr. Guthrie said that there doubtless were no less than 1,200,000 children between the ages of five and a half and thirteen in England and Wales who were not keeping up like wild beasts, without any education whatever. And in connection with the necessity of compulsory education, on the ground that no one has a right to throw away his neighbor's time, or his property, and that the most dangerous of all animals is man with an uneducated brain.

One evening, during the time of the battle of Fredericksburg, Mr. Stanton was called from the dinner-table to receive a message from the front. When he did, her was read containing the sad story of war and blood, death and defeat, and the following message was sent: "Mr. Stanton hereby enriching his little girl, who had run from the dining-room, and stood by her father's chair, received the end of the message—a recital of a young lieutenant who had died bravely in battle. "Read again," said the father. And when it had been read he remarked: "As good a boy as I ever knew, and a good young man." Then speaking the words with much emotion. When the reading was over he gave directions how to use the paper, and asked the boy to excuse him for a few minutes and excuse him. There was a sweet light in his eyes as he returned to the room, and sat down in the loss of his voice when he handed the messenger a letter, with the words: "Take this to Mrs. Lee; you may let it me? I want it to go forward to-night."

Herr Klein, a German musician, has made a nice calculation, by which he finds that there are 10 to less than one hundred and twenty thousand operatic melodies now in existence.

The death of Madame Grist took place while she was on her way from Florence to St. Petersburg. When she left Florence she was in excellent health on her face, which rapidly developed during the journey, becoming at length so much swollen that she remained at Berlin. The tumor was opened, and she became better. Afterward, however, erysipelas set in, and the disease attacked the suggestion, and with the consent of the physician, the corbeaulx was regressed, and then the disease subsided, and the lady from human cause affected. A second carbuncle formed near the eye, and symptoms of poisoning of the blood soon resulted in death. Her own physician had been telegraphed for, but arrived too late to render assistance.

"Rose of Sharon" was the pretty name by which the lady whom M. Lesseps has married was latterly known in Egypt. Her maiden name is Miss Lesseps brought from Suez an Eastern rose—a peculiar flower, which, as the story goes, never grows but to be unfold, and disclose in the centre of the blossom the future consort of the bolder. He gave this flower to his lady-love, and when she saw in its full leaves. The lady very soon said, "Yes!" and the matter was settled. A very pretty story, and "popping the question!"

Some of the old Ecumenical Councils did not confine their legislation exclusively to religious matters. For example, the Council of Elvira enacted the following: "All persons are prohibited from attempting to play a male bird-dresser for the embellishment of the church, whether who so will be excommunicated, and thus without mercy."

Matrimonial matters are daily becoming more and more confused and mixed one of the age. Not only can recently transpired in a certain town in Ohio. A widow lady, with a husband living, applied to a lawyer that her affinity was the spirit of a gentleman who had been dead two years. The lawyer informed her that in law, who advised her to be united to the deceased in wedlock. So the lady made all due preparations, and the ceremony was duly performed, and the happy pair were united, and all went merry. The bride returned to her own residence, where she received a congratulatory visit from her husband in a simple one request was served in front of the room!

Sardines—a favorite delicacy—are caught in immense numbers along the coast of Italy, from the Gulf of Biscay. The fishing season lasts from July to October, and from 4,000 to 5,000 boats are employed in various the market. They are shipped in immense quantities to places all over the globe, though most are sold in Bordeaux than elsewhere. They are put up for market in three sizes of the boxes, and two sizes of labels are used to designate them.

There are two very curious needles in the world. One is in the possession of the King of Prussia. He was receiving a needle manufactory in his kingdom, when the workman whose business it is to make the eyes in the needles passed up to him from the monarch's head. It was readily given, and with a smile. He placed it in one end of his boring machine, made a hole in it with the greatest care, furnished it with a thread, and then handed the singular needle to the astonished King. Queen Victoria has a second curious needle, on which, though very small, scenes in the life of the Queen are represented in relief, but so finely cut and so small that it requires a magnifying glass to see them. The Victoria needle has a microscope case opened; it contains a number of needles of smaller size, which are equally adorned with scenes in relief.

Jupiter has been undergoing some curious changes during the past year, and particularly within the last few months; and astronomers are deeply interested about the matter. The belts on the planet are more than usually numerous, and they display a greater variety of colors than has ever yet been ascribed to them. The equatorial belt, which has been for years the brightest part of the planet, is now not nearly so bright as the light belts to the north and south. Outside it has been for some months; now it is often covered with markings, which resemble piled-up cumulus clouds. In a few generally been collected, along with a silver-gray or pearly baize; now it is of a rich, deep yellow, greatly resembling the color of electrotyped gold.

At Sandusky, Ohio, there is an extensive establishment for the curing of fish by a new process, so that they can be kept any length of time, and be transported at any distance. The meat thus occupied in the process is two hours, although fish can be frozen solid in forty minutes. The great merit of the process is that nothing by which the fish are frozen. Ordinary methods they are frozen so slowly that their quality is injured.

If a thee of a spider's web one-four-thousandth of an inch in diameter will sustain fifty-four grains it has been ascertained that a web of the size of Sydney's silk one inch in diameter support? The Chemical News says, reasonably enough, that Four experienced nurses undertook the task of watching the baby, Napoleon II., who is said to have taken no food for two years and a half. Not were these four to bear the responsibility alone—they were assisted by a medical consultation, so that if the girl received secret nourishment, she was pretty likely to be discovered. No food was discovered, but several days the girl showed symptoms of starvation. Her parents were urged to give her nourishment, but refused, until the 17th of the month she died delirious—indicating by the awful result that there was no deception in the case.

An inmate of one of our lease asylums—a young man—has addressed a letter to President Grant, in which he offers to purchase the union of the United States by marrying big wives of his own choosing, and also a wife apiece for the States or Territories elected by the respective Governors thereof. Moreover, in the event of his death, he pledges his good will and friendship may enclose the whole world, to marry a wife of every nation on the face of the sun, each to represent the country she comes from, in the great international wedding."

An Englishman has been experimenting for the purpose of ascertaining how much of various kinds of food can be digested in order to make a pound of flesh. He comes to the conclusion that it requires 28 pounds of milk, 10 of turnips, 8 of potatoes, 6 of carrots, 3 of oat-meal, 1½ of bread-stuffs, and 2½ of peas or beans.

The Woman's Journal is the title of a new paper which has just been issued in Boston. It is a weekly paper in quarto form, and will be devoted exclusively to the interests of the most prominent advocates of women's rights.

Colonel George Gordon De Lunn Byron, who was an officer under Fremont during the war, is said to have arrived in England and told before Lord Westbury that he was the son recognized as the legitimate son of the poet. He states that Lord Byron visited Italy after the death of his wife, and there contracted a new marriage with a Catholic lady of good family; but on account of the opposition manifested by her father this fact, he determined to conceal an alliance which was legal and also a child was born. Colonel Byron has established that he is the son of the poet and his Spanish wife, but has furnished no proofs to substantiate his romantic tale.

Queen Isabella is of a gay and easy disposition; she has danced all night and she likes to dance. Her favorite pleasure-seeker in Paris very agreeable. She is said to have declared to the Empress that nothing could be so much amusing as power should ever induce her to take the reins of government again.

THE LANGUAGE OF OLD EGYPT.

THERE is every reason to believe that the native Christian population of Egypt read their Bibles and preserve their hymns and religious books in the ancient Coptic which was spoken in the days of the Pharaohs. It has not been in common use for many centuries, but a few words seem that there were persons who could speak it as late as the seventeenth century. This has led to much interesting and important study, now that keys have been found for some of the hieroglyphics. The study is absolutely necessary with inscriptions, and most of these inscriptions contain information that we much desire to possess. Many persons, finding for the new interest in this country, was a perfect mania with the old Egyptians. They put up their inscriptions on monuments, tombs, etc., but they put their mark on every thing that could carry it. There are, we firmly believe, the means of ample knowledge, if we can but find the wit to interpret. But, be it understood, there is not much the hieroglyphics (which, as has been said, is still preserved in sacred books) as the characters in which it was written, which present the puzzle. The perplexity arises from the fact that there were two distinct styles in the ancient days of the Egyptians known only to the priests. Besides which there were varieties of writing, used possibly according to fixed rules, but very confusing till the rules shall be found. Three varieties are recognized thus far. One would appear to be alphabetical writing, although done in pictures—that is to say, there is a sign for every letter, and, unfortunately, more than one sign for each. A second is simply pictorial writing, wherein a drawing of the object stands for it. The third is a symbolical writing, where pictures do not stand for the objects which they represent, but for some other objects signified by them figuratively or arbitrarily. In this last kind, the representation of some natural object—as a bird, a serpent, a hatchet—may represent a whole speech, a syllable, or a letter. Here we can stop. It has, however, come to light that very often, besides the characters which form the word, a drawing of the thing intended is given. The three kinds of writing are often intermixed in one inscription—wherefore we know not—and thus a pretty complication was presented; indeed, it was no wonder that at one time the hieroglyphics were looked upon as little more than quaint devices of little or no significance. Great genius, however, and great patience having been exercised in the subject of late writings, have at length solved some of the difficulties, and shown us how the rest may be solved. A stone was dug up at Rosetta in 1798 having on it an inscription in three different characters, wholly in each character was repeated. Fortunately the characters was the Greek, which could be read; and it being assumed that the other two were the Egyptian forms of the same words, the learned set to work, and before long had something like the beginning of an alphabet. It was not till 1822 that M. Champollion, the most successful discoverer, published his vocabulary, which gave at once a view and a new impetus to the ingenious of all countries.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SERVANT applied to her mistress for a "loan" of paper and envelope. She received them, but soon brought them back. "What is the matter, Jane? Aren't they stylish enough?" "Oh yes, Mum, but we're running I am now, and times haven't got a black border!"

A Frenchman by will left all his property to his wife on condition that she should go over his grave a stone with this inscription:

Ici repose
Adolphe Bonnet
Who died at the age of —years,
In the possession of his faculties,
Except during the last fortnight
Of his life.

"You never saw such a happy lot of people as we had here yesterday," said a landsity in Indiana to a friend from the city. "What was the occasion?" "Why, a wedding. Two of 'em." "What, thirteen couples just married?" "Oh no, Sir, fifteen couples divorced."

A gentleman asked a lady, known to be utterly ignorant of languages, "How did you get along when you went to Rome yourself?" "Why, I had a Bible, Sir," replied she, with quite a French air, "we had an interpreter with us." The same lady having arranged some statues in an adjoining room, requested the same gentleman to go in. "Step this way, Monsieur, and see her antics" (antiques).

A LADY has recently published the most complete and unfortunate of animals?—Because he gambols in his youth, frets in the turf, is often a black-leg, and is forced annually.

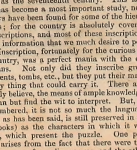
A manufacturer of tombstones lately received a bad debt on a countryman who wanted a stone to place over the grave of his mother. After looking around for some time, and asking many questions as to the taste of his deceased mother, he finally picked upon one which the widow-to-be declared her mother's person. "I like this one," said he. "Sold," said the dealer, "and what name shall I put upon it?" "Put upon it," said the bereaved son (a revolver of his mother)." Oh no, I would," said the countryman; "put upon it, 'Here lies Mary Jones,' for she'll be so obscured by the wonderment of the stone-cutter, that they'll was always a favorite name of hers, any how!"

THE BEST COBB—Coffee.

Three wild mud-larks were captured by a young district visitor on a country lane, and carried to a Ragged School in New York, where they were severally questioned as follows: "What's your name?" "Jim Brown, Sir," answered the one who was first interrogated. "Oh no; your name is Daniel; you're like Daniel, you know." "Yes, Sir, I'm Daniel, take your seat." "And what's your name?" said the visitor to the second. "Tom Jones," elucidated the urchin. "Dear me! it is not Tom, but Samuel. And now let us hear what your name is my good man?" "Why, dash it, I'm Bill Sykes, Sir," in a grim of self-satisfaction, and a shake of the head that would have done credit to Mr. Punch's living catechumen bodily replied, "Samuel, your Honour."

THE FOOBERT TEA.—Poverty.

An Irishe old gent, who formerly held the position of Justice of the Peace, was one day accosted in the street by a youth in a manner that did not come up to Mr Brasse's idea of respect due him. "Young man," said he, "I fine you five dollars for contempt of court." "Why, dadda," said the youth, "you are not in session." "This court," replied Mr Judge, thoroughly nettled, "is always in session, and especially always an object of contempt."



SIDEWORSHIP AT ST. PETER'S.

---

* The Mayor of New York, Mr. Hall, is a descendant of Sir Edmund Hall, Governor of Charles I.—boasts of his descent from an ancestor who never bowed to Cromwell. If the fifth section of the Constitution is to be observed, the great descendant ought to be relieved from a city-nurse.

A DREAM OF TOYS.

THE DREAM REALIZED.

BY THE SEA.

LAST night I watched the old year die—
A wind swept once across the sky,
That seemed to me his parting sigh—

The tolling ceased. Then weirdly gay,
The bells rang forth across the bay
Sensing a sea-chorus on their way.

An echo from the hollow caves—
A thrill of music from the waves,
Where some that hear shall find their graves!

These changeful bells, I whispered, sure
Most like some cunning overture,
Give foretaste what we must endure!

O young hope, true, that yet shall grow
To work us either weal or woe—
'Tis strange that men should hail thee so!

O dread, mysterious volume, sealed—
What hidden page in thee there conceal'd—
Not till the end to be revealed—

O ship that sails the unknown sea—
We guess not what thy freight may be—
What storms—what shipwreck—none foresee!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

IN TWO BOOKS.—BOOK FIRST.

CHAPTER XII.

NO LESS THAN KIN, AND MORE THAN KIND.

THAT a woman who has pledged herself solemnly before the world and her own conscience to be faithful to a man, should be false to him, did not seem, in Barletti's confused code of ethics, to be blameworthy. Veronica, false to her husband, would have sunk no jot in Count's esteem. It would all have been according to the experience of the world in which he had lived: a lovelorn, unblushing intrigue, and a subsequent compensating attachment. The experience of the world in which he had lived was his religion; its opinion, his conscience. He would, no doubt, have acted in contradiction to his worldly code, and have suffered as tempestuous men with a higher creed have acted against their conscience. But he would have experienced the same sort of pain in so acting as attends the conscious disregard of whatever we are accustomed to consider as a sanction.

Now he was called upon to readjust all his ideas regarding Sir John Gale and Veronica. His first strong sentiment in the matter was blame of Sir John. And it was not altogether unpleasant to find a justification for an even stronger dislike of the baronet than he had yet confessed so himself that he entertained. For John was an old rival! He had courted the girl away from her home. He must have deceived her basely. Poor, lonely, helpless, inexperienced girl!

This, then, accounted for her appearance on hearing that Sir John's life was in danger. He knew how horrible her position would be should he die before making his wife. It seemed pretty clear that the sentence of the physicians had fixed Sir John's wavering mind, and determined the performance of this act of reparation toward Veronica. She had conquered. Barletti felt some admiring triumph in that thought. But it did not soften him toward the baronet.

He believed Sir John to be thoroughly cynical and unprincipled; but that did not make it incredible that the old rogue should have been frightened into doing right by the mere approach of death. It was quite conceivable to him that such ready reparation might avail him before the Tribunal to which Sir John must shortly be summoned. The priests taught the efficacy of a death-bed repentance. He (Barletti) did not much believe in the priests; but these were professional matters which they probably understood. It was no concern of his to investigate further. He had no more idea of arranging the morality of such matters than of repudiating all law because a thief might possibly escape punishment by a technical flaw in the indictment. And he was perfectly at liberty to detest the thief all the same.

This false selfish sentimentalism could not obliterate the memory of the harassing anxiety to which Veronica had been cruelly subjected. That, she was, too, the latent consideration—favoring the whole current of his reflections—that he himself had narrowly escaped being placed in an unpleasant position. It was one thing to be the favored suitor of a young widow; and quite another to be bound to a woman without rank, or money, or influence; whose sole dowry would be her beauty, and an imperious appetite for the luxuries that only great wealth can purchase.

What had he to offer to Veronica if she were poor? He might have lost her altogether! And his instinctive conviction that she was incapable of loving him with a love which should enable her to endure poverty for his sake, did not militate against the reasonableness of his position.

But suppose, after all, she were to throw him over, now that she was secure? She would be very rich—that he took for granted; and she would have a brilliant position in her own country. He became nervously impatient to see her again, and yet he dreaded to find a change in her manner.

He had met Veronica twice since their first memorable interview in the Villa Reale. She had debated anxiously with herself whether she had not best break her appointment; but she had come to the conclusion that she did not dare to drive Barletti to desperation. He might in his rashness dash the cup from her lips, even at the last moment. They had met, therefore, and Barletti had given his report of the doctor's opinion, and then had chanced in reward of his zeal the privilege of protecting his devoted love. Veronica had made the interview as brief as possible on each occasion. But she had been gentle and soft in her manner to Barletti, and had professed herself very grateful for the trouble he had taken.

He tried to recall the minutest circumstances of their interviews; at one and awaiting and interpreting Veronica's looks and words into an acknowledgment of love for him; at another telling himself that it was plain she cared no jot for him, and was only using his devotion without a thought of reciprocating it. All his recollections resulted in an impatient longing to see and speak with her again. He struggled to take the step of going to the palazzo she inhabited at once, instead of waiting for the usual hour of his evening visit.

The wretched little cab horse, which, like most of its class in Naples, seemed to have a constant free service not derived from food, and which had continued its shuffling trot as though, poor beast, it were desperately trying to run away from existence, was pulled up with a sudden check at a signal from Barletti. He alighted, paid the fare, and walked hastily away. The man he gave the driver inspired in that individual sentiments of mingled contempt and self-reproach. The contempt was excited by the spectacle of a man—a native Neapolitan, too, per Bacco!—so soft as to pay the hire unless he fixed it. The reason of his self-reproach, of a rather poignant kind, was that he had not had presence of mind to demand double the money!

Barletti, on presenting himself at Sir John Gale's house, was told by the porter that his master could see no one. He had been out all morning, and was fatigued and unwell.

"Miladi, then?" asked Barletti.

The man looked a little surprised at the unprecedented compliment of the title bestowed on her "miladi" at that hour; but he said he would go and see. Barletti was then ushered into the signor principe. While he waited for the message to be taken up, Barletti's mind made the most of the few words that it had just been taken. He wished he could have gone by a side delay into the room where Veronica was: he gave one time to cool, and to take account of unpleasant possibilities.

When Barletti was mad tripped down stairs and invited Barletti to follow her to milady's boudoir, he was in a state of nervous excitement. The boudoir was untenanted when he entered it, and for the moment he felt this to be a relief. He took time and waited for a moment on the evidences of wealth which met his eye, and feebly sang a very unpleasant amount of self-depreciation and timidity.

The door opened and Veronica appeared. She wore a dressing-gown of white cashmere, bordered in the shadows of its sweeping folds from silver gray to deepest purple. Round the throat and wrists was a small frill of fine lace. There was only a gleam of jewelry about her, save on the third finger of her left hand. She was pale, and her ring was half hidden in the blaze of a single splendid diamond set in a broad band of gold, and surmounting the plain wife's ring. She was tall, and looked tired.

"What is it?" she asked, advancing with slow grace, and giving him her hand.

He forgot every thing in the enchantment of gazing on her beauty. He pressed his forehead for her hand in his, and feeling his heart so full of misgiving that he could not speak, looked up into his eyes. A little faint color fluttered over her cheeks and throat. She slowly withdrew her hand, and motioned him to a seat. She was keenly alive to his speechless admiration, and felt secure in it. Barletti, with a sudden feeling languor and the reaction of intense excitement, like a runner who drops the moment he has reached the goal, sank back.

"What is it?" she asked again. "You asked for Sir John, and I was told that it was very important that he brought you here so early?"

"I did not expect to see—your husband," said Barletti, not accepting the proffered chair, but standing before her as she sat, and looking down upon her.

A vivid blush crimsoned her face and neck. Barletti had spoken with intention, and she had noted that he had done so. It was all a man had her real emotion by a feigned one, and threw herself impetuously forward as she sat, and replied: "You did not expect to see him? Why then, did you come at this hour? I should not have received you. I—I thought you had some real business with Sir John."

"I came to see Veronica," he said.

"Then you acted imprudently and inconsiderately."

"Imprudently for myself, perhaps. It may be that the most prudent thing I could do would be to leave you at once. But I have not acted inconsiderately toward you in coming. You have no longer any reason to fear Sir John Gale's anger against you. Your position must have been different."

She bent her head on her breast, which was rising and falling quickly. She preserved the haughty attitude of her head as she looked up at him, but it was not the haughtiness of pride in self, and she could not trust them to frame a reply.

"I saw you being rowed to the landing-place, he proceeded. "And then I accidentally got into conversation with an English officer of marines who belonged to the ship that you—visited this morning. I could hardly believe my ears or my eyes at first. But then suddenly a great many things that had puzzled me grew clear."

Still she would not look at him. She sat a little, and she turned her eyes r ay from him. He had not meant to say it. He had thought to see her triumphant, but she seemed downcast and oppressed. Or was this the beginning of the change in her toward him, which he had dimly foreboded?

"Veronica," he said, pleadingly, "you might have trusted me! I should have been true to you. But you were so proud and so secret. Have you much cause to suffered?"

She had been oppressed by a crowd of confused feelings: surprise, mortified pride, an undefined sense of relief in the knowledge that Count knew the real facts of her position and was still devoted to her; at the same time a hostile movement of amour propre which shuddered at the idea of falling from the high place she had occupied in his thoughts. His last words, and the tone of compassion in his voice, touched a tenderly sensitive spot in her overstrained nerves, and, suddenly dropping her face upon her open palms, she burst into a passion of crying. Perplexed and distressed he came and leaned over her chair, murmuring her name at intervals, and timidly touching the folds of her long sweeping gown. Her tears relieved and soothed her, and as she cried she thought. Even after the first burst of weeping had subsided in self she kept her face hidden, feeling that her attitude and her distress afforded a kind of ambush whereon to collect her thoughts.

"Veronica, you are not angry with me?" said Barletti.

She had by this time been inspired with an idea which was as balm to her hurt pride. It was unbearable to be the object of pity to the man who had worshiped her. Sympathy—even compassion—so long as it were blended with sufficient admiration—she could endure. But she must regain the level she fancied she had lost. To that end would reveal to Barletti the fact of their relationship. She had conceived it until she stood before Barletti, and now in the face without communicating any breath of dishonor to her mother's race? As the thought occurred to her her mind she began to believe in it, as an action believes for the moment in his manic sorrow, and she felt quite magnanimous with a sense of noble self-sacrifice. The anticipated enjoyment of her coming "point" gave her the sensation of exaltation that is raised in her the consuming hands, and pushed the tender hair back from her forehead.

"Count," she said, in a voice which had not quite regained its steadiness, "I have something to tell you."

MEDORA LEIGH.*

IN September, 1869, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe published simultaneously in two republics Magazines and a newspaper, in the monarchy in England, an article which purported to set forth "The True Story of Lady Byron's Domestic Life." As far as the question involved in the present paper is concerned, the essential facts stated by Mrs. Stowe are these:

In 1856 Mrs. Stowe, who was then in England, received a visit from Lady Byron, who, finding that she wished to have some private conversation with her upon important subjects, Lady Byron had no reason to fear, and who was enjoying that reputation. At this time Lady Byron was about 66 years of age. She had been long in feeble health, and had been advised by her physicians that she had but a very little time to live. Lady Byron announced that she had sought this interview with the purpose of setting forth the true reasons for the final separation from Lord Byron, forty years before. The interview lasted a whole day, giving Lady Byron ample time to tell her story and to produce all the papers in her hand. She also gave to Mrs. Stowe a paper containing a memorandum of what she had said, with the dates affixed.

Whether Mrs. Stowe took notes of this memorandum was written at the time, or had been previously prepared, does not appear. Mrs. Stowe returned this memorandum, apparently without retaining a copy of it; and it does not appear that she made at the time any record of the conversation. It seems to have been clearly understood that Lady Byron left Mrs. Stowe to be at perfect liberty to decide whether at all, and if so, at what time and in what manner, the information thus conveyed to her should be published.

Thirteen years after, when Lady Byron had been dead for seven years, Madame Guizot, wife of Madame de Boissy, as she had become by marriage—a woman verging upon threscore-and-ten, and who had been long in regard to the man with whom she had lived in open and avowed adultery had a reputation for virtue—a woman whose jealousy was extreme, and who had her own settled theory of life, and was unflinching in her effort who united a conviction of her own wisdom to perfect ignorance of the world in which she lived, believing that she knew it as well; who, far from consenting to modify her opinions, would fain have imposed them upon others. In short, a woman who had nothing in common with Lady Byron but the power of intellect, or to find the root to his heart or mind: fondly, one to the other, forgiveness and reconciliation had been effected.

The sentences above placed in italics seem to be mainly the ones which Mrs. Stowe thought it important to controvert, by showing, first, that Lady Byron's whole life was one of sublime patience, charity, self-abnegation, and forgiveness, for which we may surely seek a parallel among human beings; and that these virtues were especially manifested in her conduct toward that husband who had over and over again, in prose and verse, charged her with utter incapacity for the duties of compassion and forgiveness. If the charges which she brings against Byron are well founded, no one will deny that Mrs. Stowe has fully proven her point. Of these charges we have at present to deal with but two, which we give in Mrs. Stowe's own words:

First. "Byron fell into the depths of a secret, sedentary intrigue with a blood relation, so near in consanguinity that discovery must have been utter ruin and disgrace in any civilized society. Byron became forth his daunting guilty secret because the ruling force in his life, dwelling him with a morbid fascination, yet filling him with remorse and anguish, and known only to Medora."

Second. "There was an unfortunate child of six, born with the curse upon her, over whose wayward nature Lady Byron watched with a mother's tenderness. She was one who could have patience when the patience of every one else failed; and though the child was not her own, she felt a peculiar personal responsibility to evil in the subject of it, yet Lady Byron never faltered and never gave over the child, but she responsibly from her hands."

Mrs. Stowe does not indeed say directly that the partner of this incestuous intrigue was Augusta Leigh, the half-sister of Byron; nor does she directly affirm that Lady Byron learned of the existence of this crime during the period of her visit to Mrs. Stowe; nor that the child was the offspring of this particular crime. But there can be no doubt that it was understood, and intended her readers to understand, that all these were facts in the case.

We do not propose more than to touch upon the manner in which the statements made by Mrs. Stowe were received. No one, we imagine, ever supposed that these charges were invented by Mrs. Stowe, or doubted that she reproduced, with nearly as much accuracy as memory would permit after the lapse of thirteen years, the substance of the statements made to her by Lady Byron. But the information published contained so many palpable and demonstrable inaccuracies, and the inconsistencies, indeed, some of them long known, and others brought to light from independent and unexpected, but altogether unquestionable sources, were so almost universal judgment was that the charges were not only not established, but were also wholly unfounded. If this was the case, the second charge, of which little mention was made, fell to the ground. It could also count to light that Mrs. Stowe was not the only, nor the first person to whom Lady Byron had made the same charge. But there was no evidence that Lady Byron ever made the charge until many years after the death of Byron. It was natural that of the multitudes of persons who gave the subject a careful and candid consideration an immense majority should arrive at the conclusion that Lady Byron entertained this belief under the influence of one of those monomaniac hallucinations which sometimes accompany age and infirmity.

If the "History and Autobiography," the title of which is prefixed at the commencement of this paper, be not just what it purports to be it is the worst base and most audacious forgery that has been perpetrated within the memory of living man—a forgery also easily proven and fastened upon the real criminal—a charge which no one has any illegal pretense to inspect then."

Assuming, as we are warranted in doing, the genuineness of the book, it is proposed to present somewhat extended résumé of its contents.

George Gordon Byron, the poet, born in 1788, was the son of Captain John Byron, who was the son of Admiral Byron, a brother of William, fifth Lord Byron of Rochdale, who died in a duel for the murder of his cousin, Mr. Chaworth, whom he had killed in a drunken brawl. This Hon. William Byron, for the last twenty-five of his life, which ended in 1798, was known as the "wicked Lord Byron." Of numerous surviving children he was succeeded in his titles and estates by the poet, then a boy of ten. Admiral Byron, who died in 1786, married in 1748 to a Miss Trevanion; but there was something irregular in this marriage that within sixty years after, it was necessary to be proven by the poet, in order to enable him to show his right to a seat in the House of Lords. It was done only with much difficulty and after considerable delay. This irregularity was supposed to lie prominently in what is to be said of Medora Leigh.

John Byron, the son of the Admiral, was, about 1776, the handsomest and most reckless young nobleman in England. "His wife commonly known as Mad Jack Byron." Before he had fairly reached his majority he had become notorious as an adulterer intrigue with a queress. This woman was Amelia D'Arcy, only daughter and heiress of Robert, fourth Earl of Holderness and Baron Conyers. The earldom did not descend to heirs female, and became extinct on the death of the fifth earl, in 1778. Her barony did descend in the female line, and she was styled Lady Conyers. She was married to Francis, Marquis of Carmarthen, who in time became Duke of Leeds. By this husband she had two children, one of whom succeeded to his father's dukedom and his mother's barony. The names of D'Arcy and Leeds also became mixed up in the affairs of Medora Leigh. The Marquis of Carmarthen having, in 1779, obtained a divorce from his wife, she soon after married her paramour, John Byron, Admiral Byron. She (in 1781, according to one account, but as stated by Moore, more probably in 1785) having a daughter, Mary Augusta, who subsequently married her cousin, Colonel Leigh of the army, and was usually known as Mrs. Leigh, although her proper designation was Lady Mary Augusta Leigh.

* Medora Leigh, A History and Autobiography. Ed. ited by Lord Byron's Wife. With an Introductory Letter, a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. London: Richard Bentley.

Shortly after the death of Lady Carmarthen, John Byron married Catherine Gordon, an heiress belonging to one of the noblest Scottish families, and connected remotely with the royal line. The sole issue of this second marriage was George Gordon Byron, the poet. Is it worthy of note that the Duke of Gordon was one of the godfathers of this infant. It thus appears that the Byrons were directly allied to quite a few of the oldest families of the peerage and aristocracy; and also that there was a fearful taint of blood running through generations in the parentage of the half-brother and sister.

Of John Byron it is only necessary to say that in two years he ran through all the fortune of his second wife, and died in 1791, leaving her and their one daughter destitute. Apparently, she was eight years the senior of her half-brother, who was therefore brought up by the family of her mother. They saw each other only occasionally until 1812, he being twenty-three years of age, and she thirty-one. She was married, and to all appearance a happy wife, and the mother of three children. She had seen Byron in 1816, just before his final departure from England. During the preceding two years they were much together. After that she lived for many years, and became the mother of four children, one having been born in 1835. That child was the Medora Leigh, the subject of this paper, and the one to whom Mr. Stowe refers as the "child of a sin," of incestuous intercourse between her mother and her mother's half-brother, Byron.

According in connection with this charge, now first publicly made, we are confident that no reproach or suspicion was ever attached against Augusta Leigh; while there remains evidence as abundant as can be brought forward in the case of any other married lady that she was regarded and treated as a woman of unblemished character and reputation. Moreover, if her name can man fell into that abyss of infamy, as is deliberately and solemnly affirmed by Lady Byron, almost quarter of a century, and yet it is hardly more credible that she should be the mother of two daughters so utterly inhuman as are set forth in the book.

We now at length come to the special case of Medora Leigh, the only material point of which is absolutely from this "History and Autobiography."

In the summer of 1843 there arrived in London a woman evidently of considerable culture and refinement, of about the age of—and-twenty; with her was a girl of nine or ten, whom she represented as her daughter. She was accompanied by Captain De B——, a gallant veteran of the British army, who had served through the Peninsular war in the 71st regiment, and had received several severe wounds at Waterloo, for which he enjoyed a pension of £100 per annum. She claimed to be the daughter of Augusta Leigh, and had come from France, where she had for a while resided, to obtain advantage some claims upon the kindness of Lady Byron. Captain De B—— stated that he became acquainted with her in the south of France, where she was living in apparent respectability under the name of Madame St. Aubin. He had just lately met her in Paris, on the occasional assistance of utter destitution; had supplied her from his own scanty means with money and immediate support, and to proceed to London. There he introduced her to Mr. S——, his legal agent. To this lawyer she confided her history, necessitating, among other things, that while Mrs. Leigh was living, her father was not Colonel Leigh, but Lord Byron. Mr. S—— took up the case. "Miss Leigh proved to his entire satisfaction, by documentary evidence in her possession, that she was indeed the daughter of the Hon. Augusta Leigh. She also proved to him, and afterward gave him in writing the whole history of her unhappy life, and so deeply impressed him in her favor that he took measures, without divulging their object, to obtain confidential access to some of the high personages interested in her case."

The autobiography opens thus abruptly:

"I am the fourth child of a family of seven. My eldest sister, Georgiana, married Mr. Henry Trevanion, a distant cousin, who, I believe, was a relation of my aunt. The marriage, which met the approbation of no one except my parents, did not turn out happily, owing to the smallness of fortune and the reverse temper of both parties. I was frequently invited to go and keep them company, and in March, 1839, after they had been married three years, it was decided that I should accompany them to a country house which had been placed at their disposal by my brother-in-law, Lord Byron, during the time of my sister's approaching confinement. I was told that my sister wished that my 'Governess' should be stated in whatever letter Mr. Trevanion had been enabled to marry only by a sum of money, ostensibly a loan, but understood to be really a gift, from Lord Byron.) "The last injunction and admonition I received from my parents on starting were, in all things to devote myself to pleasing my brother-in-law, Mr. Trevanion; to get rid of the dislike I entertained for him, and to cease ridiculing him, as I had been in the habit of doing.

"My sister's illness, during her confinement, was of the severest kind. She was delirious for days. On the occasion of my visit both husband and wife were away by night; and was frequently sent by my sister into his bedroom before every one was up in the house to bed. Some months passed in this manner, during which Mr. Trevanion took advantage of my sister's weakness and effected my ruin, and I found myself, likely to become a mother by one I had ever disliked."

The guilty pair threw themselves upon the mercy of Mrs. Trevanion; and it was agreed between her and her husband that they should take the fruit sister abroad. Mrs. Leigh, who appears to have been wholly ignorant of the reasons for this step, consented, and the three left for Calais, in France, where Medora was delivered of a boy, who was taken in charge by the confidential servant, and disappeared from sight. She was subsequently informed—most likely truly—that the child had died soon after the moment of its birth. This was in 1839, Medora being then fifteen years of age. She returned to her mother, who endeavored to force her into society and to balls, to which she objected on account of her youth, and because she had no taste for dancing, having for sister who had recently died. Here follows a new Act of the tragedy.

She was in total ignorance of the society of Trevanion, and the consequence was that early in the next year (1840) she found herself again likely to become a mother. Mrs. Leigh was now taken into the confidence of the parties, and it was arranged that Medora should accompany Trevanion and his wife into the country. Colonel Leigh appears soon after to have been made acquainted with the state of affairs, for in June he caused Medora to be shut up in a lunatic asylum. Up to this time she believed that Colonel Leigh was her father, although she had been told the contrary by Trevanion and his wife. She, however, believing herself to be insane in the asylum, to have a few minutes' private talk with Trevanion, and, in reply to her inquiry, learned, if possible, make her escape and run away with him. She declares that her sister was privy to this arrangement. It was agreed that he should elope, and to all appearance a happy wife, and the mother of three children. She had seen Byron in 1816, just before his final departure from England. During the preceding two years they were much together. After that she lived for many years, and became the mother of four children, one having been born in 1835. That child was the Medora Leigh, the subject of this paper, and the one to whom Mr. Stowe refers as the "child of a sin," of incestuous intercourse between her mother and her mother's half-brother, Byron.

According in connection with this charge, now first publicly made, we are confident that no reproach or suspicion was ever attached against Augusta Leigh; while there remains evidence as abundant as can be brought forward in the case of any other married lady that she was regarded and treated as a woman of unblemished character and reputation. Moreover, if her name can man fell into that abyss of infamy, as is deliberately and solemnly affirmed by Lady Byron, almost quarter of a century, and yet it is hardly more credible that she should be the mother of two daughters so utterly inhuman as are set forth in the book.

We now at length come to the special case of Medora Leigh, the only material point of which is absolutely from this "History and Autobiography."

In the summer of 1843 there arrived in London a woman evidently of considerable culture and refinement, of about the age of—and-twenty; with her was a girl of nine or ten, whom she represented as her daughter. She was accompanied by Captain De B——, a gallant veteran of the British army, who had served through the Peninsular war in the 71st regiment, and had received several severe wounds at Waterloo, for which he enjoyed a pension of £100 per annum. She claimed to be the daughter of Augusta Leigh, and had come from France, where she had for a while resided, to obtain advantage some claims upon the kindness of Lady Byron. Captain De B—— stated that he became acquainted with her in the south of France, where she was living in apparent respectability under the name of Madame St. Aubin. He had just lately met her in Paris, on the occasional assistance of utter destitution; had supplied her from his own scanty means with money and immediate support, and to proceed to London. There he introduced her to Mr. S——, his legal agent. To this lawyer she confided her history, necessitating, among other things, that while Mrs. Leigh was living, her father was not Colonel Leigh, but Lord Byron. Mr. S—— took up the case. "Miss Leigh proved to his entire satisfaction, by documentary evidence in her possession, that she was indeed the daughter of the Hon. Augusta Leigh. She also proved to him, and afterward gave him in writing the whole history of her unhappy life, and so deeply impressed him in her favor that he took measures, without divulging their object, to obtain confidential access to some of the high personages interested in her case."

The autobiography opens thus abruptly:

"I am the fourth child of a family of seven. My eldest sister, Georgiana, married Mr. Henry Trevanion, a distant cousin, who, I believe, was a relation of my aunt. The marriage, which met the approbation of no one except my parents, did not turn out happily, owing to the smallness of fortune and the reverse temper of both parties. I was frequently invited to go and keep them company, and in March, 1839, after they had been married three years, it was decided that I should accompany them to a country house which had been placed at their disposal by my brother-in-law, Lord Byron, during the time of my sister's approaching confinement. I was told that my sister wished that my 'Governess' should be stated in whatever letter that Mr. Trevanion had been enabled to marry only by a sum of money, ostensibly a loan, but understood to be really a gift, from Lord Byron.) "The last injunction and admonition I received from my parents on starting were, in all things to devote myself to pleasing my brother-in-law, Mr. Trevanion; to get rid of the dislike I entertained for him, and to cease ridiculing him, as I had been in the habit of doing.

"My sister's illness, during her confinement, was of the severest kind. She was delirious for days. On the occasion of my visit both husband and wife were away by night; and was frequently sent by my sister into his bedroom before every one was up in the house to bed. Some months passed in this manner, during which Mr. Trevanion took advantage of my sister's weakness and effected my ruin, and I found myself, likely to become a mother by one I had ever disliked."

But things did not run smoothly. The autobiography continues:

"Lady Byron's temper caused me great misery, and the strange arrangements were often most painful. In May, 1841, the Chancery suit was decided, in a way which showed me that I had been in a way sacrificed to my mother's interest. I openly expressed to Lady Byron my pity for her, and my determination of leaving England; and solicited from her the means of doing so. She seemed pleased with my proposal, and said that to provide for Lord Byron would have done; and so on.

Lady Byron, finding her protégée determined to leave England, spoke of the necessity of her having a lady to live with her abroad. To this the willful girl readily objected. Then Lady Byron proposed a £50 a year, for the paying the wages of a maid whom she and Medora should keep.

"I informed Lady Byron," says Medora, "of my being left with child, and that I should like to go to a place she proposed, at Hyeres, for £150 per annum; that I would endeavor to do so, but that I would not, as in the past, suffer poverty and privation; and that whatever I might do, as a child, should be necessary for my health and Marie's education, I should endeavor to procure in some other way."

The upshot, as we gather from the Autobiography, was that Lady Byron would furnish whatever was necessary; but that it should be paid into the hands of the woman who had been hired expressly as a "lady's maid," but really to be a guardian, and that she should superintend the manner in which it was spent. Medora declined this proposal, and the husband of the "maid," who appears to have been a "courier," was hired for that purpose. The "Lord of Appointments" was Colonel Leigh, and Lord Byron, apparently by way of pledge of future good conduct on the part of Medora, also to her letters and papers, which Medora says were of the utmost importance. These letters somehow disappeared, and further mention of them occurs not in the "History" once or twice in connection with police reports, but in no other way.

Lady Byron seems toward this time to have kept aloof from her wayward charge, leaving matters to be managed by Ada and her husband, Lord Lovelace. Ada—so says Medora—"promised to write to me and protect me, assuring me that that her mother was deeply attached to me."

Then, on the 22d of July, 1842, Medora, with her maid and servant, furnished by Lady Byron with sufficient funds for the journey, set out for Hyeres, which had been fixed upon as her place of abode. Here Medora spent about a year, during which time she became acquainted with Captain De B——, then occupying some trouble about the receipt of remittances from Lady Byron. Medora set out for Paris to consult with her lawyer, Mr. S——, and to make an establishment for her child. She was to receive £100 per annum, and to be allowed £50 more for her wealthy relations the money which he had advanced.

Such is the history set forth at some length, mainly in what purport to be, and have the appearance of being, letters from persons of repute. Mr. S——, according to Dr. Lushington, who has been for more than a quarter of a century in Lady Byron's confidence; but other than this matter before her ladyship, he reserved for answer that he could not induce her to have any further interview with Medora. Mr. S—— however, advised Mr. S—— to apply to Sir George Grey, Bart., and to Lord Lovelace. Mr. S—— consulted Lady Byron, and said that he would endeavor to obtain from the friends of Miss Leigh a pecuniary provision, upon the condition that she would surrender to trustees the child of Trevanion, as a sacred precaution for her child; that she should give a written expression of her sincere contrition for the past; that she should promise that she should have no recognition in France. Medora was willing to accept the terms, but declined to surrender or accede to the first until she had received "an irrevocable obligation for her own support and education, upon which she would rely implicitly and make."

For about four months Medora is traceable in London by the begging letters which she wrote to her titled kinsmen. These brought her little or no money. The Duke of Leeds sent her a few pounds, and for the rest she seems to have been wholly dependent upon the bounty of Captain De B——. She made no attempt to see her mother, but was met with the reply, "Not at present." Lady Byron was at this time ill, and Ada asked Mr. S—— to forward. This does not appear to have been sent, as it was not received by Mr. S——. Medora in other characterizes it as "haughty, unfeeling, and cruel; and of such a character that no one, not even Ada, could, after mature deliberation, have deemed it both expedient and proper to exclude it from these pages."

The last which Mr. S——, Captain De B——, or Mr. Mackay appear to know of this "unfortunate child of sin" is a brief note, dated October 12, 1843, addressed to Mr. S——, signed "Ada Lovelace," requesting the answer to be addressed to "Madame Aubin, 18 Adelphon Terrace, Old Ox Road, Islington." Medora presents him to appoint a time for accompanying her to a police magistrate, for some purpose not specified. Mr. Mackay, indeed, says that she, "bearing with her her little daughter Marie, disappeared from the great, heartless, busy, cruel world of London, and soon afterward sank into that beneficent grave where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." But he suggests, what Mrs. Stowe's brief allusion renders more than probable, that she had "agreed to all the terms demanded by Lady Byron, and had ended her days in the receipt of her bounty."

It is difficult to imagine any reason why the editor of this book should have concealed under the name of Captain De B—— and Mr. S—— the names of two persons who bear an eminent part in the story, if they had been severely wounded at Waterloo," fifty-five years ago, may be fairly assumed to be no longer living. The latter is expressly affirmed to be still alive, at an advanced age, and unwilling to have his name brought before the public. Why is there be such a man, and if, as is affirmed, the letters addressed to him are in the hands of the publisher, and will be shown, the address upon them will declare his identity. Moreover, there is nothing which appears representing the conduct of either of these in a right other than favorable.

The book throws no new light upon the question of the alleged criminality of Lord Byron and Mrs. Leigh. It, indeed, shows—assuming it to be genuine—that at a somewhat late period of her life Lady Byron believed such to have been the fact, but that this girl was the offspring of that crime. The editor puts forth an intemperate criticism upon Mrs. Stowe's article; but in reality nothing which has been said by her is in a much better manner. He also enters into a long argument to show that the conduct of Lady Byron derived the information which led her—as early as 1840, and probably somewhat earlier—to believe in the criminality of her husband. He thinks it most probable that this authority was Georgiana Trevanion, Lady Byron's sister, as far as now appears, as likely to be true as any other.

There is one circumstance relating to the relations of Lord Byron and his sister which we have not seen referred to, but which, considered, and which, properly followed up, may possibly throw some light upon the main subject.

On the 19th of July, 1815, Byron executed his last will and testament. The date, it will be observed, is seven months after the birth of Medora, after his marriage, and not quite four and a half months before the birth of his daughter Ada. By this will the whole of his property, except in part as had at the time of their marriage been settled upon Lady Byron, was bequeathed to his sister Augusta and her children. He thus, so far as lay in his power, set off from all participation in his estate the child of his wife's unborn child, and all children who might thereafter be born to them. He also disinherited that cousin who had been the cause of his ruin, and the heir of his title. He appears always to have been on excellent terms with Mrs. Leigh, more than once in writing had expressed his intention of making him the heir of his estates also. This will was, however revoked a few days after the death of Byron was proved before Dr. Lushington, judge and advocate of the prerogative, and the executors named in the will received due letters of administration.

The property thus bequeathed was great; for Byron at the time of his death was a rich man. It is important that in a single year he spent of the fine when he was harassed by creditors and bailiff—in very books levied upon and sold at auction—his debts seem to have been discharged, and himself in the receipt of a large income, we are not informed. But it is certain that during his first arrival in Italy his revenue was large. Two years before his death we find him consulting whether it would be safe to increase the allowance for the value of money then and now, nearly half a million of dollars. He had, however, seven mortgage of Irish estates. He lived in every way most expensively; yet, not long before his decease he wrote to Mr. Kinnaird, that as regarding that his surplus income was 20,000 dollars a year—as much, be it remembered, as that of the President of the United States. When he let out for Greece he was able, from the accumulations of three years, to take with him 60,000 dollars.

This inexplicable will was made at the time when (if at all) the incestuous intercourse between Byron and his sister was being carried on. Lord Leigh was within a few years the death of the child who was the alleged offspring of that incest. If the charge was supported by any probable power of tracing the collateral acquirement might be found for it in the fact of the will. Again, those who have the most contemptuous moral traits from generation to generation may be pardoned for thinking credible the most thought against Lord Byron who was the daughter of Lady Conyers, and the mother of Georgiana and Augusta Leigh.

Again, notwithstanding this great bequest of Byron, we find, not long after his death, his sister, Mrs. Leigh, in pecuniary difficulties from which she was relieved by a subscription from affluent, and apparently in a measure at least, dependent upon the bounty of Lady Byron. Such a fortune, as far as we can judge, was greater than is to be accounted for by the ordinary course of events. Lord Byron's will. Do not these circumstances indicate that the executors of Byron's will (Hobhouse, his early associate, and Hanson, his business agent for many years), who were sworn to execute that will, and who had the absolute power of selling or transferring the property, privately made it over to Lady Byron and her daughters? Such seems to us to be the only view that could only be with the consent of Augusta Leigh. Under the pressure of what circumstances we are unable to say.

But these and some other kindred topics open too wide a field for speculation to be here considered at length.

HIGH-PRIEST AT NABLUS READING THE PENTATEUCH.—[SEE PAGE 45.]

THE IMPERIAL YACHT "L'AIGLE," WITH THE EMPRESS EUGENIE ON BOARD, PASSING THROUGH THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE PASSAGE OF THE SUEZ CANAL.

ONE illustration on this page represents the steam-yacht of the Empress EUGENIE, with the accompanying fleet, making the passage of the Suez Canal, on the formal trip which opened this vast enterprise to the commerce of the world. Whatever defects may be found in the canal, this trip proved that a channel of sufficient depth of water to accommodate vessels of considerable tonnage really exists from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, and that no obstacles to its navigation exist which money and engineering skill may not in time remove.

READING THE PENTATEUCH AT NABLUS.

IN a beautiful valley between Mounts Gerisim and Ebal, about thirty miles north of Jerusalem, lies a handsomely built town of very ancient origin, which now bears the name of Nablûs or Nabulus. The site is described as the most lovely spot in Central Palestine. It lies embosomed amid groves of olives; and abundant fountains and streams, combined with the genial climate, make it a perpetual garden.

This charming spot has, however, a higher claim than that of natural beauty. Here, for upward of 4000 years—from before the time of ABRAHAM to the present day—the worship of God has been maintained, according to the traditions of the Hebrew patriarchs and the ceremonial established by MOSES. The modern town, which is large and well built, contains about 10,000 inhabitants, all of whom are Mohammedans, with the exception of a small community of Samaritans numbering about 170 souls. It stands on the site of the Sichem or Shechem of the Old Testament, the Sychar of the New Testament, and the Neapolis of the Greeks and Romans, of which name the modern word Nablûs is evidently a corruption. EUSEBIUS and ST. JEROME say that the ancient Shechem was a suburb of Neapolis; ST. JEROME also maintains that Sychar, in ST. JOHN'S Gospel (iv. 5), is a corruption of Sichem. Here, it is probable, ABRAM sojourned when, at God's command, before his name was changed to ABRAHAM, he left his country and kindred in quest of the land of promise, and journeying through Canaan, came to the place of Sichem, and there for the first time pitched his tent and built an altar in the land to be given to his seed. Here, four hundred years later, his descendants, after their long servitude in Egypt and wanderings in the wilderness, first assembled and established themselves on taking possession of the promised inheritance. Here, nearly two hundred years after ABRAM first encamped, his grandson JACOB spread his tent and dug a well in the field he had bought of the children of HAMOR, SHECHEM'S father. Near to it stands at the present time a little village called Sâlim, which it is not very difficult to identify with the "Shalem, a city of Shechem," where JACOB bought the parcel of ground, not perhaps with the Salem of the high-priest MELCHISEDEK, who set bread and wine before ABRAM and blessed him. Shechem fell to EPHRAIM, and was a Levitical city and a city of refuge. Here was JOSEPH'S tomb, and here also was the tabernacle in the time of JOSHUA, who set up a pillar near it shortly before his death. Here GIDEON defeated the Midianites, and REHOBOAM was made king. By the side of JACOB'S well Jesus sat, wearied with his journey, and conversed with the Samaritan woman, while his disciples went to Sychar to buy meat. The name Neapolis (new town) was given during the occupation of Syria by the Greeks, who probably extended the city to the westward on account of the abundant supply of water in that direction. SIMON MAGUS practiced his sorceries in Neapolis, and JUSTIN MARTYR was a native of the same city.

During the destructive wars waged by JUSTINIAN against the Samaritans in the first half of the sixth century the nation almost disappeared from history, and in modern times only one community of this people is known to exist—that at Nablûs. According to their local traditions they are doomed to extinction. This small community has in its possession a copy of the five books of MOSES which claims to be the oldest book in existence. The Samaritans themselves maintain that it was written by ABISHUA, the great-grandson of AARON, fourth high-priest of the JEWS, which would make its age about three thousand three hundred years. The opinions of scholars as to its age vary greatly. MOST critics do not venture to carry its date beyond B.C. 116, when the temple to which it probably belonged was destroyed. The manuscript Pentateuch is written on a large parchment-like scroll, which is rolled upon two poles, protected by an embroidered cover, and deposited in a richly-ornamented cylindrical case of precious metals opening upon hinges. The ornament at the top of the case is said by the Samaritans to represent the standards of the tribes; the balls represent pomegranates. There are spots in the MS. from the kisses of the Samaritans on the passages where the name of AARON occurs.

Our engraving on page 44 is taken from a very fine drawing by Mr. CARL HAAG, an eminent English water-color artist, who visited the synagogue of the Samaritans at Nablûs during his journey in Palestine; and being much impressed by the noble bearing, and handsome, intelligent, expressive, Semitic countenance of the high-priest, ABRAM, sought an introduction through DR. GEORGE ROSEN, then accredited as Prussian Consul to Jerusalem, but at that time staying at Nablûs. The result was that Mr. HAAG was not only permitted to take his easel into the synagogue for the purpose of sketching the place, but the high-priest stood in person, in his robes, and Pentateuch in hand, to enable the artist to makes a large finished study of him. The picture is consequently authentic, equally as regards the portraiture and accessories. The priest reads the MS. as represented, holding it high up before him: by turning the pole-handles he unrolls it off the left hand pole over to the right hand one—taking care not to touch the sacred scroll with bare hands. When he has finished reading, the scroll is placed in its case and returned to the tabernacle. The embroidery upon the crimson curtain covering the wall behind the high-priest professes to represent the ancient temple which stood on Mount Gerizim. At the bottom of the curtain appears the porch of the Temple, with two pillars, one on each side, called "Jachin and Boaz;" between which stand two golden candlesticks and a very large vase in the middle. Higher up, amidst a profusion of ornaments, are trumpets, cymbals, and other ancient musical instruments. Above this, again, the embroidery shows the Court of the Priests, with a square plate in the centre representing the altar on altar; on the right of which is a seven-branched candlestick; on the left, the vessel for burning frankincense; and beneath, the table whereon the shew-bread is set. Over all, at the top, is represented the Most Holy Place, in the centre of which stands the Ark of the Covenant, with a large vessel on the left, and AARON'S rod that blossomed on the right.

CRAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hagan's Magnolia Balm or Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HAGAN & CO., New York.

IF PEOPLE WOULD CONSIDER from the dull stupidity that meets us every where in spring, and too often in all seasons of the year, how to quicken the blood and liver by taking AYER'S SARSAPARILLA to purge the bile from their systems, we should have fewer sick neighbors as well as clearer heads to deal with.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

FOR SALE AT PRICE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, New United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York City. The Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage with seven thousand shares in the rate of $18,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. The line connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney will take a short cut through route to Colorado.

The Company have a Capital Stock

Of 20,000 shares..... $10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress

of 1,000,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at..... 4,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds..... 1,500,000

Total..... $15,500,000

Length of Road, 113 miles. Price 90¼ and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, Pamphlet, Maps, and information relating thereto. These bonds, being so well secured, and yielding a large income, will be available to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,
No. 54 Pine Street, New York.
TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,
No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and is more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 90 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

A HUMBUG

Has long kept, won't stand still long. Dr. WORCESTER compiles the same business he did ten years ago, and enjoys quite free of cost, with his Pure Family Medicines, Sharon Springs, New York. Sold at all drug stores.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S

Establishment for the sale of

HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.

Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Also, household articles requiring Repairing done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Gas Work, and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

EMPLOYMENT.

Very little capital required, and no risk. Success certain. Business highly respectable, and Profit from 60 to 100 per cent. Persons desiring lucrative employment should write for particulars at once. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, 74 Beekman St., N. Y.

MAN IN GENESIS AND IN GEOLOGY. Or, THE BIBLE ACCOUNT OF MAN'S CREATION, Tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By D. D. Whedon, D.D. Price $1. Sold by booksellers, and sent free post by

S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

WESTERN FARMS, City and Suburban Lots. J. H. E. BESEMER, 1963 Dearborn St., Chicago.

AGONY of RUPTURE.

ITS

Effectual Cure.

As related in the following communication by MR. WM. H. SMITH.

Believing that there is nothing more interesting to a large portion of the people than information concerning a reliable method for the immediate relief and perfect cure of rupture, we cheerfully publish Mr. Smith's statement, earnestly commending it to the serious attention of those who may be interested in the subject, from personal need, or in sympathy for some suffering friend. Mr. Smith is a gentleman in whose statements we cannot overstate our full implicit reliance, in proof of which he refers to one of the largest commercial houses in this city.

To Harper's Weekly:

Your publication of Mr. George Hodge's communication, concerning his sufferings from rupture, and final cure by Dr. Sherman, prompts me to address you the following facts, touching my case:

When I—for, like whole North—was electrified with the splendid march of General Sherman, and his triumphs in overcoming the rupture of our country, I little dreamed that I should be filled with joy and gratitude toward the one bearing a similar name, for personal assistance in curing a rupture as important to me of health, and the capacity of enjoying the various comforts of life, as the Sherman we, under the blessing of God, have to thank mainly for the Union and the enjoyment of the blessings of liberty by the entire nation. But such is the fact. I am in ecstacy—unable to express the fullness of my heart—the unbounded satisfaction which I now enjoy, from being relieved and thoroughly cured of rupture. It is truly an affliction, in comparison with which the cholera, and plagues, the burning fever and diphtheria, are from the hand of misfortune—dew-drops in comparison with the weight of a heavy shower—the all-pervasive beams to the intense rays of the noonday sun. Yes, rupture is dispiriting, dispiriting, as only can be the victims connected with naive life. He knows its incapacities, its horrors, its fears, its forebodings, and never a sensitive object of pity, when otherwise his every movement would be illuminated, and marked with the grace and stamina of a Napoleon. Such conjectures and reflections are but the truth—too truthful to the halting subject. Yes, I could go further, and, from my present feelings, exclaim: To be ruptured is to be like the noble captive chained to the triumphal car of the noble captive released and in the midst of his friends. Words fail me, I could cover my paper up to every ruptured being in the country, and that Dr. Sherman is the most human, considerate, and candid man I have ever met, and his treatment is the most successful and speedy. Why, I was under the treatment of a number of surgeons, and would then be witnessing the neglect out the hand: My rupture is cured! like the tender zeal of tender would rest over the pain, through the reflex, leaping from hill-top to hill-top, from mountain-peak to mountain-peak, from to the circle of the earth and heaven would be ringing with the praises of Dr. Sherman's genius, in thus conquering the most dreaded affliction poor humanity has to bear up against. And I believe the Doctor's deeds would carry him as deep in the heart of the nation as the General's has, had the nation known them. Actuated by the general, he is more esteemed as an emblem of peace than as a warrior, surrounded by a bevy of gladdened hearts, and placed upon his brow by the divine touch of the Creator, a halo of light that would, in its abundance could not volumize, did patience not check me, by reminding me that this is but a simple communication concerning a good cause for the interests of the poor afflicted; for he who is ruptured is poor indeed. Anything more millions. These remarks may be repudiated by those who are not subjects of this affliction, or who have no knowledge of the wretchedness it entails upon its victims; but by all those they will be received with the fullest feeling. I am cured. In those three words are embodied my future hope of success from engaging in the active pursuits of life. Yes, I am Cured of my Rupture.

I feel it. I know it. I daily enjoy the proof of it.

I adopted Dr. Sherman's curative method on a New-Years present to myself for 1869, and a happier New-Year can never light up my path in the future. No, never. When I think of it, it is as Brick Pomeroy, of the Democrat observed, said, in alluding to Dr. Sherman's cure: "Almost miraculous." Cured without pain, cured without the interruption of labor, without suffering or inconvenience; cured while laughing, joking, working, when others around me were suffering and sighing from the pain of irksome tissue, deriding my hope of cure—dubious, incredulous, disinterested degree to the True cure. Yes, I say, under such circumstances, awakens in the mind the reflection "almost miraculous." I think I have said enough; but as there may be some unreasonable creature, over whose heart the world's sympathy may refer him to the house of Murphy, Grant, & Co., 18 Reade St., New York, where I am well known for many years as an honest citizen. At the same time, it will afford me infinite pleasure to correspond with the unfortunate in regard to my interests and cure, by letter. The publishing of Mr. Hodge's communication in your paper last year, having aroused my slumbering hopes, I now solicit, in behalf of humanity, the publication of my experience, with the impression that it may have a similar good influence on others who are suffering from rupture, and at the same time enable me to publicly acknowledge, through one of the most widely-known and widespread sources, the specific character of Dr. Sherman's invaluable healing system. I thought I had finished, but can not lay down my pen without saying to every one of my fellow-sufferers, Don't delay a day longer. I tried three years, and here is cure. There is no good in them. Away with them, and secure Dr. Sherman's assistance, perseverance, and curative, as I did, and be cured as I am. Then, and not till then, will you enjoy your existence as I now enjoy mine.

Yours truly,

W. H. SMITH.

MANSION, FAIRFIELD CO., CONN. }
January 3, 1870. }

To avoid the annoyance from letters inquiring the address of Dr. Sherman, we will here state that it is No. 651 Broadway, New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $6, $12, $18, $30, $50, $60, $90. Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO.,

10 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, BAZAR, or MAGAZINE, $4, and THE FIRESIDE COMPANION, a splendid Literary Paper, $2. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY. Business new. Samples and particulars free. J. C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

A True Love Story!

A Story which Should be Read by Every Lady in the Land,

IS NOW READY, IN THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY.

THIS REAL LOVE STORY IS ENTITLED,

FAITHFUL MARGARET;

OR, THE

Sleuth-Hound of Castle Brand.

By MISS ANNIE ASHMORE.

The gifted author of "The Beautiful Rienzi," and "The Bride Elect," encouraged by the universal praise awarded to the romances just named, has produced another charming story, which is in many respects superior to them. While marked by the same elegance of expression, force of delineation, and life-like characterization,

FAITHFUL MARGARET;

OR, THE

Sleuth-Hound of Castle Brand, possesses a plot so artistic in construction, and so mysterious in incident, that every chapter contains some new and strange developments which almost perplex the reader and keep him or her in a state of delightful wonderment from the opening to the close. This is the leading events hinging upon the

A Real Love Story,

UNWAVERING LOVE OF THE HEROINE, which no inducement, no temptation, no persecution, can compel her to relax. Loving with all the strength and purity of a noble heart, she persists in her purpose, until the fruition of her hopes rewards her unceasing devotion. True to the promise made at the death-bed of a loved friend, she daringly outwits every obstacle which tears to prevent its fulfillment, and, encouraged only by the approval of her own true heart, she ever keeps in view the mission she has undertaken, until friend and foe alike learn that she can be—and was, the title of

FAITHFUL MARGARET.

The New York Weekly,

NOW READY,

ALSO CONTAINS AN EXCITING ROMANCE OF

Daring Deeds and Thrilling Adventures,

ENTITLED

OR,

THE VICTIM OF FATE.

By FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

This story is full of Stirring Incidents which keep the reader's attention riveted upon the strange scenes that are so vividly portrayed. Mystery succeeds Mystery with a rapidity which stimulates curiosity to the highest point, and the reader hurries through page after page with breathless anxiety. The plot of is deep, absorbingly interesting, and remarkably ingenious. It may be likened unto a swiftly-revolving kaleidoscope, wherein each scene is entirely dissimilar to the others, and all are rendered attractive by their originality, interest, and beauty.

RAMON THE OUTLAW

THESE

2 Great Stories, 2

RAMON THE OUTLAW; OR, The Victim of Fate. By FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

FAITHFUL MARGARET; OR, THE Sleuth-Hound of Castle Brand. By ANNIE ASHMORE.

ARE NOW READY IN THE

New York Weekly.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE!

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY at present contains Six Great Stories!

A NEW STORY is begun Every Month, and each Number has TEN OR TWELVE SKETCHES, besides the REGULAR DEPARTMENTS, Gossip with Readers and Contributors, Items of Interest, Knowledge-Box, and Pleasant Paragraphs.

Each Issue of the NEW YORK WEEKLY contains several beautiful illustrations, double the amount of Reading-Matter of any paper of its class, and the Sketches, Short Stories, Poems, &c., are by the ablest writers of America and Europe. The NEW YORK WEEKLY OFFERS THE FOLLOWING

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS:

One Year, single copy..... $3 00
" four copies ($2 50 each)..... 10 00
" eight copies ($2 50 each)..... 20 00

Those sending $20 00 for a club of eight, all sent at one time, will be entitled to a copy free. Getters-up of clubs can afterward add single copies at $2 50 each.

ALL LETTERS MUST BE DIRECTED TO STREET & SMITH, Box 4896, New York.

Office, 55 Fulton Street.

RUPTURES CURED

DR. J. A. SHERMAN,

Artistic Surgeon, respectfully offers his service in the application of his Rupture Curative Appliances, at his office, 697 BROADWAY, corner 4th street.

The great experience of Dr. SHERMAN, resulting from his long and constant devotion to the treatment and cure of this disease, assures him of his ability to relieve all, without regard to the age of the patient or duration of the rupture, and in the shortest time. The Elastic Truss, the invention originated by the late Dr. Sherman, Principal of the Ruptures Curative Institute, New Orleans, for a period of more than fifteen years, had under his care the worst cases in the country, all of which were effectively relieved, and restored to their great joy, restored to sound body.

None of the pains and injuries resulting from the use of other Trusses are found in Dr. Sherman's Appliances; and, with little support to the abdominal muscles, he promises greater security and comfort, with a daily improvement in the system, than can be obtained of any other person, or in the inventions of any other person in the United States.

Prices to suit all classes. It is the only, as well as the most successful, truss ever offered the afflicted. Photographic likenesses of cases before and after treatment furnished on receipt of ten cents.

BOSTON POST,

For 1870.

Daily, Semi-Weekly, and Weekly.

All the News—Congressional Report, Legislative Reports, City News, State News, Foreign and General News, "All Sorts of Paragraphs," Correspondence, &c., &c.

TERMS: Cash in Advance.—Single Subscriptions, per annum: Daily, $10; Semi-Weekly, $4; Weekly, $2. Subscriptions can begin at any time. Specimen copies sent when required.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The extent and character of the circulation of the various editions of the BOSTON POST render them invaluable as advertising mediums.

BEALE, GERRY & CO., Publishers,
Boston Post Building,
Corner of Devonshire and Water Sts., Boston, Mass.

AMERICAN FLORIST GUIDE

TO THE Flower Kitchen & Garden

26th edition of this popular work, which has met with so much favor in the past, is now ready. It has been thoroughly revised and improved, printed with new type, and on fine paper, illustrated with a beautiful colored plate, and many other fine engravings from nature. It contains full descriptions and the colors of over 1000 handsome varieties of the finest Vegetables; also descriptions of the choicest Flowers, with directions for their culture, and a collection of 200 choice French Hybrid Gladiolus. Every thing in this condition, will compare favorably with any similar one.

Price, in Paper Cover, Harper, $1.0.

"I have received a copy of your superbly gotten up American Gardener's Guide. I think it the best and cheapest work of the kind ever before issued from the American press."—Send me a copy, bound in cloth, with gilt leaf on paper cover, for which I enclose $1.50.—Extract from letter.

WASHBURN & CO., Boston, Mass.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTHROP & LYMAN'S VEGETABLE CATARRH AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It counteracts the atmospheric influences and harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, decongestive, and healing. Its mode of action is to destroy and remove fully from the first application, and prevent a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and frequently the sense of pain into the throat," cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and impairment of the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome malady in all its forms forever. Such is the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRY'S CORNER, 71 Ann St., N. Y.

DOLLAR Sun.

CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.

The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Every number is a full sheet of four pages. Price 1 cent. Wednesday and Saturday, $1 a year; 4 cents a week; or 50 cents at half-price. Full reports of markets, agriculture, Farmers' and Fruit Growers' Clubs, and a capital story in every issue. Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A general of valuable literary and miscellaneous matter, including Agricultural department, conducted by Col. Wm. Saunders, Horticulturist, Mowing Machines, Parlor Organs, Sewing Machines, &c., &c., among the premiums. Specimen and list free. Send a dollar and try it.

THE SUN, Publisher Sun, New York.

$40 A DAY—DOUBLE-MOUNTED MAPS FOR $1. LLOYD'S Reference-plate Map of the U.S., for 1870, showing from ocean to ocean; colored, mounted, varnished. 54 × 90 inches. Size of each State. Each State County Map on reverse side, on a larger scale. Agents wanted. Sells at sight. Send for 30 cents for specimen. Send for 20 cents for Lloyd's Globe. Sold by agents. Lloyd made all the maps used by Gens. Grant, McClellan, Sherman, Thomas, and Hooker, during the war. Certificates sent.

R. LLOYD, Box 4540, New York.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos of first-class, new and used styles, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash, or for Installments. Any one of them will take from $5 to $10 monthly until paid: the same to be, and rest mulcted against the purchaser. New 7-Octave Pianos for $178 and upward; New Organs for $46 and upward; for Cash.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., for 3 stamps.

ADAMS PRESS CO., 63 Murray Street, New York.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 25 cents each, 3 packages, assorted, for 50 cents. Send to W. C. WARDE, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

153 Fort Front—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,

(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,

IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,

SALESROOM OF THE

United States Watch Company,

13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

Of all the AMERICAN

Manufacturers of Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,

BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three jewels—Patent Pivots, Cap Jewelled, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for one late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS of action hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-8 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, excluding retailers only. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

and GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Watch No. 1004—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried for one to ten months; its total variation from mean time being only one second. GEO. DAVIS, Fort Barry.

Watch No. 1118—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by the United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months; its total variation from mean time being only six seconds. A. L. DENNIS, President N. J. R. R. & T. Co.

Watch No. 1291—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me four months; its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.

Watch No. 2117—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months; its total variation from mean time being only an average of two-thirds of a second per day.

E. P. PHELPS, Con. N. J. Central R. R.

Watch No. 1037—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me nine years, 1867 to 1870, inclusive; its total variation being only five seconds per month. HENRY SMITH, Texas, Fannin County, Box 38 Wolf St.

Watch No. 13013—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months; its total variation from mean time being only twelve seconds. GEO. DAVIS, Fort Barry.

Passy Az'l Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

Watch No. 1118—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months; its total variation from mean time being only two seconds per month. Have been traveling in nearly different sections of the country, from New York to Galveston, Texas, and back, by stagecoach and railroad.

E. RICE, of Whitney & Rice, 179 Broadway, N. Y.

Passy Az'l Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

Watch No. 1176—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months; its total variation from mean time being only five seconds during that time.

HENRY HOLCKLEY, Freight Office, & Erie R. R.

Watch No. 1105—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me over seven months; its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds in the entire time.

A. B. DARLING, Park Place, N. Y.,
Vice-Pres't Rustic Cone Spring Co.,
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York. ☞ Call or send for Price-List.

AGENTS—OUR NEW PICTORIAL FAMILY BIBLE

THE MOST POPULAR AND PROFITABLE OF ALL BOOKS.

Contains more than 1000 large and authentic Illustrations, 50,000 References, Directories for the Government of the Family and Servants, numerous valuable Tables, &c., &c. Agents Wanted Everywhere and Family Album, &c., &c. The best selling Bible ever published.

Each Agent sells from three to ten copies daily. Exclusive territory. Extra terms. Now is the time. Send large editorial notice and a few months. For Circulars and full particulars address JOHN E. POTTER & CO., 614 and 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia. ☞ Publishers of over 40 Gift Books.

Send for descriptive catalogue.

DIAMOND FLOUR.

The prepared Flour of Bran, for making Bread and for the Diabetic and Dyspeptic. Circulars may be had of JOHN W. BIEDLER, Farmersville, 363 Bowery, corner Fourth Street, New York.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER in 10 hours, without using drugs. Cost, one cent. Sample, 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address E. L. SHERRY, Sherry Vinegar Works, Conn.

$66 a Week for Agents, local or traveling. No capital wanted. Address YORKE & Co., 129 Broadway, N.Y.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $20 Watches is worth, in our office, and we have had considerable experience in recommending them.—Formerly Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD RUNNING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so successfully tested during the last four years, and their reputation for truth and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations.

These Watches, $20, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price and for time to Gold Watches worth $100; Full-Jewelled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $25, equal to any $200 Gold watch.

We also manufacture and have on sale a Solid Gilt Hunting Watch, full jewelled, patent lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, and position, $45, warranted a perfect timekeeper, and in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $150.

We charge only $25 for these magnificent watches. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

Send stamp for descriptive circular and price-list. Agents wanted everywhere. Address

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introduction, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

2.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1.00.

3.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, in Life and Teachings." &c. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Doré, Delaroche, Dietzsch, and Parsons. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

4.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 220 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $3.00.

5.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village, &c." Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends, with Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

6.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By LORD LYTTON. With Latin Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Yonge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

7.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course for Schools and Private Learners, Colleges and Academies. By GEO. P. COMFORT, Professor of Modern Languages in Madison University, Hamburg College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $2.00.

8.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Miscellaneous of Robert Almsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

9.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJ. VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain: and Editor of "Notes and Queries" Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5.00; Sheep, $6.00.

10.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Author of "Paul Massie," "Maid of Athens." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

11.

THE POLAR WORLD; a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Wonders," "The Tropical World," "Subterranean Wonders," and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 75.

12.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

13.

ONLY HERSELF A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "False Colors," "Denis Donne," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

14.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of its History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With Engravings on Wood, Engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in Two Volumes, 1064 pages, large 8vo. Cloth, in Cloth Case, $10.00; Sheep, $9.00; Half Calf or Half Morocco, $12.00.

15.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Only Herself," "Carlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

16.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Wilds of London," "Low-Life Deeps," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," &c. With Twelve Scenes of Life and Sport. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

17.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS, Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. Comprising: 1. Romola. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume. The set complete, in 6 vols., $4 50.

ADAM BEDE.—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.—FELIX HOLT.—THE LIFTED VEIL.—CLERICAL LIFE AND SILAS MARNER.—ROMOLA.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

For Family or Manufacturing use. Reliable. Entire every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 170 Broadway, N. Y.

PERFUMERY,

FLAVORING EXTRACTS, and TOILET SOAPS.

Manufactured by LANGDON & SHEPARD, N. Y. N. Y. Office: 335 Broadway, Room 18.

SUBSCRIBE NOW.

Either Hoyle or Monthly, Weekly, or Sunday Sun, $4 00 each; and Maple Leaves, 50 cents, sent to one address for one year. Address, or by ☞ DICK & FITZGERALD, 102 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

EUREKA!—Bitches and Cordials on the face of permanently cured in one day. No paint! no fee until cured. Address (with postage stamp) and stamp) JAS. SMITH, Jr., Box 61, Charlestown, Mass.

AGENTS wanted every where. Brown's Patent Double Stitch Sewing Machine. Damages all kinds of work with the least fuel. No Express charges. Send for Circular. BROWN SEWING MACHINE CO., Foxboro, Mass.

SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell a popular standard goods. Address H. H. RICHARDS & CO., 43 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 20 full-size pictures, sealed, postpaid, for $1.00. Also, 2 for $1. 30 for $10. Circulars free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N.Y.

TAPE WORM effectually removed. Manual free. Address P. FOSS & CO., Bath, Me. Send for Post-Office Money Order to J. H. CONRAD, 8118 Third Avenue, New York.

"A LIVE JACKASS KICKING A DEAD LION."

And such a Lion! and such a Jackass!

Two Months FREE! FREE!!

The Most Popular Juvenile Magazine in America.

THE

LITTLE CORPORAL,

Entirely Original and First Class.

All new subscribers for THE LITTLE CORPORAL for the new year, whose names and money are sent in before the last of December, will receive the November and December Nos. of 1869 FREE!

THE LITTLE CORPORAL has a Larger Circulation than any other Juvenile Magazine in the world, and is better worth the price than any other magazine published.

Because of its immense circulation, we are enabled to furnish it at the low price of One Dollar a Year. Single number, 15 cents, or free to any one who will use to raise a club. Beautiful premium for clubs.

Subscribe NOW. Back numbers can always be sent. Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL & CO., Publishers, CHICAGO, ILL.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,

Can not be Excelled.

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED;

and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, Conn.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

CLEANS WINDOWS, MARBLE, KNIVES.

POLISHES TIN WARE, IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $50 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides. and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $50. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Gentry Bros.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 Pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOSCOPES, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 94 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
9 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

Waltham Watches.

Buyers of watches at retail should be on their guard against buying watches represented as "American," and which are usually advertised in connection with the words "Genuine" "Imitation Gold," and other words calculated to attract attention. Nine cases out of ten such watches are spurious, as our genuine movements are seldom, if ever, put into any thing but solid gold or silver cases. Large numbers of these worthless watches bear colorable imitations of our trademarks. To avoid imposition, buyers who do not know responsible jewelers should first procure a descriptive catalogue of the different styles of watches made by the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass. The catalogue contains, in addition, much useful information to watch-buyers. Address

ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents,
182 BROADWAY, New York.

JOB LOT Genuine Italian VIOLIN STRINGS, first and second lengths each. Either E, A, or D sent prepaid to any address on receipt of price—samples, 15 cents each; 15 for $1, or 100 for $10—by

R. S. WILSON, 33 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

AGENTS wanted for our new work,

Our Home Physician.

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By Dr. Geo. M. Beard. It tells what to do and how to do it in every emergency. Quackery, Humbuggery, and Patent Medicines exposed. It is the only reliable Family Book published. Get it, and save Life, Health, and Money. E. B. TREAT & CO.,
Publishers, 654 Broadway, N.Y.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the basement, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits. Send for a Pamphlet.

E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N.Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
127 Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

ABBOTT'S

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth: his Life and Teachings," &c. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Doré, Delaroche, Durham, and Parsons. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

There is a vividness in its descriptions that is delightful. The old Bible has been called by so many pleasures, are vitalized into reproductiveness. The Old Testament is not, as told by so many glowing pens, are clad in new garb, but in the same old friends with fresh greetings." "Mr. Abbott has done no such thing. He forces his whole soul into his theme. He has developed in this little book the spirit of New Testament instruction from the histories of the Old. The waters of the former are made to flow from the riven rock of the latter. " " Its typography deserves all praise. It is a beautiful volume: in binding, printing, and illustrations, it is unexceptionable. Its engravings alone are worth the price of the book.—Independent.

Superbly printed and illustrated—will doubtless become a favorite at once.—Congregationalist and Boston Recorder.

What we most like in this book is its practical good sense. The author does not lose himself in clouds of speculation, but illustrates his subject by reference to persons and events in ordinary life familiar to the world. " " A volume which will rank among the most acceptable of this year's gift-books for all seasons.—Press, Philadelphia.

This is a handsome gift-book, of small quanto size, with appropriate paper, clear, large, and beautiful type, on a page of wide margin, and with illustrations from some of the best artists. It is more than that. It is a most excellent volume for family reading as well as gift-book. It is one for the people who are gifted with the power to cultivate true tastes. He takes the characters of the Old Testament, and represents them in a picturesque, interesting, and engages the attention of the general reader, and his child-like narrative, and defiance from false learning, with felicity of diction and general good taste and good judgment, that are remarkable.—Boston Commonwealth.

A beautiful volume in all that goes to make up the outward expression of a book, and the matter of it is worthy of so sumptuous a dress. Mr. Abbott has a peculiar combination of imagination, knowledge, tact, and quaint style to conceive vividly and use judiciously the narratives of Scripture. The volume will be, we think, a favorite ornament to the table, but a pleasant and profitable companion for hours of leisure.—Examiner and Chronicle.

The illustrations are executed with great care.—N. Y. Tribune.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Harper's Popular Edition.

THE COMPLETE POEMS
OF
ALFRED TENNYSON.

WITH

Numerous Illustrations by Distinguished Artists,

AND

THREE CHARACTERISTIC PORTRAITS.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth Extra, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N.Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

Harper's Weekly is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a Literary Journal, Harper's Weekly is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a first-class literary character.

The Editorial matter of Harper's Weekly consists one of its most prominent features: It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 673, for November 20, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by Wilkie Collins, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the Weekly from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of Harper's Bazar is ready to subscribe for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

Harper's Bazar has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented known in the annals of journalism, and in recognition of the merit of its attractive and varied contents, it has also illustrated chronicles of Fashion it is without a rival in the country. Its special attractions, including the Fashion Plates, are the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of Fashion in Europe—the fashion-plates of which are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the Bazar is every week devoted to short and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The serial stories are always of the most spicy and interesting character. No effort and no expense will be spared to render it worthy a welcome for its visits to every household. It has won so rapidly, and which it no well deserved.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical not in the country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

Harper's Magazine has now entered upon its Forty-Seventh volume. Its success hitherto has been that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. Its articles are always timely, embracing a wide variety of topics, due to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for it the best literary talent. Its Editorial Departments are conducted by able writers; to its profusely illustrated articles the best artists of the country contribute; and its fiction—of which recently one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record, "The Recreations of a Country Parson," the success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to ensure even greater success in the future.

Harper's Magazine contains from fifty to one hundred and sixty more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the single space of the Magazine of its Publishers is able to devote to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in urging and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

Harper's Magazine, One Year.....	$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year.....	4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year.....	4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly or yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the Magazine commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume; and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar commence with the first Number for June in each year. It will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300: Half Page, $150; Quarter Page, $75—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Pages, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 682.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL—HEAD OF THE PROCESSION ENTERING THE GRAND NAVE OF ST. PETER'S.—[SEE PAGE 50.]

ENTERING ST. PETER'S.

THE 8th of December, the day fixed for the opening of the Nineteenth Œcumenical Council, dawned inauspiciously over Rome: "under a black and bitter and rainy sky," writes a newspaper correspondent, "a sky such as Dr. Cumming might have ordered of his intimate friend, the Angel of the Apocalypse, for the express purpose of dampening and disheartening the Scarlet Woman," the solemn ceremonies began. The Eternal City presented, nevertheless, on the day appointed, a very gay street view crowded and choked up with the throng of carriages. Vehicles of every conceivable description, from the scarlet chariot of the cardinal, with its golden trappings, to the rickety "hack," filled all the thoroughfares leading to the grand cathedral.

The scene before the entrance to the cathedral was extraordinary, combining magnificence with the depressing influence of the ruin, while the interior was crowded with representatives of "every people, and nation, and kindred, and tongue under the whole heaven." The variety of ecclesiastical and military costume, of every imaginable fashion and color, dazzled the eye. Here a band of monks, clad from head to foot in robes of the sackcloth, the face completely enveloped in a black hood, with places for the eyes, which glared through the openings in sword brightness, threw a sort of spectral gloom around the scene. This was soon relieved by another company of religionists, with costumes of a similar fashion, but of blue material, and enormous white cross over their shoulders. The brown dress and flowing beards of the barefooted friars, whose heavy limbs did sure justice to their appearance, presented a strange contrast to the barbaric pomp and gold which often betrayed the representation of some Italian nobleman. Tattered and dirty beggars mingled in the throng on terms of perfect equality, and not a few dressed, not for any ceremonial occasion, were observed struggling to maintain good positions for seeing the splendid pageant.

Soon after nine o'clock the grand procession, heralded by strains of solemn music, entered the cathedral, as depicted in our illustration of the preceding page, in the following order: 1. Chaplains in Ordinary. 2. Private Chaplains. 3. Consistorial Advocates. 4. Chamberlains not Partecipanti. 5. Private Chamberlains. 6. Choir of the Pontifical Chapel. 7. College of Abbots. 8. Officers of the Saint-Hospice. 9. Incense Bearers. 10. Cross Bearer and Acolytes. 11. Abbés Genuflexi Mitrati. 12. Abbés mitrati. 13. Bishop-Archbishops. 15. Princes. 16. Patriarchs. 17. Cardinal. 18. The Pope in the chair of state, borne on men's shoulders, in robes of the highest ceremonies. 19. The Prelates of the Papal train. 20. The Apostolic Protonotaries. 21. The Generals of Orders, being Regular Clerks, Monks, and Mendicants. 22. Officers of the Council who have no rank in the Prelatical Colleges. 23. Stenographers. While the procession was moving toward the High Altar the Pope solemnly intoned the "Veni Creator Spiritus," which was also chanted by the choir. On reaching the High Altar, where the Sacrament was exposed, the Pope removed the costly mitre from his head and recited the prayer over which had been selected for the service. Thus the grand procession entered St. Peter's, and the Council was opened.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1870.

☞ New subscribers to HARPER'S WEEKLY will be furnished with the pages from the commencement of WILKIE COLLINS'S "MAN and WIFE," in the Number for NOVEMBER 20, 1869, at the yearly subscription price of $4 00.

THE CLOVEN FOOT.

THERE is a familiar story in the State of a conversation between Mr. Sherman and one he was Governor and a rural voter. Mr. SHERMAN mentioned incidentally that he was the chief magistrate of Ohio. "You!" exclaimed the voter, in amazement. "Oh no! every body knows that THURLOW WEED is Governor of New York." Certainly the present chief magistrate of this State is very unlike any of his noted predecessors, JOHN JAY, the CLINTONS, TOMPKINS, or SEWARD. But whatever he may be, every body knows that PETER B. SWEENY is Governor of New York. Mr. SWEENY is the DICTATOR of the Capitol Hill, and the first days of the session of the new Legislature showed that TAMMANY controls both the Executive and the Legislative branches of the government. Mayor HOFFMAN'S Message is merely a solemn presentation of Mr. SWEENY'S opinions and intentions. Mr. HITCHMAN, the Speaker, is Mr. SWEENY'S man for the chair; and on the first day of the session Mr. TWEED, the lieutenant of Mr. SWEENY, proposed to vindicate the excitement of New York to the Fifteenth Amendment. Even Mr. HENRY C. MURPHY hastened to obey Mr. SWEENY, and led the first debate of the act, to which the House immediately concurred.

A more characteristic act was impossible. For a generation the Democratic party has devoted all its power to the inhuman oppression of the negro. It held the national government, and that became a vast conspiracy against the most unfortunate and helpless class of persons in the country. No relentless was the Democratic purpose, so thorough its organization, that there was not a little postmaster any where in the land who dared to call his soul his own by declaring the equal right of all men to liberty. Believing the public conscience to be totally disarmed, and the public spirit subdued, the Democratic leaders laid their hands upon the free Territories of the West, with the monstrous doctrine that the Constitution carried slavery every where. But the honor and manhood of the American people revolted against that last degradation; and then the chief Democratic leaders, many of whom were in the national administration itself, took up arms to destroy the government, and to found a new empire upon the abject slavery of the laboring population.

The result was the unconditional victory of the loyal country, under the leadership of the Republican party, the total abolition of slavery, and the development of a new spirit among the population to equal civil and political rights. In the contest the Democratic party, whose great cardinal idea had been the perpetuation of slavery, and whose chiefs had been great slave-masters, lost power in almost every State. In New York it had occasionally a majority in the senior or in Assembly; but it had not for many years controlled every department of the government. It held only the Governorship party in firm only in the States least eminent for intelligence and most tainted with the barbarism of slavery. Its representatives are Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, Tennessee. Wherever the government is founded upon the colored race, the utmost class of ignorance is everywhere distinguished by the laws, there the Democratic party is in the ascendant, and there injustice and ignorance have their chief seat.

The power of such a party in the State of New York is necessarily insecure. But by the most monstrous and audacious frauds the Democratic party elected a Governor in 1868, and have now also the Legislature and other State officers. Secretary of State HITCHMAN declared, when, in hot haste, it shows its ancient hatred of equal rights by withdrawing its assent to the Amendment, that "it removes the last obstacle from politics; and, at the same time, with the same spirit that brought the party to its knees before Wade Hampton at the New York Convention of 1868, Mr. SWEENY'S man, Mr. HITCHMAN, says that he should like to see Congress attempt to force negroes upon the South by edict." Whether Congress—that is, the Legislature of the people of the United States—"dare" to disregard the "last obstacle" to the unconstitutional action of a State, or of a "confederacy" of States, Mr. HITCHMAN is quite old enough to learn soon.

The Democratic party went out of power in this State trying to make the negro a slave. It returns to power trying to make the negro a citizen in equal citizen. Arrayed against justice, humanity, reason, and the American principle, the party of slavery is naturally insane. It has equal rights, and its fate is written: "At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down; at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead."

IS HE ALSO JUDAS ISCARIOT?

THERE are undoubtedly reasons why it is desirable that a Justice of the Supreme Court of a particular district should have certain associations with that district. Justice, indeed, is blind, but in the management of human affairs fact is indispensable. When, therefore, the President nominated Mr. HOAR to the Senate, it was to be presumably assumed that he had some reason for the appointment who was a resident of the district. This may be a matter of regret, but it certainly is no surprise. Least of all should it surprise the Democratic journals, for they have always assured us that all the most eminent in the Southern States were the most resolute and sincere of rebels. Nor should it be surprising to our own Republican friends, for many of the Republicans in the Southern States who are understood to oppose the nomination of Mr. HOAR are living representatives of the difficulty experienced by the Republicans in finding old residents of the late rebel States who could be wisely called to high and responsible offices. Of course, the most insolent himself would not be indisposed to find a proper candidate for the Supreme bench who lived in the district, as he will have no consideration if other reasons did not exist. The correspondent of the New York Times wrote that Mr. HOAR had nobody but himself to thank for his rejection; and the Evening Post published an abstract of the arguments urged against the confirmation, in which it was easy to see that the moving cause was Senatorial dissatisfaction with Mr. HOAR'S political independence. And believing this to be the reason, we hope sincerely that the President, who has never made in all essential points a better nomination than this, will not withdraw it, but will leave it for the final action of the Senate. If perfect honesty and the most manly independence in official conduct are to be visited by party censure from the Republican majority in the Senate, it is desirable that it should be fully understood.

We have seen in letters from Washington suggestions of an intention "to kick" Mr. HOAR out of the party. But these, we presume, must have come from the Democratic press which confirmed Mr. ASHLEY, and which will probably vote to confirm General SICKLES. And we observe that the reporters which describe Senators GRIMES, FESSENDEN, and TRUMBULL to be Judas Iscariots, who had received their money and had gone out and hung themselves, are very merry over the probable rejection of Mr. HOAR. Mr. HOAR is indeed the cousin of Mr. EBENEZER R. HOAR, and is certainly not a favorite with the Republicans of New York. But the supposition that consistency in Senators and executive which changes once Mr. HOAR is inexpressibly comical to any one who knows the Attorney-General.

It is, indeed, an interesting inquiry whether the Republican party can afford to treat men like Mr. HOAR as DEVEMEAL treated his runaway colored servant, Frederick. "Who, indeed, our successes, if not the ablest, honestest citizens, original Republicans of the very highest principle, men whose characters and courage are the richest possessions of any party? No man, indeed, as we have often said, has any right to "kick" any man out of any of his offices—at least according to a very respectable old theory—exis for the public welfare, and not for private advantage. But what men have no claims of this kind, has character none? Will it not be well for the Senate to look over the list of Executive nominations and of the nominations before it, and reflect whether it can justify to the conscience and intelligence of the Republican party the rejection of Mr. HOAR?

PUBLIC OPINION AND CUBA.

SINCE the President said in his Message that there was not sufficient evidence of an intelligent government and of serious hostilities in Cuba to justify recognition, it is remarkable that the accounts from the island communicated to the papers by the Junta are very careful to describe the "established government" and the "various combats." But all this painfully suggests more made to order. Hitherto the one conspicuous fact in the Cuban revolution is, that it expects the United States to do its work. It relies in much more vigorous assault upon public opinion in this country than upon the Spanish soldiery. The Cuban Commissioners and Committee of Junta in New York, and appealed to public sympathy to allow it to violate our laws by sending expeditions against a friendly power, with a vast excitement that many more patriots were constantly arriving here than would have made a very respectable military force in Cuba.

But the attempt upon public opinion in this country has failed. There have been two measures by NEW YORK: the first was one of iniquity, and of an expression of sympathy for any people struggling for independence. The second was the former with little or no significance. Since those meetings there have been the most unpardonable attacks upon the integrity of Secretary FISH, universally insisting that the foreign policy of the United States was determined by the private interest of the Secretary's son-in-law. Such a charge is the clearest evidence that Mr. FISH—just as the character of General GRANT was the reply to the charge that he was interested in the Gold speculation.

But these frantic and desperate assaults have not in the least affected public opinion. The truth is, that the people of this country are not especially interested in the Cuban revolution because the Cubans themselves do not seem to be. The universal feeling for GEORGE WASHINGTON years ago, and for CRETE four years ago, was deep and warm, because events in those countries showed how much the Greeks and Cretans their struggle was. But in the Cuban movement the desire is so evident that this country by resolutions of several forms has practically achieve the independence of the island, the intention of annexation is so notorious and the purpose of the Cubans in their serious engagements evincing an earnest patriotic purpose and of a government truly fulfilling its functions is so questionable, that there is a very general feeling of doubt and indifference.

This is unquestionably the fact, and the Administration in declining to interfere undoubtedly represents the desire of the country. But if the circumstances were different—if the country did not feel that the Cuban revolutionary news is "cooked" for us by the Junta as the American news was "cooked" by REUTER for England—if the Cubans, rising and demanding independence, had bravely and vigorously attacked the Spaniards in battles that, however small, could not be concealed, and which, like Lexington and Bunker Hill and Camden, showed the indomitable heroic will—if the movement had been more than a vague, smouldering, doubtful hostility of which it is actually impossible to know any thing except that some Cubans wish to be annexed to the United States, the popular feeling of this country, we believe, would have been very different.

The more thoughtful advocates of recognition urge that it is our duty because the revolution has established a emancipation. But this is really to urge a policy of proselytism by arms. It is saying that if a Parisian insurrection in Ireland should proclaim the Irish Church United States ought to recognize it even if it were compelled to emancipate to fight with England. If the United States declined, Mr. CHARLES O. FLEAS would probably taunt us with recreancy to republican principles. But should we, indeed, feeling the sting of truth? The question for the United States to decide is, what course under all the circumstances will most aid liberty every where? Will freedom and popular government gain more by the assertion of the principle that every power may interfere in every contest as pleases, or that hitherto each must acquire a certain evident status before they are acknowledged? Shall there be any attempt at an international practice founded upon reason and honorably observed, or shall that hope be abandoned? The American people heartily wish that other people may be as free as they are, and in all honorable ways they will prove their sympathy. But if it be the duty of the United States to recognize at any cost the belligerent rights of any party in any country that proclaims personal liberty or political equality, it is its duty to become the most aggressive, and insufferable power in history.

THE NEW YEAR IN FRANCE.

THE summons of EMILE OLLIVIER to form a Ministry in France shows that LOUIS NAPOLEON has at least one advantage over his predecessors, and that is that he can learn something. If EMILE OLLIVIER succeeds in the attempt to organize an administration, the constitutional system will have begun in France. But the difficulty of the situation is vital, and it is that it depends entirely upon the will of one man, and that man one who has risen to power by the most flagrant falsehood and disregard of oaths. If M. OLLIVIER succeeds he will have the spectacle of a Ministry agreeable to the Emperor, and removable with the change of sentiment of a legislature elected by general suffrage. This is the English constitutional system. But practically for the further resemblance between the two countries the British Constitution is a long tradition of precedents which have become the most impregnable of fundamental laws: while the French Constitution is really a charter granted by the Emperor. It is not impossible that the Emperor intends fair play. It is easy to suppose that he perceives the hopelessness of the continuation of a purely personal government; that he has watched France for eighteen years, and that he has only chance lies in the proposed change. But the humor of a despot is always incalculable. Character tells in politics as much as any where else: and a man whose whole career has alienated confidence can not regain it by a fresh word, however reasonable. To an observer, undoubtedly, the best course for LOUIS NAPOLEON is that which he has chosen; but it will probably prove to be only a palliative. The fatal weakness of his position is that, however adroit and able, he has failed, after a prolonged and most favorable opportunity, to endear himself to the heart or to the pride of the French people. They do not love him. They do not trust him. They do not respect him. And a ruler of whom, at the end of a score of years of trial, such truths can be spoken is not a man who can found a permanent dynasty.

TRADE—ITS RELATIONS TO GOLD.

ACCOUNTS of stock have now been very generally completed, and computations made of the last year's business. Up to the final on the 24th of September made by the Erie gamblers to run up gold, trade was good in all departments, but since that period it has been so bad in all quarters as to have absorbed much of the profit of the preceding three-quarters of the year. The cause was understood at once when the Treasury had abstained from making sales of gold, and was undoubtedly planned through the connivance of certain officials. But, in a way to prevent any Treasury sales, simultaneously with the movement to "bull" gold. But for some unfortunate interference over the Treasury of this character, it is scarcely probable that sales would have been delayed until the evil had been done, since the interests of the whole mercantile corner in gold was known at Washington long, and in not a few cases, which, if successful, necessarily reached the credit of the United States.

A committee of investigation ought to ascertain precisely why it was that the Treasury remained inactive during the period when the clique was maturing its plans, and until they had gone so far as to carry up gold to 160-162½. The omission to meet this movement in time enabled the raiders to ride through Wall Street with the fury of a Steppe-war, and with all the disaster, present and remote, which attended his sudden inflictions. Wall Street was wild with fear as the raiders entered each banking-house and stripped it of its wealth. It will, no doubt, appear that Mr. BOUTWELL is free of all complication with the clique, or with inferiors connected with the Treasury—no one doubts his purity—but the precise character of the influence which induced the withholding of the orders to sell gold ought to be ascertained, so that Congress may apply its remedies with wisdom.

The effect of this sudden stoppage of the whole country was instantaneous and severe. The difficulty has been prolonged and intensified by the unwise action at the end of July, on the 24th of September, after Mr. BOUTWELL had made his countermovement, to which, next to which, it has latterly been fluctuating.

Inasmuch as we all deal in articles of merchandise which have been marked down in proportion to the fall in gold, an active trade is not expected until prices of all com..odities, including gold, shall be reached at a point that they shall conform to the amount of paper-money in circulation. The reasons for marking down merchandise are various. Some have supposed that we were going to specie payments, and this, in the phraseology of Wall Street, they discounted. Purchases fall over the whole Union, producing distrust and dismay.

When gold shall rise to price required by the amount of paper-money in circulation when the process will be reversed, and instead of being marked down, goods will be marked up, and trade will become active. The panic is held back by reason of a diminution in the quantity of paper circulation, it would have been a healthy and permanent fall; but it is the opinion of many to oppose that it will stand long at a price which has been made for it by means of the momentary power of the Treasury, entirely wholly irrespective of our paper circulation and the general laws of trade.

There is nothing in the situation of the country at this time, excepting the artificial and unnatural condition of financial affairs, to prevent an immediate spring from the throes of such depression owing to this circumstance, from which recovery will be slow. Cotton, grain, and provisions are all in good demand in large quantities; but exports of these, on which the activity of business depends, will be light so long as gold is pressed below the proper point. These articles of export have all been produced at high currency prices; and so far as wheat and flour are concerned, the crop sold in our market now at prices which do not remunerate the farming interest.

It appears by the English returns for the week ending December 19, that since the first of September there have been received into the United Kingdom 2,627,027 quarters of wheat against 9,540,446; of flour, 2,136,702 cwt. against 1,169,416; of Indian corn, 7,006,140 cwt. against 3,913,075—for the same period last year.

Private advices show that the stock of wheat on hand in Liverpool on the 1st of January is much larger than is usual; and it appears that much of the excess comes from the United States. California has not figured against. The concurrence of these shipments and the fall of gold here have affected trade in a most serious degree. But the consequences of the whole quantity of wheat required from foreign sources for the consumption of Great Britain between the 1st of July and the next harvest must end to beteen seventy and eighty millions of bushels, it is correct to assume that a large quantity will be required in the early part. In the present condition of foreign and domestic markets it will be unsafe to press this article upon the sea-board in quantities which can not be conveniently carried. The fact that wheat and flour are below the average price in England and here would indicate that the harvest will be best rewarded by not pressing immediate sales.

Although the interests of a large class here are promoted by cheap food—such, for instance, as laboring men and those who live on salaries —yet when wheat and flour fall in price lately have done, below the price which remunerates the farmer, the trade of the country becomes so seriously affected by it that measures we have named lose more from want of employment than they gain by buying food at unremunerative prices. The farming interest is promoted when fair rewards attend all the great industries of the Union. It is a common observation now, that, as the farmer in the West and Northwest is losing by his crops, the trade of extensive sections is dull. It was lately stated in a Chicago paper that very unusual and large additions had been recently made to its population, owing to the discharge of laborers from farms. The necessity for discharging them is due to the condition of the market, and it will unfortunately affect the production for next year, as there will be fewer hands engaged in agriculture. The policy, therefore, which seeks to lower the market-price of food, for the benefit of manufacturers and others, may be carried so far as to weaken the demand for their productions.

The withdrawal by the Secretary of the Treasury of a portion of the eleven millions of gold offered for sale in December, and the offer of only four millions for January, indicate either that the supply of gold is not so large as was expected, or that the Department perceives the impact upon our trade and industry of forcing down its price. It appears that the remaining millions of what was on hand in the various sub-treasuries on the 1st of January was all that belonged to the government over and above what was payable for interest on that day, for overdue coupons, etc., and for certificates of deposit.

It was doubtless owing to this change of policy that a bill interest commenced operations in Wall Street on Monday, 10th inst., for special order of the Treasury, issued on the 1st inst., to sell on Monday the 10th $1,670,000 of gold received for duties, interfered for the moment with their plan. As the paper-money capable of circulation is fixed by law, it would seem that there is a tolerably precise relation between it and the proper marketprice of gold, and that it should be the policy of the Government simply to meet the expressed gold below this mark. What the country wants is steadiness in the standard, instead of the violent and depressing fluctuations lately witnessed.

Had the experience we have had since the determination of the war proves that more or less of severe fluctuation is unavoidable, either from the result of locking up currency, of its sudden and inconvenient release, or the effort North and South to permit the transfer of crops, of gambling on a scale of frightful extent, or of all these causes, the lesson has been severe and repeated suffering the lesson is taught that the true road to safety lies in the direction of specie payments. Such a path is not a difficult and unpleasant experience, it will be found for better in the long-run than to have our whole property exposed, as it now is, "upon the wings of paper-money."

MRS. STOWE AND LADY BYRON.

THE remoreless, and in many cases evidently malignant criticism which Mrs. STOWE has followed the publication of her BYRON article left her no choice but to state more fully both the story told in that article and the nature of the circumstances which induced her to publish it. No one who knows her could doubt for a moment that it was a pleasant task for her to make such disclosures. To suppose that she was a sentimental gobbet of "sensations" was simply silly. She knew, as the intelligent judgment of Lady BYRON, a friend whom she loved and revered, was that she was a prim, rigid, Puritanic moralist, but that the circumstances of want of sympathy, was really responsible for much of Lord BYRON's immoral career. This judgment she believed to be true, and upon it based result of the noblest forbearance and science upon the part of Lady BYRON, and of the most subtle and unscrupulous cruelty upon the part of Lord BYRON, continued for years and at dressed to a world which was fascinated by his genius. The publication of Mrs. STOWE's interpretation against her was not allowed to rest. It was renewed some months since in Blackwood's Magazine and in a recent article in ROBERTS'S mistress. The aspersions made by both upon the character of their grandmother did not seem to touch Lady BYRON's descendants; and when convinced that they proposed to sue for such slanders to lie upon her grave unconvicted, Mrs. STOWE determined to publish that if the ties of blood were satisfied those of friendship were not, resolved that the good fame of one of the noblest women of her time be vindicated, and told the story that Lady BYRON had told her.

There was an immediate explosion of indignation that such a disclosure should have been made, whether it were true or false. But, being made, there was only the consideration that Lord BYRON was none too good for such a story to be true, while of his sister nothing was generally known. And on American ears the publication it was evident that if Mrs. STOWE had faithfully reported what Lady BYRON had told her, that story must be accepted as true. Unless it could be shown that Lady BYRON had told an untruth, or was probably deranged. But it has not been shown, and unless it could be shown that Lady BYRON could be guilty of either of these things she must be arranged upon this subject? No one who has followed the controversy will claim that Lady BYRON's hallucination has been established. The only evidence, and that presumptive, is contained in the correspondence published in the Quarterly Review article. Mrs. STOWE accepts the authenticity of the letters, which were all written within the month after the separation, and she answers that it was subsequently to that time that Lady BYRON was convinced of Mrs. LEIGH's complicity, believing until then the assertion, which Mrs. STOWE supposes Mrs. LEIGH to have made, that BYRON had only insanely attempted the crime. There is no doubt that at the time of the separation Lady BYRON did believe her husband to be insane, and that his nearest relatives were her chief authority. The letters, however, must be taken in connection with all the facts and probabilities, and then they will be found not necessarily incompatible with the truth of the original story.

The case rests upon this point. The opinion of Lady BYRON are published, or Dr. LUSHINGTON reveals what was disclosed to him in 1816. Mrs. STOWE has merely denounced as a hyena, tearing open the grave of a blameless woman, Mrs. LEIGH. But a moment's reflection will show that it is Mrs. STOWE's opinion Mrs. LEIGH was the accomplice—subsequently, indeed, repentant—of the foul traducer of her friend, Lady BYRON. Was her sympathy for Mrs. LEIGH's offense—as she believed it to be —to overwhelm her duty to a slandered woman? If Mrs. LEIGH had that she should not have had some evidence before she told so dreadful a tale, may she not ask, in reply, what evidence could there be so conclusive to her as Lady BYRON's word?

MR. DICKENS'S DEMOCRACY.

IF there were ever a man whose character and published opinions should decide what his political sympathies are, Mr. DICKENS is certainly the one. Yet when, a few weeks ago, he said, in a speech something about the people governing and the people governed, which was susceptible of two interpretations, it was very generally interpreted against him, and he was accused of having in a single sentence his book and upon the whole tenor of his life.

Mr. DICKENS has recently made another speech in which he has defined his characteristically and distinctly, that he has not turned his back upon his books and his life, nor forgotten his sympathies with the people as heretofore as he always did in the people governed rather than in the people who govern. It seems a little hard that a man of such distinguished delight in the decision of a doubtful point. There are men nearer home, whose lives and characters are known, who were recently denounced as if they had plotted the destruction of the moral bulwarks of society. It was much more natural to suppose that there was some misunderstanding. So, if the telegraph should report that JOHN BRIGHT has pronounced for the inhabitants of the moon, we shouldn't be better to believe that the story is not complete, and await further intelligence?

NOTICES.

THE St. Domingo negotiation has ended in treaty of cession. We are to pay $1,500,000, and St. Domingo is to become ours, if the people ratify the action of BAEZ. Meanwhile we have paid that gentleman $150,000 in advance for the cession of the Samana Bay, and St. Thomas? When the Senate considers the new treaty, let it not forget the old. Denmark and the people of St. Thomas have been consulted, and await for our proposition. Do we recede from it? Is the Senate ready to ratify the treaty? Is more decision be in addition to that of the United States than the people of St. Thomas? And is the necessity of increasing our territory and our population at this time so imperative that we must make fresh promises to the Danish and Spanish governments, by which we are honorably bound? Territorial expansion is not necessarily an advantage. If it be desirable it is worth paying for.

THE son of FRANCISCO SOLANO LOPEZ, and grandson of CARLOS A. LOPEZ, who, with DR. FRANCIA, the uncle of CARLOS, have been for nearly fifty years Dictators of Paraguay, is in Washington, endeavoring to induce the Administration to appoint a diplomatic intercourse with that country. The objection to the success of his mission is stated to be the disappearance of the last vestige of his government policy. Should the subject be pressed by the young man, it is very desirable that Congress should be fully informed of the merits of the Paraguay question, and that the country should be fully disabused of the error that LOPEZ is a popular ruler and a President, or that Paraguay is a republic. This will not be necessary if the steady, although slow, progress, the allies has, so is generally understood, resulted in the overthrow of the LOPEZ dynasty, and that an American war which has lasted so long, and has been so bitterly waged, deserves to be more truly understood in the United States than it may yet be.

ONE of the finest specimens of the noble art of line engraving that has been produced in America has just been finished by JOSEPH ANDREWS, of Boston. It is a reproduction of picture of the Landing of the Pilgrims; "Pilgrim Fathers," by WEIR. It is the conscientious work of many years—bold and delicate and masterly; and fully vindicates the claim of Mr. ANDREWS to the highest rank in his art.

IN the second letter of Mr. SEWARD as Secretary of State to Mr. ADAMS, Minister in England dated April 10, 1861, he said: "You will not consent to draw into debate before the British Government any opposing moral principle which may be supposed to lie at the foundation of the controversies between those States and the Federal Union." In Mr. SEWARD's speech a month ago, in Mexico, he said, in allusion to the rebellion: "Slavery had become an element in the state life, and had organized rebellion, aiming at the destruction of the American Union." This was always the truth, and Mr. SEWARD knew it well in April, 1861, as in November, 1869. But by not saying it in 1861, and instructing Mr. ADAMS to urge it upon the British Government, the whole moral force of our position was lost, and we were placed precisely the attitude that Earl RUSSELL described, a Government fighting for empire, to which England could not give unwilling citizens. This, indeed, as nobody knows better than Earl RUSSELL knew, is, under the circumstances, in our case a perfectly legitimate ground of action. But if the Secretary of State had plainly declared to Mr. ADAMS the nature and every other intelligent man understood, the moral aspect of the great English conduct would have been intolerable. The consolation is, that truth-telling is the best diplomacy.

A STRIKING illustration of the doctrinaire habit of Mr. SEWARD's mind is found in the same speech, when he speaks of the alliance of all the independent States of the American Continent during the rebellion, and then adds that the alliance commanded confidence and respect in unexpected quarters, and that, with certain other countries, "Turkey, Egypt, Morocco, Siam, and Japan, friendly relations were established at the American republics." Our moral alliance with Morocco and Siam has hitherto escaped attention.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

January 4.—Both Houses organized by the choice of SPEAKER FENTON. In the SENATE Mr. FORD offered a joint resolution to repeal that of last session relative to the Erie Railway Company. The resolution was referred. A resolution ratifying the resolution was made a special order for January 18. Mr. FORD was given a call to repeal the Erie law. In the Assembly, amongst other resolutions offered, was one providing against the sale of the Croton reservoirs.

January 5.—In the SENATE, after a warm debate, the resolution relating to the Fifteenth Amendment was passed by a vote of yeas 16, nays 15. In the Assembly a resolution was offered to repeal the Erie law. Ayes 69, nays 66. Among the measures introduced were bills on repeal of the Conspiracy act, Wall Street law, to amend the Metropolitan Police law, and compel gas companies to reduce the price of gas to $3 per 1,000.

January 6.—No business of importance was transacted in either House, and the Senate adjourned over to January 11.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The recent statement of the public debt shows that the debt is $25,685,194,291. The cash in the Treasury is $398,987,718 46, of which about $108,000,000 is in coin, and the balance currency. The debt, less cash in the Treasury, is $25,286,206,572 54, and the increase during the month, as compared with the last month, was $2,833,781 93 less than in the month of March last.

The Democrats of Indiana divorce is soon to be testified to a Massachusetts Probate Court, on the petition of Mrs. ELIZABETH A. BIGELOW, who was married to the Hon. WILLIAM H. BIGELOW, of the late Governor of Delaware, whom she was divorced by decree of the Supreme Court of the state of Indiana, in 1866.

On January 1 a reduction was made on the tolls on cotton shipped to and from New York. Reductions of ten words are now sent to that city from any office in the United States. The reduction extends west of the Mississippi for $8 on gold, and west of the Mississippi river as well.

Mail-coach robberies have of late become alarmingly frequent in Pennsylvania. The State officers stop the coaches, and ride the mail-bags and the trunks and packets about at the passengers. These highwaymen are said to be well organized.

The Governor of Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania Legislature, and Philadelphia Mint Board have all had a narrow escape from death by the explosion of a steam-boiler, and recommended the enactment of stringent laws to guard against such fearful accidents and such calamities.

Governor Logan No. 2," whose name was connected with the mysterious Rogers murder, was shot and fatally wounded on January 3 by a man in a mask named Donn. Just before his death he signed a paper declaring his innocence of the murder of Mr. ROGERS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE singular rumor was recently started in Europe that President GRANT was about to pay a visit to the Courts of Switzerland, Germany, Italy, and Lovedale.

General PRIM and the entire Spanish Cabinet resigned JANUARY 4, in consequence, it is said, of the King's refusal to dismiss the Duke of MONTPENSIER of the Duke of GENOA. It was rumored that SERRANO had been charged with accepting bribes, but this point is said to have been abandoned.

The Queen of SPAIN received the New Year's Address of the Cortes on January 1. Her Majesty's reply was delivered. The recent political concessions were declared to be inconsistent with the Sovereign and their prerogatives without establishing the Imperial system.

The recent Parliamentary election in Longford, Ireland, was marked by a serious conflict between the friends of the Fenian candidate and the opposite party. The Fenian, Mr. LUBY, was the brother of the Duke of GENOA. It was rumored that Serrano had been bought up the wreck of the yacht Mercer, on the coast of Tennessee.

The Emperor of FRANCE has granted to an American citizen the privilege of establishing a telegraph on the Azores, to be laid from New York to Brest. The Emperor has also granted a telegraph franchise by two lateral lines to France, near Havre, Cherbourg, and Brest, which will be laid by the company by laid during the present year.

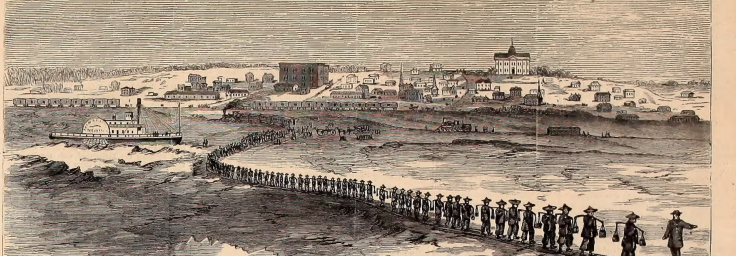
Sanguinary encounters continue their attacks on the Cuban Coast. The London Morning Post contains the following account of the latest affair, which, however must lighten before attempting to pass through the Bahama channel, and make for Nassau for stress weather:

"The Spanish gunboat Lepanto has arrived at Cienfuegos. They are commissioned in large bodies, and the insurrection is fast dying out. The Spanish gunboats, two schooners, laden with arms and ammunition for the insurgents, have recently visited Nassau, in New Providence, by the British gun-boat Lapwing, for alleged violation of neutrality. The Spanish Minister at Washington has notified the State Department of the presence of the steamer Annie, a Cuban privateer, with some of the crew of the Hornet on board, in Charleston Harbor. The United States Marshal was directed to examine the suspected steamer.

The Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs, by way of Lisbon, say that Lopez has been driven out of that country, and has sought refuge in Bolivia.

The Spanish Ministerial Council on Dogmas has begun its sittings. The impression gains ground that the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope will be adopted, with liberty of dissent.

CURLING, OR BONSPIEL.—[SEE PAGE 55.]



CHINESE COOLIES CROSSING THE MISSOURI RIVER.—[SKETCHED BY LEAVITT BURNHAM.]

COOLIES FOR TEXAS.

THE Mongolian invasion has begun at last in good earnest, and the advance-guard of the peaceful army has already crossed the Missouri River. On the 26th of December the first detachment of Chinese laborers engaged to work on a railroad now building in Texas, numbering 250 men, arrived opposite Council Bluffs, Iowa. The river was covered with a pack of broken ice sufficiently strong to prevent the passage of boats. A plank walk was laid across the uneven surface, on which the Celestials passed over to the eastern side of the river, as shown in our illustration, carrying their baggage on poles balanced over the shoulder, in true Oriental fashion. Most of these men were employed in the construction of the Pacific Railroad. They are under the charge of General J. A. WALKER, who expects to return in the spring, should this experiment prove a success, for a still larger detachment.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

FOURTH SCENE—WINDYGATES.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTEENTH.

NEAR IT.

THE Library at Windygates was the largest and the handsomest room in the house. The two grand divisions under which Literature is usually arranged in these days occupied the customary places in it. On the shelves which ran round the walls were the books which humanity in general respects—and does not read. On the tables distributed over the floor were the books which humanity in general reads—and does not respect. In the first class, the works of the wise ancients; and the Histories, Biographies, and Essays of writers of more modern times—otherwise the Solid Literature, which is universally respected, and occasionally read. In the second class, the Novels of our own day—otherwise the Light Literature, which is universally read, and occasionally respected. At Windygates, as elsewhere, we believed History to be high literature, because it assumed to be true to Authorities (of which we knew little)—and Fiction to be low literature, because it attempted to be true to Nature (of which we knew less). At Windygates, as elsewhere, we were always more or less satisfied with ourselves, if we were faithful discovered consulting our History, and more or less ashamed of ourselves if we were publicly discovered devouring our Fiction. An architectural peculiarity in the original arrangement of the library favored the development of this common and curious form of human stupidity. While a row of luxurious arm-chairs, in the main thoroughfare of the room, invited the reader of solid literature to reveal himself in the act of cultivating virtue, a row of snug little curtained recesses, opening at intervals out of one of the walls, enabled the render of light literature to conceal himself in the act of indulging a vice. For the rest, all the minor accessories of this spacious and tranquil place were as plentiful and as well chosen as the heart could desire. And solid literature and light literature, and great writers and small, were all impartially provided alike by a fine broad flow of the light of heaven, pouring into the room through windows that opened to the floor.

It was the fourth day from the day of Lady Lundie's garden-party, and it wanted an hour or more of the time at which the luncheon-bell usually rang.

The guests at Windygates were most of them in the garden, enjoying the morning sunshine, after a prevalent mist and rain for some days past. Two gentlemen (exceptions to the general rule) were alone in the library. They were the two last gentlemen in the world who could possibly be supposed to have any legitimate motive for meeting each other in a place of literary seclusion. One was Arnold Brinkworth, and the other was Geoffrey Delmayn.

They had arrived together at Windygates that morning. Geoffrey had traveled from London with his brother by the train of the previous night. Arnold, delayed in getting away at his own time, from his own property, by ceremonies incidental to his position which were not to be abridged without giving offense to many worthy people—had caught the passing train early that morning at the station nearest to him, and had returned to Lady Lundie's, as he had left Lady Lundie's, in company with his friend.

After a short preliminary interview with Blanche, Arnold had rejoined Geoffrey in the safe retirement of the library, to say what was still left to be said between them on the subject of Anne. Having completed his report of events at Craig Fernie, he was now naturally waiting to hear what Geoffrey had to say on his side. To Arnold's astonishment, Geoffrey coolly turned away to leave the library without uttering a word.

Arnold stopped him without ceremony.

"Not quite so fast, Geoffrey," he said. "I have an interest in Miss Silvester's welfare as well as in yours. Now you are back again in Scotland, what are you going to do?"

If Geoffrey had told the truth, he must have stated his position much as follows:

He had necessarily decided on deserting Anne when he had decided on joining his brother on the journey back. But he had advanced no further than this. How he was to abandon the woman who had trusted him, without seeing his own dastardly conduct dragged into the light of day, was more than he yet knew. A vague idea of at once pacifying and deluding Anne, by a marriage which should be no marriage at all, had crossed his mind on the journey. But he had left himself whether a trap of that sort might not be easily set in a country notorious for the looseness of its marriage laws—if a man only knew how? And he had thought it likely that his well-informed brother, who lived in Scotland, might be tricked into innocently telling him what he wanted to know. He had turned the conversation to the subject of Scotch marriages in general by way of trying the experiment. Julius had not studied the question; Julius knew nothing about it; and there the experiment had come to an end. As the necessary result of the check thus encountered, he was now in Scotland with absolutely nothing to trust to as a means of effecting his release but the chapter of accidents, aided by his own resolution to marry Mrs. Glenarm. Such was his position, and such should have been the substance of his reply when he was confronted by Arnold's question, and plainly asked what he meant to do.

"The right thing," he answered, unblushingly. "And no mistake about it."

"I'm glad to hear you see your way so plainly," returned Arnold. "In your place, I should have been all abroad. I was wondering, only the other day, whether you would end, as I should have ended, in consulting Sir Patrick."

Geoffrey eyed him sharply.

"Consult Sir Patrick?" he repeated. "Why would you have done that?"

"I shouldn't have known how to set about marrying her," replied Arnold. "And—being in Scotland—I should have applied to Sir Patrick (without mentioning names, of course), because he would be sure to know all about it."

"Suppose I don't see my way quite so plainly as you think," said Geoffrey. "Would you advise me—"

"To consult Sir Patrick? Certainly! He has passed his life in the practice of the Scotch law. Didn't you know that?"

"No."

"Then take my advice—and consult him. You needn't mention names. You can say it's the case of a friend."

The idea was a new one and a good one. Geoffrey looked longingly toward the door. Eager to make Sir Patrick his innocent accomplice on the spot, he made a second attempt to leave the library; and made it for the second time in vain. Arnold had more unwelcome inquiries to make, and more advice to give unasked.

"How have you arranged about meeting Miss Silvester?" he went on. "You can't go to the hotel in the character of her husband. I have prevented that. Where else are you to meet her? She is all alone; she must be weary of waiting, poor thing. Can you manage matters so as to see her to-day?"

After staring hard at Arnold while he was speaking, Geoffrey burst out laughing when he had done. A disinterested anxiety for the welfare of another person was one of those refinements of feeling which a muscular education had not fitted him to understand.

"I say, old boy," he burst out, "you seem to take an extraordinary interest in Miss Silvester! You haven't fallen in love with her yourself—have you?"

"Come! come!" said Arnold, seriously. "Neither she nor I deserve to be treated in that way. I have made a sacrifice to your interests, Geoffrey—and so has she."

Geoffrey's face became serious again. His secret was in Arnold's hands; and his estimate of Arnold's character was founded, unconsciously, on his experience of himself. "All right," he said, by way of timely apology and concession. "I was only joking."

"As much joking as you please, when you have married her," replied Arnold. "It seems serious enough, to my mind, till then." He stopped—considered—and laid his hand very earnestly on Geoffrey's arm. "Mind!" he resumed. "You are not to breathe a word to any living soul, of my having been near the inn!"

"I've promised to hold my tongue, once already. What do you want more?"

"I am anxious, Geoffrey. I was at Craig Fernie, remember, when Blanche came there! She has been telling me all that happened, poor darling, in the firm persuasion that I was miles off at the time. I swear I couldn't look her in the face! What would she think of me, if she knew the truth? Pray be careful! pray be careful!"

Geoffrey's patience began to fail him.

"We had all this out," he said, "on the way here from the station. What's the good of going over the ground again?"

"You're quite right," said Arnold, good-humoredly. "The fact is—I'm out of sorts, this morning. My mind misgives me—I don't know why."

"Mind?" repeated Geoffrey, in high contempt. "It's flesh—that's what the matter with you. You're nigh on a stone over your right weight. Mind be hanged! A man in healthy training don't know that he has got a mind. Take a turn with the dumb-bells, and a run up hill with a great-coat on. Sweat it off, Arnold! Sweat it off!"

With that excellent advice, he turned to leave the room for the third time. Fate appeared to have determined to keep him imprisoned in the library, that morning. On this occasion, it was a servant who put in the way—a servant, with a letter and a message. "The man waits for an answer."

Geoffrey looked at the letter. It was in his brother's handwriting. He had left Julius at the junction about three hours since. What could Julius possibly have to say to him now?

He opened the letter. Julius had to announce that Fortune was favoring them already. He had heard news of Mrs. Glenarm, as soon as he reached home. She had called on his wife, during his absence in London—she had been invited to the house—and she had promised to accept the invitation early in the week. "Early in the week," Julius wrote, "may mean to-morrow. Make your apologies to Lady Lundie; and take care not to offend her. Say that family reasons, which you hope soon to have the pleasure of confiding to her, oblige you to appeal once more to her indulgence—and come to-morrow, and help us to receive Mrs. Glenarm."

Even Geoffrey was startled, when he found himself met by a sudden necessity for acting on his own decision. Anne knew where his brother lived. Suppose Anne (not knowing where else to find him) appeared at his brother's house, and claimed him in the presence of Mrs. Glenarm? If you chose to have the messenger kept waiting, and said he would send back a written reply.

"ARNOLD TOOK A STOOL AT BLANCHE'S FEET, AND OPENED THE 'FIRST BOOK' OF PARADISE LOST."

"From Craig Fernie?" asked Arnold, pointing to the letter in his friend's hand.

Geoffrey looked up with a frown. He had just opened his lips to answer that ill-timed reference to Anne, in no very friendly terms when a voice, calling to Arnold from the farm outside, announced the appearance of a third person in the library, and warned the two gentlemen that their private interview was at an end.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTEENTH.

NEARER STILL.

BLANCHE stepped lightly into the room, through one of the open French windows.

"What are you doing here?" she said to Arnold.

"Nothing. I was just going to look for you in the garden."

"The garden is insufferable, this morning." Saying those words, she fanned herself with her handkerchief, and noticed Geoffrey's presence in the room with a look of very thinly-concealed annoyance at the discovery. "Wait till I am married!" she thought. "Mr. Geoffrey's wife shall be cleverer than I take him to be, if he goes much of his friend's company then."

"A ride on horseback—if" said Geoffrey, seeing her eyes fixed on him, and supposing that he was expected to say something.

Having performed that duty, he walked away without waiting for a reply; and seated himself, with his letter, at one of the writing-tables in the library.

"Sir Patrick is quite right about the young men of the present day," said Blanche, turning to Arnold. "Here is this one asks me a question, and shows not the slightest curiosity. A three more of them, out in the garden, who have been talking of nothing, for the last hour, but the pedigrees of horses and the muscles of men. When we are married, Arnold, don't present any of your male friends to me, unless they have turned fifty. What shall we do till luncheon-time? It's cool and quiet in here among the books. I want a little excitement—and you can get absolutely nothing to do. Suppose you read me some poetry?"

"While he is here?" asked Arnold, pointing to the personified antithesis of poetry—otherwise to Geoffrey, occupied with his back to them at the farther end of the library.

"Pooh!" said Blanche. "There's only an animal in the room. We needn't mind him!"

"I say!" exclaimed Arnold. "You're as bitter, Blanche, as Sir Patrick himself. What will you say to Mr when we are married, if you talk in that way of your friend?"

Blanche stole her hand into Arnold's hand, and gave it a little significant squeeze. "I shall always be nice to you," she whispered, with a look that contained a host of pretty promises in itself. Arnold returned the look (Geoffrey of inquestionably be the way). Their eyes met tenderly (why couldn't the great awkward brute write his letter somewhere else?), and Blanche, little sigh, Blanche dropped resignedly into one of the comfortable arm-chairs—and asked once more for "something" in a very languishing tone, softly, and with a color that was brighter than usual.

"Whose poetry am I to read?" inquired Arnold.

"Any body's," said Blanche. "This is another of my impulses. I am dying for some poetry. I don't know whose poetry. And I don't know why."

Arnold went straight to the nearest book-shelf, and took down the first volume that his hand lighted on—a solid quarto, bound in sober brown.

"Well?" asked Blanche. "What have you found?"

Arnold opened the volume, and conscientiously read the title exactly as it stood:

"Paradise Lost. A Poem. By John Milton."

"I have never read Milton," said Blanche. "Have you?"

"No."

Another instance of sympathy between us. No educated person ought to be ignorant of Milton. Let us be educated persons. Please begin."

"At the beginning?"

"Of course! Stop! You mustn't sit all that way off—you must sit where I can look at you. My attention wanders if I don't look at people while they read."

Arnold took a stool at Blanche's feet, and opened the "First Book" of Paradise Lost. His system as a reader of blank verse was simplicity itself. In poetry we are none of us (as many living poets can testify) all for sound; and none of us (as few living poets can testify) all for sense. Arnold was for sound. He could every line in lamentably with a full stop; and he got on to his full stop so fast as the inevitable impediment of the words would let him. He began:

"Of Man's first disobedience and the fruit.
Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world and all our woe,
With loss of Eden till one greater Man
Restore us and regain the blissful seat.
Sing heavenly Muse—"

"Beautiful!" said Blanche. "What a shame it seems to have had Milton all this time in the library and never to have read him yet! We will have Mornings with Milton, Arnold. He seems long; but we are both young, and we may live to get to the end of him. Do you know, dear, now I look at you again, you don't seem to have come back to Windygates in good spirits. Its."

"Don't I? I can't account for it."

"I can. It's sympathy with Mr. I am out of spirits too."

"You?"

"Yes. After what I saw at Craig Fernie, I grow more and more uneasy about Anne. You will understand that, I am sure, after what I told you this morning?"

Arnold looked back, in a violent hurry, from Blanche to Milton. That renewed reference to events at Craig Fernie was a renewed reproach to him for his conduct at the inn. He attempted to silence her by pointing to Geoffrey.

"Don't speak," he whispered, "that there is somebody in the room besides ourselves."

Blanche shrugged her shoulders contemptuously.

"What does he matter?" she asked. "What does he know of the secrets of others?"

There was only one other chance of diverting Blanche from the dangerous subject. Arnold began reading headlong, two lines in advance of the place at which he had left off, with more sound and less sense than ever:

"In the beginning how the heavens and earth.
Rose out of Chaos or if Sion hill—"

At "Sion hill," Blanche interrupted him again.

"Do wait a little, Arnold. I can't have Milton crammed down my throat in this manner. Besides I have something to say. Did I tell you that I consulted my uncle about Anne? I don't think I did. I went alone to his study-room. I told him all I have told you. I showed him Anne's letter. And what do you think? He took a little time (and a great deal of snuff) before he would say what he thought. When he did speak, he said that Anne might possibly be right in suspecting Anne's husband to be a very unworthy person. His knowledge himself out of my way was (just as I thought) a suspicious circumstance, to begin with. And then there was the sudden extinction of the candles, when I first went in. I thought (and Mrs. Inchbare thought) it was done by the wind. Sir Patrick suspects it was done by the horrid man himself, to prevent me from seeing him when I entered the room. I don't like that suspicion Sir Patrick is right. What do you think?"

"I think we had better go on," said Arnold, with his head over the book. "We seem to be forgetting Milton."

"How can we remember about Milton! That last bit wasn't as interesting as the other. Is there any love in Paradise Lost?"

"Perhaps you may find some if we go on."

"Very well, then. Go on. And be quick about it."

Arnold was so quick about it that he lost his place. Instead of going on he went back. He said once more:

"In the beginning how the heavens and earth.
Rose out of Chaos or if Sion hill—"

"Yes read that before," said Blanche.

"I think not."

"I'm sure you did. When you said 'Sion hill' I recollect I thought of the Methodists directly. I couldn't have thought of the Methodists if you hadn't said 'Sion hill.' Read it again."

"I'll try the next page," said Arnold. "I have to have read that before—for I haven't turned over yet."

Blanche threw herself back in her chair, and with a long face listened resignedly to her lover. "The flies," she explained. "I'm not going to sleep. Try the next page. Oh, dear me, try the next page!"

Arnold proceeded:

"Say first for heaven hides nothing from thy view
Nor thou the tract of hell say first what cause.
Moved our grand parents in that happy state—"

Blanche suddenly threw the handkerchief off again, and sat bolt upright in her chair. "Shall I sing," she cried. "I shall bear any more. Leave off, Arnold—leave off!"

"What is the matter now?"

"That happy state,' said Blanche. "What does 'that happy state' mean? Marriage, of course! And it reminds me of Anne. I won't have any more. Paradise Lost is painful. Shut it up. Well, my next question is—what's the use, of course, of what has he thought Anne's husband had done. The wretch had behaved infamously to her in some way. In what way? Was is any thing to do with her marriage? My uncle considered again. He thought it quite possible. Private marriages were sometimes dirty things (he said)—especially in Scotland. He asked me if I had been to Scotland. In Scotland, I couldn't tell him—I only said, 'Suppose they were?' What then?' 'It's barely possible,' in that case, Sir Patrick replied, 'that Stephen Storr may be feeling uneasy about her marriage. He may even have reason—or may think he has reason—to doubt whether it is a marriage at all.'"

Arnold started, and looked round at Geoffrey still sitting at the writing-table with his back to them. Utterly as Blanche had set aside Sir Patrick were mistaken in their estimate of Anne's position at Craig Fernie, they had drifted, nevertheless, into a serious discussion. A discussion in which Geoffrey and Miss Silvester were interested—the moment they overheard Stephen Storr's name. It was impossible in Blanche's presence to tell Geoffrey that he might do well to listen to Sir Patrick's doubts about the marriage. Nor, perhaps the words had found their way to him? perhaps he was listening already, of his own accord?

"He was listening. Blanche's last words had found their way to him, while he was pondering over his half-finished letter to his brother. He waited to hear more—without moving, and with the pen suspended in his hand.)

Blanche proceeded, absently winding her fingers in and out of Arnold's hair as he sat at her feet:

"It flashed on me instantly that Sir Patrick had discovered the truth. Of course I told him so. He laughed, and said I mustn't jump at conclusions. We were guessing quite in the dark; and all the interesting things I had noticed at the inn might admit of some totally different explanation. He would have gone on splitting straws in that provoking way the whole morning if I hadn't stopped him. I was strictly logical, I said. I had seen Anne, and he hadn't—and that made all the difference. I said, 'Every thing that puzzled and frightened me in the poor darling is accounted for now. The inn must, and shall, reach that man, uncle—and I'll pay for it!' That was much in earnest (for I believe I cried a little. What do you think the dear old man did? He took me on his knee and gave me a kiss; and he said, in the nicest way, that he would adopt my view, for the present, if I would promise not to say any more to Anne—until the events of it is to come!—that he would put the view in quite a new light to me as soon as I would tell him, again. You may imagine how soon I dried my eyes, and what a picture of composure I presented in the course of half a minute. 'I will take it for granted,' says Sir Patrick, 'that this man unknown has really tried to deceive Miss Silvester, as you and I suppose. I can tell you one thing: it's as likely as not that, in trying to overreach her, he may (without in the least meaning it) have ended in overreaching himself.'"

Geoffrey stirred his breath. The pen dropped unheeded from his fingers. It was coming! The light that his brother couldn't throw on the subject was about to be cast on it!

Blanche resumed:

"I was interested, and it made such a tremendous impression on me, that I haven't forgotten a word. 'I mustn't make that poor little friend of yours my rival,' said Sir Patrick, 'but I must put it plainly. There are marriages, Miss Silvester,' he said, 'which, under so called Irregular Marriages—and very abominable things they are. But they have this accidental merit in the present case. It is extremely difficult for a man to pretend to marry in Scotland, and not really to do so. And it is, on the other hand, extremely easy for a man to drift into marrying in Scotland without feeling in the slightest degree that he is doing so himself.' That was exactly what he said, Arnold. When we are married, it shall be in Scotland!"

Geoffrey's pen was pulled. It this was what he might be caught himself in the trap which he had schemed to set for Anne! Blanche was on with her narrative. He waited and listened.)

"My uncle asked me if I understood him so far. He was quite right in the sun as (according of course I understood him! 'Very well, then we have for the present,' says Sir Patrick. 'Once more supposing our guess to be the right one, Miss Silvester may be making herself very unhappy without any cause whatever. If this juvenile man at Craig Fernie has actually meddled, and won't say with marrying her, she will be committing the crime of bigamy if she has attempted it in Scotland, the chances are nine to one (though I don't believe it, and though she may not believe it) that he has really married her, after all.' My uncle's own words again! Quite mechanically I said, 'But, my dear uncle, if they were out of his lips, I had sent them to Craig Fernie by the next train.'" Geoffrey stolidly-staring eyes and only bright end. A light of the devil's own striking life animated him. An idea of the devil's own bring entered his mind. He looked stealthily round at the open house life he had deserted for the man who had devotedly served him in return. A hideous cunning leered at his mouth and peeped out of his eyes. Arnold Brinkworth pretended to be married to her at the inn. By the lord Harry! that's a way out of it that never struck me before! With that thought in his heart he turned back again to his half-finished letter to Stephen Storr. His life he was strongly, fiercely agitated. For once in his life he was daunted—and that by his own Thought! He had resolved to injure his rival on the strength of the necessity of gaining time to delude Anne into leaving Craig Fernie before he ventured on giving his addresses to Mrs. Glenarm. His letter contained a string of clumsy excuses, intended to delay his return to his brother's house. What he said to himself, as he read it again. "What a fool I was to say do—do—do!" He looked round once more at Arnold, and slowly tore the letter into fragments to be looked.)

In the room Arnold and Blanche had not done yet.

"No," she said, when Arnold proposed an adjournment to the garden; "I have something else to say. You are interested in it, the time." Arnold resigned himself to listen, and, worse still, to read. "Now you can help me in it, in the character of an innocent stranger who had never been near the Craig Fernie inn.

"Well," Arnold resumed, "and what do you think has come of my letter to Anne?"

"I'm sure I don't know. Nothing, I suppose."

"Nothing has come of it!"

"Indeed?"

"Absolutely nothing! I know she received the letter yesterday morning. I ought to have had the answer to-day at breakfast."

"Perhaps she thought it didn't require an answer."

"She couldn't have thought that, for reasons that I know of. Besides, in my letter yesterday, I implored her to tell me (in her own time) only whether, in guessing as what her trouble was, Sir Patrick and I had not guessed right. And here is the day getting on, and no answer! What am I to conclude?"

"I really can't say it"

"Is it possible, Arnold, that we have not guessed right, after all? Is the wickedness of that man who blew the candles out wickedness beyond our discovering? The doubt is so dreadful that I have made up my mind not to bear it after to-day. I count on your sympathy and assistance when to-morrow comes."

Arnold's heart sank. Some new complication was evidently gathering round him. He waited in silence to hear the worst. Blanche bent forward, and whispered to him.

"This is a secret," she said. "If that creature at the writing-table has ears for any thing but rowing and racing, he mustn't hear this! Anne may come to me privately to-day while you are all at luncheon. If she doesn't come, and if I don't hear from her, then the mystery of her silence must be cleared up; and You must do it!"

"I?"

"Don't make difficulties! If you can't find your way to Craig Fernie, I can help you. As for Anne, you know what a charming person she is, and how easily she can be managed—perfectly, for my sake. I must and will have some news of her. I can't break the laws of the household arrangements by sending a messenger, but he won't stir. Lady Lundie is a bitter enemy. To us servants are treasures—but they are in their places if any one of them goes near Anne. There is nobody but you. And to Anne you go to-morrow, if I don't see her or hear from her to-day!"

What to the man who had passed as Anne's husband at the inn, and who had been forced into the most intimate knowledge of Anne's marriable secrets! Arnold was on the point of turning away, with the composure of sheer despair. Any other secret he might, in the last resort, have confided to the discretion of a third person. But a woman's secret—with a woman's reputation depending on his keeping it—how was he to be confided to any body, under any stress of circumstances whatever. If Geoffrey doesn't get out of this," he thought, "I shall have to confide to Blanche to-morrow."

As he reached the door of the shelf, Lady Lundie entered the library from the garden.

"What are you doing here?" she said to her step-daughter.

"Improving my mind," replied Blanche. "Mr. Brinkworth and I have been reading Milton."

"Can you condescend so far, after reading Milton all the morning, as to help me with the invitations for the dinner next week?"

"If you can condescend, Lady Lundie, after feeding the poultry all the morning, I must be humility itself after only reading Milton!"

With that retort (which introduced all the amenities of feminine intercourse, step-mother and step-daughter withdrew to a writing-table, to look over the list of guests for the dinner-party.

Arnold joined his friend at the other end of the library.

Geoffrey was sitting with his elbows on the desk, and his clenched fists dug into his cheeks, staring at the torn prescription and the pencil-note, and the fragments of a torn letter lay scattered all round him. Arnold saw the symptoms of nervous sensibility for the first time in his life—he started when Arnold spoke to him.

"What's the matter, Geoffrey?"

"A letter to answer. And I don't know how."

"From Miss Silvester?" asked Arnold, dropping his voice so as to prevent the ladies at the other end of the room from hearing him.

"No," answered Geoffrey, in a voice still.

"Have you heard what Blanche has been saying to me about Miss Silvester?"

"No."

"Did you hear Blanche say that she meant to send me to Craig Fernie to-morrow, if she failed to get news from Miss Silvester to-day?"

"No."

"Then you know it now. That is what Blanche has just said to me."

"Well?"

"Well—there's a limit to what a man can expect even from his best friend. I hope you won't be angry with Blanche's message, however. I can't, and won't, go back to the inn as things are now."

"You have had enough of it—eh?"

"I have had enough of distressing Miss Silvester, and more than enough of deceiving Blanche."

"What do you mean by 'distressing Miss Silvester?'"

"She doesn't take the same easy view that you and I do, Geoffrey, of passing her off on the people of the inn as my wife."

Geoffrey absently took up a paper-knife. Still with his head down, he began drawing off the topmost layer of paper from the blotting-pad under his hand. Still with his head down, he abruptly broke the silence in a whisper.

"I say!"

"Yes?"

"How did you manage to pass her off as your wife?"

"I told you how, as we were driving from the station here."

"I was thinking of something else. Tell me again."

Arnold told him once more what had happened at the inn. Geoffrey listened, without making any remark. He balanced the paper-knife sideways on one of his fingers. He rearrangely sluggish and strangely silent.

"All that is done and ended," said Arnold, shaking his head and shoulders. "It rests with you now to get me out of the difficulty I'm placed in by that business. Things must be settled with Miss Silvester to-day."

"Things shall be settled."

"Shall be? What are you waiting for?"

"I'm waiting to do what you told me."

"What I told you?"

"Didn't you tell me to consult Sir Patrick before I married her?"

"To be sure! so I did."

"Well—I am waiting for a chance with Sir Patrick."

"And then?"

"And then—" He looked at Arnold for the first time. "Then," he said, "you may consider it settled."

"The marriage?"

He suddenly looked down again at the blotting-pad. "Yes—the marriage."

Arnold offered his hand in congratulation. Geoffrey never noticed it. His eyes were off the blotting-pad again. He was looking out of the window near him.

"Don't hear voices outside?" he asked.

"I believe our friends are in the garden," said Arnold. "Sir Patrick may be among them. Will go and see."

The instant his back was turned Geoffrey snatched up a sheet of note-paper. "Before I forget it!" he said to himself. He wrote the word "Memorandum" at the top of the page, and added these lines beneath it:

"Is asked for her by the name of his wife at the door. He said, at dinner, before my husband and the waiter, 'I take these rooms for my wife.' He made her say he was her husband at the same time. After that he stopped all night. What do the lawyers call this in Scotland?—Query: a marriage?"

After folding up the paper he hesitated for a moment. "No!" he thought. "It won't do not to trust to what Miss Lundie said about it. I can't be certain till I have consulted Sir Patrick himself."

He put the paper away in his pocket, and wiped the heavy perspiration from his forehead. He was pale—for him, strikingly pale—when he told came back.

"Anything wrong, Geoffrey?—you're as white as sheet."

"It's the heat. Where's Sir Patrick?"

"You may see for yourself."

Arnold pointed to the window. Sir Patrick was crossing the lawn, on his way to the library, with a newspaper in his hand; and the guests at Windygates were accompanying him. Sir Patrick was smiling, and saying nothing. The guests were talking excitedly at the tops of their voices. There had apparently been a collision of some kind between the old school and the new. Arnold directed Geoffrey's attention to the state of affairs on the lawn.

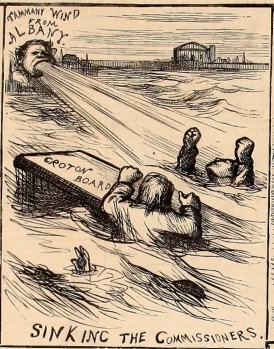
"How are we to consult Sir Patrick with all those people about him?"

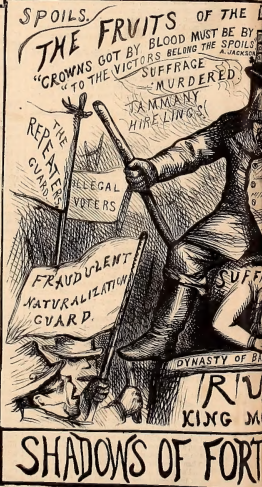
"I'll consult Sir Patrick, if I take him by the scruff of the neck and carry him into the next county!" He rose to his feet as he spoke the words, and walked out then under his breath, with an oath.

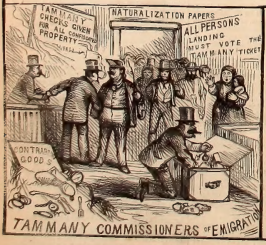
Sir Patrick entered the library, with the guests at his heels.

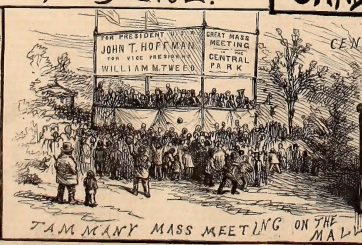
A SECRET OF THE SEA.

WE had battled round the Horn, and up through the "roaring Forties." Decks had just been washed down, and passengers were on their way tigging themselves out in smarter togs than usual, in honor of our first sunny, quiet Sunday at sea, when one of the men on the forecastle sang out, "A sail!" It was the first that we had seen since we had fairly got away from Sydney, and therefore it excited unusual interest. The captain bade the man at the wheel change the course a point to the westward, that we might make sure of speaking the welcome stranger; and when we came on deck again after the mid-day grace dom board was leveled at her, and the signal-book was got out in readiness. We made the stranger out to be a low black brig, with a white spar, a white quarter-rail, and very rakish masts—the lower ones painted white. The upper ones were braided up, but all other canvas, except studding-sails, was set—even a cotton main sky-sail. The brig was evidently a fast sailer, and something in the cut of her double top-sails, and the build of her hull and white bends-board, led the skipper and myself to pronounce her a Yankee. In vain did we run up our fluttering line of gay, many-colored little signal-flags. Up and down they went with good-tempered patience, but the brig's gaff still obstinately refused to display her private code of colors. Presently the sails, we saw









SHADOWS OF FORT

SUNDAY IN NEW YORK.

RUM HOLE.

TED BY SOME LOCAL AUTHORITY.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

GOING TO THE DOGS.

TAMMANY STREET CLEANERS. (?)
(WINTER.)

TAXLEVY · DISTRIBUTERS

TAMMANY COMMISSIONERS OF CHARITIES

PLUNDER

MOCRATIC VICTORY,

BLOOD MAINTAINED."

NEW YORK, 1870

GIGANTIC REPEATING

COUNTERFEIT NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATES

FRAUDULENT VOTERS

BALLOT-BOX STUFFERS BRIGADE.

ST-BOX STUFFER

B.

"THE MERRY OLD TIMES."—NEW YORK AS IT WAS.

AMERICUS

"THE OLD FIRE DEPARTMENT IS TO BE REORGANIZED."

HCOMING EVENTS.

THE TAMMANY COMMISSIONERS.

TAMMANY HALL

CONNOLLY

MR. SUPERVISOR STREET COMMISSIONER SENATOR SACHEM

CIRCLE. "HIGH ART" RACE COURSE.

Th. Nast.

TAMMANY BOARD OF "HEALTH." DEATH

LOST IN THE SNOW.

See Illustration on Page 60.

Ox this drear night, going whither,
Mournful mother, with thy child?
What sad fate has brought thee hither,
Now the snow-storm, sweeping wild,
Buries every path and track;
And the night is gathering black?

All the firs are weighted with snow;
Every hedge heaves like a grave.
Faster o'er the road you go
Spreads the white and treacherous wave.
After them, with silent trend,
Steals a murderous form behind.

Clasp thy child unto thy breast;
Closer, lest he hear it nearer.
Onward; if thou may and rest
For a moment, by yon fence,
Yon farmer's savage grange
Thy fond memory will mislap.

Hurry, while thy chilling blood
Still can give the life and speed;
Knee-deep through the frosted flood,
Faster o'er the buried mead;
Till the distant village peal
O'er thy dreamy senses steal.

Cry to Heaven!—Jesu send her
Guardian angels swiftly down!
Saviour of Mankind, befriend her!
Fainter now, she half sinks down,
When a ray of friendly light
Darts, swift piercing through the night.

Then there come a pleasant jangling,
As of bells, and lusty voices,
And a cheering merry wrangling—
Ere she leaps up and rejoices,
Two great giant-arms heave round her,
'Tis her husband who has found her!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book ERE.

CHAPTER XII.—(Continued.)

IT was the first time she had ever called him "Cesare," and the sound of his name uttered by her lips overpowered him with joy. He fell on his knees and kissed her hand in his demonstrative southern way.

"Another min, do I not know already what you would tell me?"

"No," replied Veronica, with a faint melancholy smile; "you do not know or guess. Sit down there, opposite to me, and listen. You said a resentful word to me just now about not having trusted you. I want you to understand how little I deserve that reproach from you."

Barletti began to protest that he had never meant to reproach her; but she checked him.

"No, no; you must hear me out now. Lost autumn at the Villa Chiari, when I was startled and alarmed by Sir John's illness, you remember that I spoke to you about it?"

"Remember! Ah, Veronica, can I forget my word or I?"

"Many, I should think: but probably not those words. Well; it was merely that you were the only intimate acquaintance who frequented our house; it was not even that I thought you kind-hearted and sympathizing, and that in my utter loneliness I yearned for kindness and sympathy. No: all that would not have sufficed to make me confide in you as I did. I knew that there was a tie between us which gave me a real claim on you. Cesare, you and I are cousins."

"Cousin! You and I are cousins! But how? Oh, Veronica, and you never said a word —never gave a hint—that—"

"No. I never said a word, nor gave a hint of our relationship. I never should have done so, had not Sir John done me justice and placed me in a position which I could acknowledge to my kindred. My mother was Stella Maria de Barletti; and your grandfather and my grandfather were brothers."

"Dio mio! But he—must have known this?"

Veronica had not anticipated this commonsense remark. Barletti did not appear evidently impressed by the greatness of her conduct. When a sensitive artist has made his point, he requires to be sustained and encouraged by the enthusiasm of his auditors.

"Sir John Gale," replied Veronica, haughtily, "probably never heard the name of my mother. She has been dead many years. I have not been to the hadais of Sampierdarena for my maternal ancestors. He is a parvenu, and, like all parvenus, presumptuous and jealous on the score of family.

This magnificent outburst was a little bewildered Barletti. He knew very well what value to attach to a member of the younger branch of the princely family de' Barletti in fifteenth century; and princes had been plentiful in his world ever since he could remember; but rich English baronets had not. He recollected having heard that his respected great-uncle (Veronica's grandfather) had married a young English lady—a very moderate dowry (as to her pedigree, no one had thought of inquiring, so far as he knew), and that his respected great-uncle was thought to have done uncommonly well.

"And so we are really cousins!" he said, looking wistfully at Veronica's tear-stained face.

"Ah, ideio mio, no consanbip can make me love you more than I love you already!"

"You do not seem to understand, Cesare, that I refrained from claiming you as my kinsman, or of hinting as our relationship to Sir John, solely out of regard to the honor of our family," said Veronica, impatiently. "Some women might have appealed to you to use them rightful. But, since you have done me the honor to ask for my hand, I owe you an honorable answer. I must be had, whatsoever cost of insistence! At last Cesare understood what was expected of him. His mind, be it noted, there was not in his mind to make his response otherwise than genuine.

"Dear, noble Veronica!" he exclaimed, gazing into her face with intense admiration.

"Ah, Cesare, you did not understand me!"

"But I know, now, how brave and noble you have been! And I know how utterly unworthy of you is that man who—"

"Hush! Let that rest. He is very, very ill."

"I saw him lifted into the carriage. But, Veronica, he may linger a long time yet."

She made no answer, but drew a little apart from him, as if to commune with herself.

"I wish—I wish, Veronica, that you would throw me a word of hope to feed on in these weary days!"

"What can I say, Cesare? This is not a moment for me to speak on me. Do not make me feel that I could not dare to rely on you and appeal to you for help. Have you not?"

"You might give me a right, then, to be relied on, and appealed to. Veronica, I adore you! I would devote my life to you!"

"Cesare, at such a time! When he is lying there on ill!"

"But he has been ill all these months!" said Barletti, simply.

"Think of me! I am worn out, and can not bear much more excitement. If you will talk to me calmly, as a friend and a kinsman, you may. If you can not promise to do that, you must go away at once."

"You are hard with me, Veronica."

"It is most ungrateful to say so. Tell me that English officer you spoke with, that he says all he speak—for another minute he will talk to every comer as he did to you?" asked Veronica, flushing hotly as she put the question.

Barletti reassured her. The officer had spoken merely because Barletti had mentioned Sir John's progress. Of course, Veronica's name formed in that way, on board a ship of war, could not be mentioned in the hearing of others. Until the squadron was to depart immediately. There would be no opportunity for the thing to spread among the people who are here. Barletti, as he said this, did not believe it. But he saw that she greatly dreaded the slightest publicity, and was glad to have left only of soothing her anxiety. He tried, then, to induce her to tell him about her illness and her relations with Sir John; and to pass that she had left England with Sir John Gale. But on this subject she was not willing to be communicative. She said:

"You told me to talk to you as a friend and a kinsman, Cesare; and I will. But remember, surely, has some right to your confidence."

"Some day, Cesare," she answered, "you shall know all that I can tell you. But this has not been long, but the story can not be told quickly. I can not command myself for the effort now. You must have patience, and some day I will not refuse what you ask me. There is no right to ask it, but I will grant it."

Her tone, and look, and gesture conveyed more than the words. He felt that she could speak, but she lightly laid the fingers of her left hand (he held her right hand in his) on his lips.

"Not to-day, Cesare," she said, softly. "You will come this evening; and, above all, do not allow Sir John to guess that you saw him this morning! Farewell!"

"Veronica, one word! It is a question I have intended to ask you; do you know an Englishman named Frost?"

"Frost? No."

He knows you, and spoke of you. Or it may be—now I think of it—that he only knows of your name. Is it not a common name?"

"Knows me! What did he say?"

"He said that Gale treated you very ill."

He said that? Is that the only word for word, what he said?"

"Well, I think," replied Barletti, pondering, "that his words were, 'Sir John Gale uses that poor wife of his very ill.'"

"Ah!" Veronica retained Veronica, drawing a long breath. "He spoke of me as Lady Gale?"

"Yes, yes; I am sure of that. But where can he have known any thing about you?"

"I cannot tell you. Ask me no questions. You have told me enough to show what a hotbed of gossip this world is. Cesare, as we seem, we did not escape the tongues of those creatures who lounge at the club-door, I dare say."

Barletti felt a little uncomfortable twinge of conscience as he remembered that he himself had made one in a discussion respecting Lady Gale the very spot she mentioned. And her flushing eye and disdainful attitude recalled to him, moreover, that John Fleming was to be "publish" that her name had been spoken at the club.

"Farewell until this evening, Veronica, my adorata!"

"Good-by, Cousin Cesare."

When he was gone she sat down opposite to a large mirror. "Princess!" she said, softly, to her reflection. "Principessa de Barletti!" Veronica understood, although Cesare did not, what the worth of such a title would be in England. Then she stretched herself on a sofa and laid her head on soft cushions. She was really weary in mind and body, and presently fell off into a sleep.

Toward the end of her sleep she began to dream. She dreamed that she was going to be married to Mr. Plew, and that she was reluctantly walking by his side through St. Gildas's grave-yard, toward the church. And, as they came near to an ancient upright stone she well remembered, Sir John Gale, white and ghastly in his grave-clothes, started out from behind it, and, with a yell of hoarse laughter, bade them stop.

CHAPTER XIII.

REPARATION.

"To my beloved wife." That will be sufficient. Then, drawing away, and put another pillow behind my shoulders, Paul. Paul! Paul! do you hear?"

Then followed a hoarse muttered volley of oaths, and Sir John sank back on his pillow.

Veronica and Barletti stood beside his bed. The former very pale and excited: the latter wondering, and impressed by the change in Sir John's face. There was an awful look upon it. The skin seemed to be burned and shriveled by an inward scorching fire. The eyes looked unglassy and prominent from under their red eyebrows. There was a harsh stubble of beard upon the cheeks and chin.

"You have explained to him, have you?" asked Sir John, in a faint voice, making a slight movement with the emaciated hand that lay outside the coverlet, toward Barletti.

Veronica caught the purport of what you tell us you have written," answered Veronica.

"Yes, yes. I want him to understand. The estate in Dorsetshire is entailed, and will go to a cursed mob, a thrivel cousin who inherits the title lately—died, has he? Or not, then it—he ceased to speak any language but his own. It troubled him to talk French, he said. At any rate he could not under any circumstances, it would have appeared to him a sufficient reason for not having done any thing else to say that it troubled him. But as things were with him, it was very obvious that he was unequal to making much conversation in English.

"Does Gale say it has been signed?" asked Barletti of Veronica.

"Yes, yes," Sir John caught the question, and he answered it.

"Oh yes! Yes, the witnesses! Ay, we must have witnesses, or it would not be a legal instrument. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, yes. Oh, it is signed; and witnessed. Ha, ha! Witnessed!"

In obedience to a sign from his master, whose every movement he watched with anxiety, Paul took a small key from a ring attached to his master's watch-chain, and with it unlocked a little drawer at the end of the room opposite to the bed. He then opened an inner compartment of the desk which was fastened by a spring, and took out a folded paper covered with writing on one side. When all was done, Sir John stretched his hand out for the paper to be given to him. His eyes traveled over the writing—it was very short—and then glanced at Barletti and Veronica as he handed side by side near the bed. With a sudden movement he tore fragments of the paper into shreds, as they held, crossing them into irregular folds.

"Go away, go away!" he gasped out. "Go and fetch me a lawyer, Paul, Paul! Take you this precious paper, and lock it up again carefully in the drawer of that desk. Let them see you do it. So; so. And you are a witness to it, remember. You will know and recollect that that is my will, which leaves the bulk of my property to my wife—to my beloved wife.' Now go."

The latter command was addressed to Barletti and Veronica, who, nothing loth to leave that presence, withdrew. It was the fifth occasion after the day the incidents of which have been narrated in the preceding chapter. On return from the new ship Sir John had taken to his bed, and had not since left it. He was in a strangely excitable state, and had shown a most capricious ill humor.

After Sir John had dismissed them from his bedside, Veronica and Barletti remained tête-à-tête in the large dimly-lighted saloon. No one observed them, for the few guests who were together as long as they chose. Sir John, far from displaying suspicion, seemed to desire Barletti's presence in the house. But yet the prime minister no attempt to profit by this opportunity of making love to the beautiful Veronica. She was down silently, and with a disturbed countenance. He walked to the window, whose shutters were undrawn, and looked out into the moonlight. The oppression of Sir John's looks and words weighed upon him, and upon that of Veronica.

Veronica broke the silence. She spoke in a subdued voice, although there was, as she well knew, no human creature within reach of her.

"Cesare! Why d-n't you speak to me? I feel so horribly wrong."

"Cara. You have been too much tried. You must try to be strong and composed. Coraggio."

"I hate to use meaningless talk," she replied, fretfully. "Coraggio!" It is not courage I want. Courage won't explain and undo things. Do you think, Cesare, that he is really—dying?"

"He is undoubtedly very, very ill."

"There again! Meaningless, empty words. I know—we all know—that he is very, very ill. But I ask if you think the end is near?"

Cesare really loved her, and he was patient with her as real love is. He seated himself near her, and softly placed his hand upon her head.

"Veronica mia," he said, "I am not skilled in such signs. But it does seem to me that there is to-night a warning change in him."

Veronica shuddered and drew close to him, pressing her shoulder against his with the gesture, not of a lover, but of a little frightened child that seeks the comfort of human contact in the dark.

"He must feel deeply the wrong he did you," proceeded Cesare. "It must be owned that he is doing what he can to save you pain. The testament he has made is a generous one."

"Yes—I don't know—"

"You don't know?"

"I—I—feel—I can not explain it; but I have a strong feeling as though he were fooling me to the last."

"Fancies, my child. What puts them into your head?"

"I can not explain it, I tell you. He looks at me sometimes almost fiendishly. And with a kind of exultation in his eyes too. Just now I almost believed his mind was wandering."

"No, no. It was in perfect possession of his senses," said Barletti, fondly, feeling that this supposition was an extremely important one for Sir John's legatee to make. "He has done every thing with forethought and deliberation. The marriage on board ship was his own idea, was it not?"

"Yes."

"And on the first distant hint of his making a provision for you—which you uttered in accordance with my suggestion—he sent your wisher by telling you that he had already made a will with which his widow would have no reason to be dissatisfied?"

"Yes."

"The will is clearly expressed and duly witnessed, is it not?"

"He did not show it to me. He merely read a few words to me."

"But he stated what his purport was, in the presence of Paul and the steward?" And its terms surpassed your expectations. Is all that true?"

"Yes, I suppose so. Yes; it is true," added Veronica, in a firmer tone. Barletti's reepistulation of the facts were reassuring her. In him, at least, spoken at first with an indistinct hope of eliciting some such reassuring statement as this one.

"But," she added, after a pause, during which her memory had vividly recalled certain of Sir John's strange words: "although all that is true, quite true, I can not help being made uneasy by his manner. My husband is ill, and for me if he hates me, as I most thoroughly believe he does?"

"Hates you, Veronica! What wild folly!"

"No, no, no: it is not wild folly. It is sober sense," pursued Veronica, speaking with some earnestness, now that she had once begun to reveal the secret thought that was in her. "I have a right to guess! I do. I may not, I know I known it. What love he ever felt for me has been over this many a day. I always knew that he was jealous of me—always. He hates you too. He is jealous of you. I have seen his eyes, when he did not know that I saw them, under the shadow of his lamp-screen on the little table. And I believe he set Paul to watch us. I do."

The strong conviction in her tone was not without its effect on Barletti. He was impressed with the confident calmness of one who is rebutting an obvious absurdity, and with a slight shudding of the mind up and down: "Well, it is the most original demonstration of hatred I ever heard of, to bestow his name and his fortune on the object of it the moment when he is about to leave you free to enjoy both as you please. Most people would call such conduct affectionate and generous.

"Yes. And it is because I know him to be incapable of generous affection or generosity that I can not be easy."

"Veronica, that is morbid!"

"Well, you may say what you please, but I know that man means me no good. Do you remember what I said to you on the night we set aside his bed? Dio mio! How it all comes back! Cesare, I am afraid of him! I am with both young, and handsome, and healthy. How delightful it is to think of the years of happiness that stretch before you!" And she broke out into the diabolical sneer he gave? Oh! Cesare, there is none to evil to come. I am afraid."

She wrung her hands tightly together, and began to pace quickly up and down the room.

"Veronica," he said, in a tone of much consideration, "it may be that you do not much wrong Sir John's nature. He is ill, and has suffered pain and mistaken in your conclusions. If he does not care for you he cares for himself, and the fear of death is a powerful motive to reparation."

"He does not believe in reparation. It scoffs at every thing. He has no religion."

"But those are the very people to be afraid. I have known men who have never been to mass or to confession for twenty years turn like soft wax in the hands of the priests when there came any prospect of dying."

"Ah, in your church, perhaps. But with us it is different."

"And then, don't you see, Veronica, that the struggle in his mind between evil promptings and the desire to save his own soul may produce all the strange fluctuations you observe in his manner?"

She shook her head doubtfully, but she liked that her vague fears and suspicions should be combated. Cesare had fanned into life a spark of hope. She had been right in her assertion that she always had been loved. With more patience than she had first sought to make himself pleasing in her eyes, she was unshakably sure that now, at all events, he loved her for herself; and that were she destitute to-morrow he would not desert her. And then, too, her apprehensions seemed less alarming now she had uttered them than they had appeared while she brooded over them silently. Perhaps Cesare was right, and she was wrong after all! What fate could there be in her fortune? Yes; no doubt Cesare was right! She was very glad she had told him how she felt. Everything imparted she took his head between her hands, and pressed her lips to his forehead. The action was little more than an expression of her relief to her mind which his word had brought: and partly it was the unthinking impulse of love in peril to a sleeping hand—the clinging of a child that knows no compunction in throwing all its weight of care and fear on the patient willing shoulders of those who love it.

The next day about noon Cesare de' Barletti was breakfasting in one of the principal caffè's in Naples, when Mr. Frost walked in and took his seat at a small round table near him.

"Ah, Mr. Frost! So you are not gone then?" said Barletti, shaking hands. "I thought you were, many he never omitted with an Englishman, conceiving that to have done so would have been as great a solecism in good-manners as to decline the proffered pipe of a Turk.

"No," returned Mr. Frost, "I am not gone, as you see. The telegram came after all. I may be compelled to leave another week or so. I have not seen you these last days, prince."

"I have been nowhere—nowhere except to the house of a valued friend. He is dying, poor soul. Do you remember—" Barletti suddenly checked his speech and dropped his eyelids with a little clatter that brought the waiters hurrying up. In the little momentary bustle his sudden pause and confusion escaped notice, as he flushed.

Cesare had been on the point of mentioning that his sick friend was no other than the bride's groom whose marriage had taken place at the Fortiloni, when he remembered that Frost had spoken of "Lady Gale." If Frost connected Veronica to be Sir John's wife already at the time of their conversation at the window of the hotel, it would be injudicious, to say the least, to proclaim that she had only been married that very morning. Secondly, Veronica would suffer from having the date of the marriage known. It might be—nay, it was probable—that Mr. Frost had already heard of it. But at all events he (Cesare) would say no word on the subject. Mr. Frost had evidently received that the dropping of the coffee-cup had been a mere threat on Barletti's part to divert attention from his unfinished speech. But it was a matter of considerable importance to Mr. Frost whether Prince Cesare de' Barletti were close or candid in his communications, now that the bridegroom's fall had brought the new and into contact was satisfactorily concluded. He therefore began the dialogue with a question as he sipped his coffee, and Barletti listened with lazy satisfaction.

Presently he observed, during a pause in the talk: "What a devil of a pace those fellows drive!" The hackney cabmen, I mean. Just listen how one is tearing up the street at this moment. Neck or nothing!"

"Yes," replied Mr. Frost, "I often wonder that in your teeming streets more accidents do not happen. This fellow, whoever he may be, is coming here, by the sound. By Jove! I think it is the matter?"

The exclamation was elicited by the sudden pulling up of an open cab at the door, and the hurried descent therefrom of a pale, frightened servant in an English livery. Every one looked about him eagerly, and allowed his way through the crowd of coffee-drinkers with a promptitude of their convenience which would have brought down considerable wrath on his head had it not been for the expression of his countenance, which aroused curiosity and kept resentment in abeyance.

"Oh, there you are, signor principe!" exclaimed the man, catching sight of Barletti. "I've been half over Naples looking for you! At last I heard you were here. Will you come at once to milady? Here's the cab waiting."

"What is it, Pierro?" asked Barletti, rising with a face yet paler than the servant's.

He had no reason to fear for Veronica, and yet his unreasonable lover-like apprehension could fix on no other object.

"My master, signor principe, is dying or dead. I don't expect to find him alive when we get there, and milady she's been falling from one fainting fit into another. And as soon as she had consciousness she sent for you."

Barletti seized his hat and rushed to the door. Before he stepped into the cab he called out to Frost, "I will send you this evening! I may have business. Something important! Come to the Palazzo Dinozi at six o'clock, if you possibly can, and ask for me!"

Then Barletti got into the cab, and was whirled away with a mighty whooping and clattering of hoofs.

CHAPTER XIV.

"MY BELOVED WIFE."

MR. FROST called at the Palazzo Dinori a few minutes after six o'clock that evening. He was admitted immediately to the portress, who had been told to expect him, and was ushered into a small, sumptuously-furnished room, overladen with ornament. It was Veronica's boudoir.

Mr. Frost had not come to the palazzo without trying to gain some information respecting the person who lived there. A rich Englishman—a very, very rich! A millionaire at the least, Milordo Gale. That was the report of the landlord of Mr. Frost's hotel. His cook was a superior person—a man of talent—a cordon bleu! The landlord had the honour of a slight acquaintance with that distinguished artist, who sometimes cracked a bottle of "Lacrima" or fine Capri with him in his private room. As to Milordo Gale—ah, yes, he was rich. Dio-lo! Poor men did not enjoy the services of such a cook. The landlord had known the latter long, and esteemed him highly. He had been chef de cuisine to the Inglese Milordo many years ago: in the old days, you understand.

Mr. Frost would perhaps not have complied with Barletti's request to go to the Palazzo Dinori so promptly had he not felt a considerable amount of curiosity concerning its inmates. He sat down in the luxurious room, and contemplated with interest Lady Gale's costly lodging in Gower Street. That thought brought others in its train: other thoughts of a painful and humiliating nature. By marrying Miss Lockwood had not yet been redeemed. And Hugh was growing more and more headstrong. It was quite a foregone conclusion that he was to be any private letter from England, and she had had no from him for some time, and Veronica's demands for money from beginning to end. Mr. Frost's private meditations were not soothing. The speech of a "Le Lady," a mode of dressing, a wrench of his mind, and a movement of his body as though he were shaking a tangible burden from his shoulders, he turned his thoughts to other matters. Things had got to that point with him that even a man tells himself that it is no use thinking of his troubles: thinking will mend nothing. Some time must look more favourably come, at all events. And if not—? If not, why still it is no use thinking. The devil must have his turn now!

Mr. Frost had not sat ten minutes in the boudoir before Barletti came in.

"Come in, come in," said he, grasping the lawyer's hand hard, "you are come? Thanks, many thanks. I have a world of you."

Barletti had never addressed Mr. Frost as "caro amico" before.

"What can I do for you?" asked the latter, observing Barletti's face attentively, but not scrutinizingly.

"It is all over here. That man—Sir John Gale—"

"Your friend?"

"My friend! Yes, yes, my friend! The most unlucky of all friends! Dead, dead! Poor, unfortunate, forgive me! He has gone to meet his deserts."

"Humph!" ejaculated Mr. Frost, with closed lips and an indescribable inflection in his voice. "Ecco lo! That is to say that he is—?"

"Dead."

"Oh! Yes. I see. Was it sudden?"

"One or two hardly say so after all these months of wasting away. But yet at the last it was sudden, quite. It was a blessing sight to see. When I got here I could not see straight into his room. I turned sick and faint as a girl," said Barletti, leaning pale, and shuddering at the recollection.

"How? What was the hideous sight?"

"He had taken a blood-vessel, and was lying there just as he had died. They had touched nothing. It was horrible!"

The impressionable Italian hid his face with his hands, as though to shut out the remembrance of the scene.

"Who was with him? How was the cause of death ascertained?"

"The physicians who attended him arrived just after it happened. He had been raving in his usual maniacal fury. That killed him, there's no doubt."

A thought occurred to Mr. Frost. If Sir John Gale had died intestate he would leave a fortune undoubtedly be a wealthy woman. In any case his death would relieve her from the anxiety and torments under which she would have at least such an income as befitted her rank. Lady Tullis (since we must call her so) in her present circumstances from those she had been in hitherto. Would be likely to make a liberal move of course. And then—then that might make a difference in the prospects of Hugh Lockwood! The thought was a momentary one. Mr. Frost knew so quickly that there was no perceptible pause before he said, &You will allow me to suggest that you should not remain in this room, Barletti. Perhaps you have already done so?"

Barletti was sitting with his face on the table and alternately bringing his open palms together on his forehead, and slowly separating them with a stocking movement toward his eyes. He made a little negative gesture with his head, in answer to Mr. Frost's question.

"You asked me to come here, prince, in such a manner that I concluded you stood in need of professional advice from me. If so, I believe you will forgive me for reminding you that my time is valuable, and that if there is no service I can render you I must withdraw."

"No, no, don't go! Pray don't go! I do want you. I am not myself myself yet. I have been half distracted all day. More for her sake, God knows, than my own!"

"For—?"

"I am her cousin. I have a right to be near her and protect her. Her name is Veronica Stella de' Barletti. There is no other relative in Italy to take care of her."

Mr. Frost, I do not in the least doubt your right to take care of the lady in question. But—who is she?"

"Do you remember that morning, now nearly a week ago, when we saw Sir John Gale being rowed ashore from the English ship?"

"Certainly. Ah, I see. Yes, yes; I begin to understand. There was a lady with him—a young lady as it seemed to me. Humph!"

"Yes, that was she. She was in a dreadful state that morning poor child, poor child! She had been fainting, falling from one swoon into another, and that was best for her, proven anima sofferente! For when she became conscious again her misery was terrible to witness."

"My I ask what was the occasion of the lady's agitation? I did they permit her to see the scene which so affected you? That was injudicious!"

"Oh yes! She saw it all. She has not yet been able to give me a connected account of it; but from what she has said, and from what Tani and —Paul was that man's valet—I have ascertained that the scene must have been appalling."

Mr. Frost was evidently very much surprised at Barletti's acknowledgment that the beautiful young woman in question in Sir John Gale's household could not be doubtful was his cousin. The young prince's visits to Palazzo Dinori, and his election to the lovely woman who inhabited it were well-known and much discussed topics of gossip in Naples, as they had been at Florence—a fact of which Barletti was as innocent as a child. For there are minds which, although shrewd enough to judge their neighbors, never conceive that the same standard is naturally applied to themselves. Some breath of this gossip had floated by Mr. Frost, and had remained in his memory. Veronica was usually spoken of as "La Lady," a mode of designating her which conveyed no idea of widehood to Mr. Frost's ears. Mr. Frost was not unacquainted with foreign life. He had lived in Paris, and called himself a man of the world. But he did not quite understand that it is a matter of course to be aware that their social morality is presided over by a stern goddess called Decorum, to outrage whom lives in a blasphemy condemned by all well-bred persons. It would not sting an Italian man's probity to talk to his friend of "whited sepulchres." There must be sepulchres, and the least you can do is to whitewash them.

"Well," said Mr. Frost, shrugging his shoulders, "the poor young orphan must be taken care of. Milordo Gale has left no will, I suppose

LOST IN THE SNOW.—[SEE POEM, PAGE 58.]

LEAVING OLD ENGLAND FOR AMERICA.

LEAVING OLD ENGLAND FOR AMERICA.

We're away, we're away to a far distant shore,
Where the toil-worn and weary no longer may slave;
Where the worker may rest when his labor is o'er,
In the sunset of life, ere he sinks in the grave.

We're away, we're away to those wealth-teeming climes,
Let the downcast and helpless shake off their despair,
Let the woe-stricken soul live for happier times—
Bright, oh bright are the hopes of our destiny there!

Far away, far away, on those measureless plains,
Shall the sons of Britannia establish a home;
And the bold Anglo-Saxon, or fortune ordains,
Be the founder of nations in ages to come.

Farewell to thee, Albion! We love thee, we know,
And fondly part we from the land of our birth;
For the Ruler of all has decreed that we go
To cradle new realms on the confines of earth.

See the broad sails unfurl to the welcoming wind;
Now the noble ship moves! Clear the decks—we're away!
Three cheers for the dear friends we're leaving behind,
And three more for Old England—Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!

MISERS.

THE old satirists used to thunder against misers. Is any body a miser now? There are people who are selfish enough, in all conscience—people who, in our elegant modern dialect, are screws to the full extent to which the pressure can be carried; but is any one a miser after the "fearless old fashion," of which Elwes was the last proverbial example? At rare intervals, in the season devoted to gigantic gooseberries and supernatural showers of frogs, we hear of some pauper who has died of starvation with a purse full of sovereigns hidden in the mattress of his bed. But the sheer instinct of hoarding for the sake of hoarding has died out of modern society. A gentleman with £100,000 a year never goes to bed by daylight to save the expense of candles, or rides ten miles round to avoid a turnpike, or walks about in his old cloaks till they drop off his back. The character has disappeared under the natural influences of civilization. No man has the courage to live apart from his kind like a savage dog in a farm-yard. A commission of lunacy would be taken out against him, and he would be ordered, on pain of imprisonment, to live with other people. Instead of putting his money into a stocking, he would invest it in safe securities, and the penetrating influence of public opinion would be far too great to allow him to reinvest the proceeds without paying toll to society. We can not hide ourselves from the gaze of the many-headed monster, and no one is sufficiently insensible to the approval of his kind to do what he likes with his own. If, to make a liberal allowance, half of our income is spent for our pleasure, the other half is invariably spent in obedience to a code of rules tacitly marked by general consent. A very wealthy man may be stingy, mean, grasping, but he never has the courage to refrain from setting up an imitation, however starved and unsatisfactory, of the establishment prescribed by the rule of living of his class. Sumptuary laws have become obsolete, but the sanction which enforces a certain standard of expense is quite sufficient to prevent in practice any wide deviations on the side of economy. Hitherto we have not been so strict in prohibiting extravagance; because, though it is more pernicious to the public interest, there are so many people about the spendthrift who have a direct interest in his follies. That is, the opinion of our neighbors as to the mode of spending our money is far more important in practice than our own. The passion of saving is put down in spite of the supposed selfishness of mankind, while the disposition to throw money to the dogs, though more palpably injurious to ourselves, remains comparatively untouched.

FAVORITE DISHES.

PROBABLY we have not nowadays favorite dishes in the same exclusive sense as formerly. National and theological dislikes are losing their prestige—dishes which once so satisfied the heart as well as palate that the opposite grew by what it fed on, and sentiment dictated the liking where natural incination held back; and, in fact, to bestow any excessive devotion on a dish, you must see it. The old-fashioned host of former times, in modest deprecation of his fare, used to say to his guests, "Try your dinner." Who sees his dinner now? Where a dish is really appetizing like a bird's nest, unquestionably the temptation to gormandize is diminished by the modern arrangement. The promoter of excess is one ample favorite dish which represents the dinner, rather than the knowledge of a succession in the back ground out of sight, suggesting the need of caution in keeping a corner for a possible ideal that never comes. The enormous excrescence we see now at all stimulated by a face-to-face encounter, exciting emulation and competition, is a monstrosity. Had dinners a la Russe been the mode in Gray's time, he would not have had to tell the fate of a certain Master of Magdalen, whose love for that likelihood would then have lived out his natural term, and survived his chronicler.

"Our friend Dr. Chapman," he tells Mason, "is not expected here again in a hurry; he is gone to the grave with his favorite dish at noon and full of foe—he ate them all at one dinner. But his fate was a warning to his brethren, for which he left little for the company beside the bones. He had not been hearty all the week, but after this was seized with a fever and died more."

It was clearly no mere caprice of the poet's fancy to give the siren a fish's tail, so provocative has this creature ever proved to inordinate appetites. Just lately it has come under the Commortal William III. was scarcely more proof against its blandishments than the poor Master last quoted. At Scheveningen, close by the Hague to Under-Secretary Ellis five months before the King's death, says:

"Yesterday he went to a fish dinner of Mr. Van der Esch's. It is a pity his Majesty will not be more careful and moderate with regard to diet. Should I eat so much and of the same kinds I dare say I should succumb to the attack at so long, and yet I reckon myself none of the weakest constitutions."

And it does not seem that tale of royal excess so concisely and pathetically told in nursery history? "He never smiled again, and died of a surfeit of lampreys." Here, too, we may congratulate our age on the safeguard which boundless variety offers against the concentrated attention to a natural propensity. We too have fish dinners prodigious in their aggregate of dishes, but the profusion is out of sight, and the infinite alternative of choice renders the labor of selection a weariness before the appetite can be said to be dictated by sheer quantity.

The new generation of cookery is a check to the knowledge of our friends' favorite dishes which was once a part of politeness. The eccentric Lord Dudley had one peculiarity, that the name we forget—which he expected to find at every table, and he would not dine out or invite himself if his eye sought it in vain. Old dishes are like indigenous flowers, and live in our hearts; the scientific terms of the modern cuisine are as impossible to remember as a book of botany. This ignorance has its inconveniences, however. People's tastes are necessarily more cosmopolitan than they were. When the great man could only enjoy one or two dishes, his cook was equally one-sided in his experience in order to satisfy him. A book on Quakerism tells us that wherever Mrs. Fry and John Joseph Gurney went, their cook at host jelly must be provided for them, and there were times when the cook-maid was not equal to the calves' feet. And Mrs. Sherwood tells a story of Henry Martyn, who, entertaining a party in India, recollected at the moment of sitting down to table to have heard her once commend some mutton-pies. To command was, in his fancy, not to be able to dine without. He bid the servants bring some, and the dinner had to be protracted while a sheep was killed and the pies baked for her exclusive eating.

The simpler the fare the more exacting, no doubt, is the refined palate as to the mode of its dressing. We all remember Mr. Woodhouse's great—this, but not too fine—for the use of those people who know but one or two cooks that can boil a potato or succeed in a plain omelette. How disgusting a nice appetite according as some particular whim is gratified or denied! Certainly the science of cooking never stands on a higher moral level than when some peasant wife describes with pride her husband's delicate attentions in the matter of bacon and its attendant cabbage, what are his views on the treatment of a shin of beef, and what particular stage of growth is the only one to develop the rare and choice flavor that lurks in broad beans gathered in their moment of prime. Dishes used to be family possessions handed down by tradition; a mystery hung about them; the imagination was called in to assist. A respectful awe tempered while it enhanced the moment of tasting. The Rambler, we think it is, tells of an old lady who kept the secret of an orange-pudding till scarce failing breath enough was left to reveal it to her favorite daughter; and our own childhood can recall dishes with something transcendental about them. Nothing that we ever taste nowadays approaches that exquisite evanescent flavor, half taste, half odor, which recorded its existence on the memory. But we can not enter further into the pathetic theme of which we reject, except just to point out how much real solace may and often is found in the contemplation of some dish supreme to childish tastes, served under the direction of now silent lips, and by hands whose ceasing remains to our fancy untransmitted.

BUSY IDLENESS.

WE confess we never feel at home with a man who must always be doing something. There was a French statesman who wrote a little book to teachers, in those convenient intervals when he happened to be kept waiting for his Minister. We have not the slightest wish to see this ante-prandial performance. We have no doubt it was a very dull book, for a man who are never at leisure is always dull.

Busy men and idle men are equally insufferable to us. The real worker is never in a hurry, and the real idler, we may add, is never any thing else. Who ever heard of Lord Palmerston, or the Duke of Wellington, or Lord Brougham, being in a hurry? When we see a man in a great hurry, we may be pretty certain that his previous conduct in life has been idle, and that he is doing that bully. The idlest man we ever knew was by no means the laziest, and found that he never had five minutes to spare for any thing. No one need ever be in such a terrible hurry as this. If we send a commission to it, probably because we have been wasting our time. We have had so much real leave, therefore, done in an hour what ought to have been finished in twenty minutes; or, like the hare, we have loitered in the way, and have to run to catch for it, and arrives just in time to miss the race. Hier comes the country cousin or relation, ing who arrive breathless in the City, because breakfast was half an hour late, or because they would not get up when the clock struck seven.

LONG LIFE.

THE art of attaining to extreme old age, directed of all superfluous details, consists simply in the strict observance of the laws of health. Every day ought to be so apportioned as to permit of bodily exercise, useful employment, and intellectual recreation, the cultivation and gratification of the moral and religious sentiments, the taking of food sufficient to repair the exhaustion of the animal faculties, but the gratification of the organic and moral laws should, like the gratification of the animal appetites, be in moderation; all excess or abuse as invariably entails unhappiness, pain, or disease. Intemperance in ardors the contrary. Every act that is conducive to health and happiness is also conducive to long life; while every transgression of those laws tends as surely to premature decay, and to shorten the days of man. Hence it is that since the creation, a thousand years, if he only knew how to economize his provision of vital force. The celebrated physiologist, Hufeland, also observed that the study of the nervous centres that man ought to live much longer than he does. It has been shown by statistical inquiry that women usually live longer than the unmarried. The reason is simple: unmarried men and women break the natural laws; married men also lead more steady lives; in other words, do not so often infringe the natural laws. There is another reason for this longevity in economy of force. It is not so. Economy of force lies in the moderate use of the powers, faculties, and appetites; but to disuse them is to abuse them almost as much by excess. Otherwise, again, are perfectly obedient to the natural laws, and yet have so little control over themselves that they become victims to disease. This seems to be one of the pains and penalties of our fallen nature—the most grievous of them all.

Long life is not a blessing, but a curse that the Greeks and Romans used to chronicle all remarkable cases of longevity as a miracle; and that is counted twelve only after the time of Joseph, in his miraculous interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams. The age of Methuselah presents, then, nothing so very extraordinary when we proceed upon true calculation. I was about the era of Joseph that the prophet sang: "The days of our years are threescore years and ten, and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away."

But it is well attested that in our days some people attain a much greater age. Samui Mongo, a Scotchman, and Peter Czarten, a Hungarian, are quoted as having attained a hundred and eighty-five years. Again, it is said that the instances of longevity become much more numerous. The particular habits of persons who have lived to an extreme old age do not, however, always favor light upon the secret of longevity, and are even sometimes contradictory. Francis Mongo, who died at Smyrna at the age of a hundred and fourteen, drank nothing but ecorconera water. Jean d'Outrego, who died in Galicia at a hundred and forty-seven, ate naught but flour of maize. Widow Legare, who died at a hundred and seven, always went naked-footed. Laubny, who died at a hundred and nineteen, was a vegetarian, and drank water. He was never known to be angry. Farrot, who died at a hundred and forty, had his pipe constantly in his mouth; and many centenarians have been well known to have practiced anything but moderation in eating and drinking. Old Parr died at the age of a hundred and fifty-two from a surfeit at the coronation of Charles II. According to Dr. Norris, the average chances of life up to seventy have increased in our own times, but beyond that epoch the chances have diminished.

THE MAN WHO IS IN LOVE.

THERE is something very cruel in the contempt with which women, as a rule, look upon a man who is in love. One might have thought that compassion (which is nearly akin to contempt, however, with many people) would have been a more appropriate feeling; but it can not be denied that a man is never less a favorite with the women of his acquaintance than when he is desperately in love with some particular woman. For it is the latter's power to have inspired a similar attachment in the bosom of the young person who has wit enough to reason, she, out of her turn, may be inclined to see something fine and noble in his devotion; but your ordinary woman—and, after all, your extraordinary woman, who has some power of satire, and loves to revenge the weaknesses of her sex by laughing at the others—can not help regarding a lover as a rather silly person, who has caught a fever which is about as much to be avoided as a grown-up man. In novels the case is quite otherwise; and nothing in fiction attracts the sympathy of women so much as a perfect abandonment to a wild and impetuous affection, with the spectacle of a heroine-loving young man conquering every difficulty, and overcoming all manner of obstacles, for the sake of his sweetheart. But in real life, a man finds himself compelling to keep a strict watch over any exhibitions of affection which he may choose to make; and if he does not, the women of his acquaintance look upon him as a "softy," and keep their distance in a slightly contemptuous way over his folly. As for the modern young lady, she conceals her affection to the uttermost that you would almost imagine she had none.

MODERN HOSPITALITY.

OUR liberality is far less picturesque than formerly. To put down one's name in a long list of subscriptions, and have the pleasure of one dinner by a plausible secretary to a company of well-fed Christians, may be gratifying; but unquestionably there is something commonplace, not to say vulgar, in the proceeding. It would be more poetical to distribute doles at the gates of our mansions, though no one with the fear of personal pollution before his eyes could ever recommend the practice. It would unluckily be as injurious to the poor as gratifying to the rich; and in absolutely no way necessarily descend to a more mechanical mode of dispensing charity. In the same way our hospitality which is characteristic of rude societies is heartier than its modern representative. If you wish to be civil to a stranger in the city you ask him to dinner; and if you wish to be doubly civil you ask him twice; in other words, you spend about four hours in the company of a man, say, ten dollars' worth of meat and drink. In the country you may go further, and invite him to stay a week or a month, of your family circle. But your utmost efforts fall very far short of the practice in primitive countries, where the mere stranger is made at home, and has the fatted calf slain in his honor, and has no delicate limb thrown out as to the conveniences offered by the neighboring railway. Undoubtedly the degree of hospitality is measured by the generosity of habits of life. We come a man gladly when we are thoroughly tired of ourselves and of our resources, and that was the charge is brought under the general principle, that life is made up of a series of petty and rapidly-changing excitements, rather than of simple and powerful emotions.

CRAPTEN HASTIN AND FACE, SON LEE, &c., carved at once by the use of Heavenan's Complete Ice with Glycerine. Sold by the hands soft to the coldest weather. Sold by all the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box, by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HAZEMAN & CO., NEW YORK.

WHEN you are depressed by the gaunt, sickly feeling of a disordered system, which tends to be cleansed by HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, take a dose or two of this fine tonic, and see how quick you can be restored to a healthy condition.—[ADVT.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A BAD PRACTICE

Dosing the Stomach. Stop, and try WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT, free of cost, at 181 Chatham Square, New York. Sold at all Drug stores.

LITTLE WONDER.—Best and Most Practical, also Breech-Loading Gun, just the thing for HUNTERS, sent, with 100 cartridges, to any body upon receipt of $25 currency. Agents wanted. Circulars sent. Address ARNOLD CRANE, P. O. Box 90, Allentown, Pa.

Housekeepers.

A. T. STEWART & CO.,

prior to closing their semi-annual inventory,

ARE OFFERING EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

in

Linens, Towels,
Sheetings, Domasks,
Damasks, Blankets,
Napkins, Flannels,
Quilts, Counterpanes, &c., &c.

ALSO,

Best Quality English Brussels Carpets,

At $8 and $9 25 per yard:

ROYAL WILTON,

At $3 and $3 50 per yard;

PARIS MOQUETTES,

Best Quality, $2 50 at $4 per yard.

A LARGE LOT OF

TAPESTRY BRUSSELS AND VELVETS,

AT REDUCED PRICES.

English and Domestic Oilcloths, &c., &c.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold.

Security.—The Road and Equipment, now in New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $15,000 per mile, with a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. The line, connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, will make a short and through route to California. The Company have a Capital Stock of $10,000,000

Issued Grant of Land from Congress, 1866 1,500,000

of 1,600,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at 4,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds 1,500,000

Total $15,000,000

Length of Road, 221 miles. Price 97½ and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. These bonds, being so well secured, and offering a large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and productive investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,

No. 24 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,

No. 11 Pine Street, New York.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S BAZAR, WEEKLY, or MONTHLY, or the ATLANTIC MONTHLY, or the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, sent to one address for $5, by the PUBLISHERS, 753 Broadway, New York.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.

Mrs. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N. J.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

I.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by Lucien Agathon Sala. With Many Illustrations, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

II.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. With Copious Index. 8vo, Sheep, $5.

III.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbours." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IV.

THE POLAR WORLD: A Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By J. G. WOOD, Author of "Homes Without Hands," "Strange Dwellings," "Out in the Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature and Unity of Type," "The Tropical World," "Additional Chapters and 163 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Illuminated Edges, $3.

V.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

VI.

LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Stories of Adventure in the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," &c. With numerous Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75.

VII.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

VIII.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by LOSSING & BARRITT, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1044 pages, Royal 8vo, Price in Cloth, $7 50; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco, $10 00.

NASBY'S PAPER.

THE TOLEDO BLADE,

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the world. Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor. A Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Young Folks' Department and an Agricultural Department, all prepared expressly for the Blade. It is the constant aim of the Proprietors to make the Blade a truly National Newspaper—but a pronounced Democrat in Politics, to the South, but for The Whole Country.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P. M.

No humorous literature of the age has been more universally read and enjoyed than the letters of "Petroleum V. Nasby." Among which the last production of sure evil, combining a profound philosophy, and unanswerable argument, with the keenest wit and richest humor, the "Confedrit X Roads" Preacher has become furnishes, somewhere in the English Language to read. These letters are written expressly for the Blade, and will be continued regularly at its columns.

A NEW STORY—Ms. LOCKE (Petroleum V. Nasby) is now engaged on a new story, entitled "PAUL BENMAN; or, LOST AND SAVED," a story of the Great Rebellion. This thrilling story will be published in the columns of the Blade as soon as the coming year, and of itself will be pronounced by every reader worth many times the subscription price of the paper.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in collecting arrearages due of the Blade.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular & Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and at the same time give us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, as well as different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid.

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

CATARRH

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained, in the treatment of Catarrh, and relief of Summer Head-colds, after one application. Instantaneous, soothing, healing, and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms—such as the tingling, stopping of nose and head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, the dropping of mucus into the throat," cold in the head," sneezing; dizziness, loss of memory, difficulty of breathing, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome malady in all its forms, and is one of the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to HARVEY NORTON, 40 Wall Street, N. Y.

For Cabinet Organs and Melodeons.

There is no Book Equal to it!

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD
FOR REED ORGANS.

Already established as the leading text-book for instruments of the Organ class, in Colleges, Seminaries, Conservatories, &c., and used by the best teachers. For Self-instruction it is unrivalled. Price in Boards Pieces, Voluntaries, &c. (Copyrighted. 1869). Price $2 50. Sent, postage paid, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.

Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Odd household articles requiring Repisting done on short notice. They are also prepared to do Gilding and Bronzing Work and Spesking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

SOMETHING NEW.

Two Million Copies of the Annual SHAKESPEARIAN ALMANAC for 1870 will be given away, and in order that the distribution may be made as rapidly as possible, I should deem it a favor if persons will call at or direct copies to any person who will judiciously distribute them in his locality. One of the Sonnets of the Seven Ages of Man's Life, illustrated in a masterly manner. Address D. G. BRADLEY & CO.,
No. 21 Grand Street, Jersey City, New Jersey.

THE MAGIC WATCH-KEY.

Will wind any watch, and last a lifetime. Price 50 cents. Sent by mail. Address 14 Malden Lane, N. Y.

MAN IN GENESIS AND MAN IN GEOLOGY.

Or, ON THE BIBLE ACCOUNT OF MAN'S ORIGIN AND ANTIQUITY, Tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By J. P. Thompson, D.D. Price $1. Sold by booksellers, and sent free post by
S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS,

SELPHOS PATENT—always resisted as the best, and now better than ever. Send for pamphlet to WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, 122 Nassau St., N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. 1 Samples free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the
UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewellers, 197 Call st. and for Price-List.

CONSUMPTION! SCROFULA!
ZOELAION!

or, Oxygenated Oil—a condensed form of, and substitute for, Cod-Liver Oil: the most certain cure for Consumption, Scrofula, and Bronchitis.

Wholesale by MORGAN & RICKEY, 81 Warren Street, New York. Discovered by J. A. ALLEN & Co., Druggists, Cloverine Chemical Works, Box 198, Brooklyn P.O.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Fiance, Melodeons, and Organs, of 15 first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during the Holidays, or will take from 5 to $10 monthly until paid. The stock to let, and rent money applied if purchased. New 7-octave Pianos for $176 and upward; New Organs for $45 and upward, for cash.

EMPLOYMENT.

Very little capital required, and no risk. Success certain. Business highly respectable, and Profits from 66 to 100 per cent. Persons desiring lucrative employment should write for particulars at once. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, 94 Beekman St., N.Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our Printing Presses, all kinds of printing is done, men can do his own printing, thus saving time and expense. Circulars containing full information about three Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 80 Nassau Street, New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

For Family use—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WILL SELL. Circulars and Samples stocking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., 26 Bond Street, Broadway, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

SUBSCRIBE NOW.
Either HARPER'S Monthly, Weekly, or Bazar, $4 00 each, and Maple Leaves, 50 cents, sent to one address for one year for $4 00, by O. A. ROORBACH, 160 Nassau St., New York.

The Collins Metal Watch

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Model).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations.

Prices:—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $25, equal in appearance and time keeping to gold ones costing $100. These of extra fine finish, $26, equal to $300 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, fully jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $200 gold watch. These magnificent watches we charge only $30. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. Also, a complete assortment of ladies' and gents' watches. Chains, Collins Metal, 50 to $100, all kinds of Jewelery, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $30 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Tuesday's Democrat.

C. E. COLLINS & Co., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The cheapest publication issued in New York newspaper. Everybody likes it. Three editions DAILY, 50c; SUNDAY, $1 20; WEEKLY, $1 a year. The DAILY SUN, a large sheet of mighty facts. Full reports of markets, agricultural, Farmers and Fruit Growers' Clubs, and a complete story in every Weekly and Sunday number. A power of valuable items and news to every person. Subscriptions to one, two, three, four, five, six, or Ten Thousand. Address, The SUN, New York. Printing Office Corner Spruce and Nassau streets, among the premises. Specimens and ads free. Send a postal.

THE SUN, NEW ENGLAND, Publisher Bee, New York.

"One of the best Agricultural Papers published."

We quote the above from the JOURNAL OF THE NEW YORK STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, in reference to the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading paper of its class in New England.

TERMS: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 00, per year.

Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

H. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are prepared to furnish you all the time or spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from $5 to $25 per day, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. We offer employment that you cannot afford to pass by. Full information and all that is needed sent free. Now is the time. Those who are already employed should write us at once. Address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

POCKET REVOLVERS. HALL'S

A neat, durable weapon, four-inch barrel. Price $2, postpaid. Circulars free. J. C. HALL & CO., 169 Broadway, N.Y.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 20 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 75 cts.; 0 for $1; $2 25 per dozen. Circulars free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N.Y.

VINEGAR.

How to make, MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SUGAR. Sorghum a specialty. Address VINEGAR FACTORY, Box 46, Station D, New York.

$60 a Week for Agents, local or traveling. No capital required. Address Rowes & Co., 102 Broadway, N.Y.

$20 a DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. HAND & Co., Biddeford, Me.

Harper's Popular Edition.

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF ALFRED TENNYSON,

WITH

Numerous Illustrations by Distinguished Artists,

AND

THREE CHARACTERISTIC PORTRAITS.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth Extra, $1 00.

Tennyson is, without exception, the most popular of living poets. Wherever the English language is spoken, in America as well as in England, his name has become familiar as a household word, and every volume of the many he has published is to be found in almost every library. For several years a complete cheap edition of his poetical works has been an acknowledged desideratum. Messrs. Harper & Brothers, taking advantage of the conclusion of the American poems, have now supplied this want by publishing an attractive household edition of the Laureate's poems, in one volume, clearly and handsomely printed, and illustrated with many engravings after designs by Gustave Doré, Rossetti, Stanfield, W. Hunt, and other eminent artists. The volume contains every line the Laureate has ever published, including the latest of his productions, which complete the noble cycle of Arthurian legends, and raise them from a fragmentary series of exquisite cabinet pictures into a magnificent tragic epic, of which the theme is the gradual dethronement of Arthur from his spiritual rule over his order, through the crime of Guinevere and Lancelot; the spread of their infectious guilt, till it breaks up the oneness of the realm, and the Order of the Round Table is shattered, and the ideal king, deserted by many of his own knights, and deeply wounded in the last great battle with the traitor and the heathen, vanishes into the darkness of the mystic west.

To American admirers of Tennyson this complete edition of his works, so attractive in all its features, and yet afforded at a price which brings it within every body's reach, will prove most welcome.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a weekly commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial and local interest. The best writers in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers believe they are also indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for the many and valuable contributions.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the leading publication, and neither wishes nor ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of Leading Articles upon the Topics of the Day; Sketches of Social and Current Life; Political Parties, Commerce, and Manufactures, &c.

In No. 63, for December 25, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, author of "The Woman in White," "Hide and Seek," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of journalism, and it records this success as the most attractive family paper ever issued. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is without a rival. Every Number by a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the leading Publishers in Berlin (the acknowledged metropolis in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in Berlin), the latest Fashions in Paris and Berlin are given in Detail.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading—Stories, Sketches, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial articles are from the pens of the most every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical out in this country since, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Fourteenth Volume. Each Number contains matter by itself sufficient to make a volume. The Steel Engraving, by one of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. Wood Engravings, of the highest character and variety of its contents; to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to the completeness of its Literary and Artistic Exposition; to the promptness, authenticity, and popular treatment of the Record of Current Events; upon the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon Political Questions, the Editor has only to point to the special Editorial Departments in which most of these new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The confidence upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristic; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to maintain even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the United Kingdom, while its typographical and the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon the principle of which it is conducted, it stands in the special Editorial Department in which most of these new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The confidence upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristic; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to maintain even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the United Kingdom, while its typographical and the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon the principle of which it is conducted, it stands in the special Editorial Department in which most of these new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The confidence upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristic; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to maintain even its present popularity.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or one copy of each for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly or yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the first Number issued after January 1st and July 1st. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume. Back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE begin with the first Number published in January and July of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number which is next published after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft on New York is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the latter be lost or stolen, it can be restored without loss to the sender.

TERMS for ADVERTISING in HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar—Inside Page Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE MODERN ARCHIMEDES.—THE LEVER THAT MOVES THE WORLD.

NEW BOOKS

published by

Harper & Brothers,

NEW YORK.

I.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, Past and Present," &c. &c. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Dore, Delacroix, Durbuns, and Parsons. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

II.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ALFRED TENNYSON, Poet Laureate. With numerous Illustrations by Eminent Artists, and Three Characteristic Portraits. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth Extra, $1 00.

III.

THE FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 210 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $3 00.

IV.

KITTY. A Novel. By M. Bethan Edwards, Author of "Dr. Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

V.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By Lord Lytton. With Latin Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Yonge. 16mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By George H. Comfort, Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VII.

WITH SPORTS OF THE WORLD. A Book of Natural History and Adventure. By James Greenwood, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 141 Illustrations. Cr'n 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

VIII.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures of Three Midshipmen of Hudson's Bay. By Mayne Reid. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

The Most Recherché Novelty in Perfumery.

Prize Medal, under Distinguished Patronage.

Prize Medal, under Distinguished Patronage.

These Perfumes are of choice quality, and may be confidently recommended on their own merits, while the Labels especially commend them to all lovers of Fine Arts, as they exhibit various devices in Heraldry, bearing Floral Decorations, and thus convey to the poetic mind the mottoes engraved beneath each design, in strict conformity with the recognized Language of Flowers.

R. LETCHFORD & CO., Manufacturing Perfumers, 72 Cornhill, London. ☞ For sale to the Trade only by the Agents, SARGENT, JOYCE & HOLTON, 34 Vesey Street, New York.

WILSON'S COMPOUND OF

PURE COD LIVER OIL AND LIME.

The friends of persons who have been restored from consumed consumption by the use of this original preparation, and the grateful parties themselves, have, by recommending it, given convincing proof of its wonderful efficacy, given the article a reputation throughout New England. The Cod Liver Oil is in this combination rendered perfectly inodorous, and is rendered doubly effective in being coupled with the lime, which is itself a restorative principle, supplying nature with just the agent and assistance required to heal and reform the diseased lungs. A. B. WILSON, No. 166 Court Street, Boston, is the proprietor. Sold by all druggists.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods. Swiss Carved Goods. Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N. Y.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

[Patented June 1, 1869.]

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French percolator, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

Patents American and Foreign, promptly secured. Send for pamphlet, 168 pages, free. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each. MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages. OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 75 pages. MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp. PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages. JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARTWIG'S POLAR WORLD.

THE POLAR WORLD: A Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 168 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

It seems to have been the aim of Dr. G. Hartwig to complete into one volume all that has been said on the subject of the Arctic and Antarctic Circles. "The Polar World" is a popular description, and the reader will be pleased to find that, unlike the rest of fiction, will derive from it information that could otherwise only be acquired from a score of books of travel.—N. Y. Evening Post.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $3 75.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS SAPOLIO 211 WASHINGTON ST. N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

EDWARDS, PIERREPONT & CO.,
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
46 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK.

Waltham Watches.

Buyers of watches at retail should be on their guard against buying watches represented as "American," and which are usually advertised in connection with the words "Gronde," "Imitation Gold," and other words calculated to attract attention. Nine cases out of ten such watches are spurious, as our genuine movements are seldom, if ever, put into any thing but solid gold or silver cases. Large numbers of these worthless watches bear colorable imitations of our trademarks, and unprincipled dealers who do not know responsible jewelers should first procure a descriptive catalogue of the different styles of movements of the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass. The catalogue contains, in addition, much useful information to watch-buyers. Address

ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, 182 BROADWAY, New York.

OPALINE for the Teeth, Gums, & Breath.

OPALINE is safe, efficient, and economical.

OPALINE is sold by Druggists and dealers throughout the United States and Europe.

OPALINE is recommended by physicians & dentists. Useless other deadlifice.

Inventor and prop'r, Chas. K. Peers, Dentist, Worcester, Mass.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides; will run backwards. LOCK-STITCH SHUTTLE MACHINES sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are impregnated. Buckeye Machine Co., Cleveland, O. Agents wanted everywhere. Circulars free. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List. Baltimore, Md.

The Byron Mystery.

MEDORA LEIGH:

A History and an Autobiography.

EDITED BY

CHARLES MACKAY.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION, AND A COMMENTARY ON THE CHARGES BROUGHT AGAINST LORD BYRON BY MRS. BEECHER STOWE.

8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 25 cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 683.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

A FATHER'S ADVICE.—[SEE PAGE 66.]

A FATHER'S ADVICE.

THE illustration on our first page represents an ideal page from the chronicler of Venetian intrigue and conspiracy.—The monk—or he who pretends to be a monk—is doubtless a spy from the dreaded Council of Ten. The lady is perhaps some fair offshoot of one of the great families of the GRIMALDI, or DANDOLO, or FOSCARINI; and has it in her power to betray some great state secret that concerns her lover or husband. The mysterious page, in the Doge's Palace, but two nights since, whispered her name; and but night it was echoed by a masked figure in the loneliest cell of the lowest Fozzi. Some CARMAGNOLA has arisen; some great leader of the Condiert has haunted the banner blazoned with the winged lion of St. Mark in the face of the Milanese, or has insulted the Doge. There is danger now lest he plot some treason against the Senate, and it is of this the Father Confessor is trying to draw knowledge from the lady whom the CARMAGNOLA loves; or the Doge himself is planning evil to the State, and is promised help from the VISCONTI or the SFORZA, this wily messenger has been torturing the tender soul of this young daughter of the Morosini, that when the Doge's son is so shortly to wed, and has already obtained in a manner—save in the eyes of Venetian labyrinth. Half an hour hence a postern door of the Doge's Palace will open, and a man in a mask will hurry into the noble gondola which is held silent as a hearse, that waits there in the side canal in the dark shadow thrown by the Bridge of Sighs, and will glide off swift to the lonely island of the Lido, where other conspirators are waiting on the shore. The jailer will be told the train placed ready for the match, there will be gloomy exultation at the very hour that has been bulled and the fatal lights thrown off the track. Then, in the darkness, the clutter of gondolas will scurry, each on its own silent path—but be sure, just as the mask from the Doge's Palace comes in sight of the great white dome of Santa Maria, hovering in the moonshine, a black hand will close upon his mouth, and two poniards slash together in his breast. The gondoliers then, and the whispering gondoliers will fasten a rell of lead to the body, and let it gurgle down into the tide. Before the next day breaks, the band of masked men will be driven into the Doge's dungeons, and Venice be saved from the conspiracy that threatened it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1870.

☞ New subscribers to HARPER'S WEEKLY will be furnished with the paper from the commencement of WILKIE COLLINS'S "Man and Wife," to the Number for November 20, 1869, at the yearly subscription price of $4.00.

LORD CLARENDON'S REPLY.

IN writing to Mr. THORNTON OF MR. FISH'S dispatch to Mr. MOTLEY, LORD CLARENDON said that it admitted of a perfect reply, which it is to be presumed is continued in his Lordship's temperate letter of the 6th of February, in which Mr. THORNTON was to read informally to Mr. FISH. But the statement of LORD CLARENDON, courteous as it is, is also in many points a special plea. It is the work of an adroit advocate; but it is not so frank as the situation demand. Lord CLARENDON wonders that Mr. FISH dwells points in the case as presented by Mr. FISH: first, the Queen's proclamation of neutrality; second, the declaration of the Confederate secretary from English ports; and third, the supplies furnished by British subjects to the rebels.

Stating the facts under the first head, LORD CLARENDON says that the President's proclamation of blockade of the 19th of April was known in London on the 24d of May, and published in the papers of the 3d. An official copy was received from the Consul in New York on the 5th, another from LORD LYONS on the 6th, and on the 11th it was officially communicated to Lord RUSSELL by Mr. DALLAS, with a circular from Mr. SEWARD, stating that attempts would probably be made to fit out privateers in England. On the 13th, two days after the official communication, the proclamation was issued, and Lord CLARENDON denies that it was intended to be unfriendly. This statement is true; but it is not the whole truth. Lord CLARENDON does not mention that on the 6th of May Earl RUSSELL said in Parliament that the Government had consulted the law officers, and had come to the conclusion that "the Southern Confederacy of America, according to those principles which seem to them to be just principles, must be treated as belligerents." What Mr. FISH complains of is "undue haste," and the British Government, by Lord CLARENDON'S own statement, resolved upon a concession of belligerent rights four days before the official knowledge of the fact by which the concession was alleged. Had that not be fairly considered "undue haste?"

Again, in reply to the charge that the assumed belligerency was a fiction, Lord CLARENDON recapitulates the facts of the situation. But here he includes many circumstances which could not have been known to the British Government at the time. Thus, the President's summons for 42,000 troops of the 3d of May; the declaration of the efficiency of the Carolina blockade; the various captures of vessels at sea, some of which, as Lord CLARENDON mentions, were as late as the 10th of May, were certainly not known in time to justify a decision of the Government upon the 6th. Was not this, he asks, civil war? Perhaps it was—but the British Government did not know it at the time. He says that on the 4th of May Mr. SEWARD has characterized the situation as "serious, flagrant, deadly war." That may be, and every American may have felt that war was unavoidable. But the question is, did the British Government officially know only that Sumter had been assaulted. Recognition of belligerent rights proceeds upon official knowledge and probabilities and anticipations. Mr. FISH does not deny, he expressly asserts, the right of every government to decide for itself when to make such a recognition. But he justly says that it may be made with a precipitancy which reveals an unfriendly feeling. Lord CLARENDON'S own statement, both in what it says and what it omits to say, show the precipitancy of the English official action which JOHN BRIGHT so strenuously denounced?

In reply to the assertion that the proclamation of belligerent recognized vessels which otherwise would have been pirates, Lord CLARENDON says that by Mr. FISH'S own admission belligerency is an existing fact, and he adds that it exists independently of any official proclamation by neutrals. He therefore holds that the reception of the Confederate cruisers in the ports of the Netherlands, which had not issued a proclamation of neutrality, first practically accorded belligerent rights to the rebels. Again, Mr. FISH may be; but certainly the action of the Dutch colony, after war was flagrant, does not affect the action of England in the matter of the Alabama claims. And although it be true, as Lord CLARENDON urges, that if there had been no proclamation the fact could not have been the same, and the belligerency must have been sooner or later recognized, he will hardly deny that the Queen may be a competent judge of belligerency, and that it does not cease to be premature because the war proves to be very long and bloody. So when Lord CLARENDON appeals to the speech of Mr. FORSTER, one of our most constant friends, to show that recognition was prompted upon the ground of sentiment by the friends of the Northern States, who feared lest privateers should be fitted out in British ports, he forgets that Lord RUSSELL must forget that the duty of the British Government to detain such privateers was just as stringent if no such proclamation had issued—a fact which he admits when he says that the proclamation made the privateers "additionally unlawful."

Lord CLARENDON'S letter is, as he says, candid, adroit, but not quite fair. As the strongest statement of the British position upon the point of premature recognition of belligerent right—which the United States do not question it shows conclusively that no satisfactory explanation can be made. Yet we cannot suppose it resolved upon on the 6th of May, when nothing was officially known but the action at Sumter. The justification by Lord CLARENDON of Mr. BEMIS showed conclusively when it was first urged by "Historicus," an after-thought. Nor is any thing to be gained by further discussion of the point; for we do not ask damages for what we consider an unfriendly exercise of an undoubted discretion. Yet we cannot suppose otherwise than that the manly and honorable policy of this Government is to state frankly its views, and the terms upon which it is willing to settle the question. The general feeling in both countries is favorable to plain dealing, and impatient of further diplomatic skirmishing.

CAN NEW YORK WITHDRAW HER ASSENT?

IN presenting to the Senate the resolution by which the Legislature of New York withdraws its assent to the Fifteenth Amendment, Senator CONKLING argued that the State could hereafter show why such an act should not be considered valid. We look with interest for this remark; but many other questions will be considered unsettled. The ground taken by those who refuse the right of withdrawal is, that Congress authorizes it to submit the article, the sain act, either by a convention or by its legislature, and that when it is done the act is accomplished and the authority exhausted. The plausible difficulty with this view is that it is, for those who urge it, a two-edged sword. If it is true of acceptance, it is equally true of rejection. And if New York can not withdraw its assent, neither can Ohio withdraw its rejection.

To this it is replied, that the proposition of an amendment is of the nature of the offer of a contract, and that, after the requisite number of ratification are complete, it is competent for any party to the contract to accede to its terms. But the analogy of form does not hold in the essential difficulty. If, before ratification, any party may come in, so he may go out. Besides, the proposition is not properly a contract; it is a political measure; and before it is adopted any member of the council of States may express an opinion, friendly or adverse, as every member of the Senate or House may vote aye or no, at his discretion, upon every aspect of every motion, until it is settled. Upon a political measure the question of States may be supposed to differ at various times. Indeed, it is easily supposable that the proposition of an amendment by the dominant party in Congress may disclose a tendency or policy which is so seriously disapproved as to change the political majority in a State. It is a fact apparent before the amendment is adopted, and if the assent of the State had been expressed before the popular will upon the subject was known, is it not peculiarly agreeable to the nature of our government that the assent should be withdrawn?

The moment, however, that the necessary number of States ratify an amendment, the discretion of all the States ends; and certainly it is a question for the legal mind whether a State may withdraw its assent to an amendment which is not yet a part of the Constitution, that it may equally withdraw from one that is. That, of course, is merely to affirm the right of secession. The reasonable and simple view of the subject seems to be that the States, like individuals, may have the advantage of the utmost consideration and discussion of the question presented; that if powerful and unexpected reasons present themselves for a change of opinion, while the question is still open, the State shall not be bound by an exigency which a further reflection would recall. It is true that the Constitution does not provide for withdrawing an assent once given. But the Constitution merely ordains that, "when ratified" by the Legislatures or Conventions of the necessary number of States, an amendment shall be valid. Obviously it is not valid till it is. those bodies until three-fourths of them simultaneously agree; and the Constitution declines to say when they agree, because it wishes to leave to every State the utmost liberty of deliberation and action.

As we have already said, the action of the Democratic party in New York in withdrawing assent to the Fifteenth Amendment is only another signal evidence of its hostility to equal rights, and another proof of its incapacity to rise to any really wise and patriotic policy. For many years in this country every truly liberal and sagacious measure was opposed by the party that was devoted at every cost to the extension and perpetuity of slavery. And now that slavery is gone, that party shows how utterly unchanged it is in spirit by this futile effort to prolong as long as possible the despicable prejudice which slavery fostered, and to rob of an equal opportunity the most unfortunate class of Americans.

AN AMERICAN DESPOT.

THE war which has been so long waged in Paraguay has been little understood in this country. Against Brazil in an empire and Paraguay is called a republic the passive sympathy of the people of the United States has probably been with LOPEZ, the Dictator of Paraguay. It should, however, have been a most instructive fact for us that the most truly republican and independent of the South American states, the Argentine Republic, at whose head is the ablest, most intelligent, and most liberal of all the South American statesmen, M. SARMIENTO, is opposed to Paraguay, and leagued with Brazil in the war. Our late Minister in Paraguay, indeed, have had decided sympathies in the dispute, and upon different sides. Mr. WASHBURNE'S view is uniformly to LOPEZ, while Mr. MASON is his bitterest foe.

Many persons make the distinction between Paraguay and Rome's Mr. Lincoln was by the treaty of August of May 1, 1865; but the distinction which Americans will always justly make between a despot and the people whom he controls—a distinction which could not be fairly made in this country, where the President is the free choice of the people.

A few facts in the history of the country will be useful in forming an opinion of the present situation. About the year 1811 Dr. FRANCIA became practically Dictator of Paraguay, having the content of the South American colonies with Spain he held aloof. He declined all intercourse with the other states, and imprisoned all foreigners who came to the country. No commercial export or import was allowed but by the permission of the state as a capital crime to leave the country without his consent. The opponents of his rule were shot or imprisoned. Such was the fierceness and ingenuity of FRANCIA'S tures that he inflicted upon them that he might be supposed to have been crazy, and, undoubtedly, at the end of his long life he was the accidental fear of assassination. When he died, in 1840, FRANCIA'S nephew, CARLOS A. LOPEZ, and a connection, for whom he soon afterward assed himself, took possession of the Government.

LOPEZ wrote a Constitution for Paraguay, which prescribed ten years as the Presidential term, with re-election by the Congress. The seventh article of the Constitution declares the authority of the President unlimited, not only during civil or foreign war, but whenever he deems it necessary to preserve order. Despite his Constitution, LOPEZ made himself perpetual Dictator in 1844. This was done with what a Congress—a body which by the Constitution which sits for a few days once in five years, and which merely ratifies the various acts of the Dictator. In 1856 the Congress gave the Dictator —of course by his instigation—the power to name his successor by secret will. Nor has the Congress ever refused to ratify any proposition of the Dictator. In September, 1862, CARLOS A. LOPEZ died, and left Paraguay, like a private property, to his son, FRANCISCO SOLANO LOPEZ, and the Congress unanimously approved. The present Dictator has been a worthy follower of his predecessors.

"Paraguay," says M. SARMIENTO, "is a plantation with a million of Indians instead of negroes, who consider themselves the property of the LOPEZ family." Such a lord naturally chafed under the fact that he could not reach the outer world without crossing the Argentine territory, and he has been engaged for a long time in formidable preparations—building fortresses, accumulating munitions, and employing experienced European officers to instruct his soldiers. At length he took advantage of a quarrel between Uruguay and Brazil, declaring that Paraguay interfered to serve its own interests only, and with an immense army invaded and ravaged the Brazilian province of Matto Grosso. Meanwhile the Argentine Republic was neutral, and refused to allow Brazil to march across her territories. But when the same demand was refused to LOPEZ he instantly seized Argentine ships and murdered their crews. Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay, the power upon the Plate River, then allied themselves against Paraguay, and resolved to fight until they had overthrown the tyrant, but bound themselves to respect the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of Paraguay; and they will unquestionably succeed in expelling LOPEZ.

This is the President and this the republic of Paraguay of which the sympathies of the United States are solicited. And so successfully solicited, that one of the ablest and most intelligent papers in the country for many years says, that "the success of this godless alliance means extension of slavery and tyranny;" while "on the other side contend the friends of free Paraguay, whose success means freedom." But if Brazil is a slaveholding state, slavery in Paraguay is equally bitter; while the Argentine Republic abolished slavery fifty years before the United States. To apprehend the grasping ambition of Brazil upon the La Plata is unnecessary indeed, while the Argentines are struggling with the grasp of a nearer and infinitely more appalling ambition. SARMIENTO, who looks at the subject in a truly American and liberty-loving heart, as well as with the most thoroughly informed and sagacious mind, declares that "the triumph of LOPEZ means the extension to Uruguay and the Argentine Republic of the Guarani Indian despotism, under the master who, by means of dictator, papa-prince, and lord of life and property—imposing upon all those countries that obedience unparalleled in the history of the human race."

WHAT IS MONEY?

THE indications are numerous of the prevalence of very erroneous if not dangerous views on the subject of this multiform topic. It is one that affects all the relations between man and man more nearly and powerfully than any other known agency, and is of universal importance. It enters into all transactions of every description, and in the proportion in which the views with respect to it are sound and unsound, success in the long-run, whether it be in trade or in statesmanship, depends. At the present moment the prosperity of the United States is suspended upon official action at Washington. We have reached the point where the roads fork, and the only question now before us is one toward specie payments shall be chosen, which leads to low prices for all produce and labor—to ultimate ability to compete in the markets with the industry of others—to mercantile and national solidity, integrity, and safety; or whether we shall take the downward road, leads to high prices, then to speculation, then to failures, dishonesty, and ruin.

The present financial demoralization is due in great part to the failure, when the war ended, to set the country resolutely in the direction of specie payments. Immediately the precious metals are not coined in sufficient abundance to answer all the necessities of commerce, and paper must be left for use in the interval. A great war, it will be found impossible to meet the disbursements of wars of magnitude without using paper-money, especially if the paper had been extensively used in peace. But whether necessary or not we resorted to it, and on a scale which exceeded all prudence. We first issued legal tenders in sufficient quantities, and then allowed the issues of national banks and the fractional currency, all of which drove, excepting on the Pacific, were expelled from circulation; and prices, no longer fixed by labor, but adjusted by the quantity of printed money, rose to such a height that many were in doubt whether the fate of old Continental money and of the assignats would not be reached. Happily the success of our arms saved the credit of the government; but so the measure was the war and for peace, and we were carried to excess to float the $900,000,000 loan, it was a national plan to demonetize the policy as exceptional, and to be abandoned as speedily as prac-sicuble. But, as many feared who urged the original adoption of legal tenders, there are many who insist that it is a policy which not only shall not be abandoned, but shall become permanent.

The Democratic Convention for the State of Indiana, which assembled at Indianapolis on the 8th of January, 1870, resolved that "the business interests of the country demand an increased and maintained volume of the currency," and that our Five-Twenties be paid off in this medium. Our friends of the New York Mercantile Journal send us the following, which they expect to be noticed, and it will be convenient to take both matters together

"In the interchangeability (at the option of the holder) of National Paper-Money with Government Bonds, lies a fatal rule of interest, these as a staple principle that will regulate the movements of Finance and Commerce as accurately as the motion of the steam-engine is regulated by the governor.

"Such Paper-Money Tokens would be perfect measures of value, which gold never could have been. The use of gold or other merchandise as money is a barbarism unworthy of the age.

—Wallace P. Gregg."

If the old hero whose remains repose in Tennessee, and whose birthday was chosen for the assemblage of the Convention, could have been restored to life and had appeared at its sittings, his presence in the hall would surely have been shaken at the 1123 delegates who deseerated that birthday with the assertion of doctrines which attempt to mean by the measure of those which, in a long continued contest, he firmly maintained.

The Convention put forth their dogmas in the interests of labor, and yet they propose to "increase and maintain" a currency which labor does not receive, which dispenses with the money which labor does create. The principal object of money is to secure a medium in which the value of products may be measured, and with which they may be transferred; and throughout the world one or the other, or both, of what we denominate the precious metals are used for this purpose. They pass for about the value of the labor required to obtain and coin them, and for an equivalent amount of other labor in other productions; and when we consider that, as a general rule, all productions which have exchangeable value require the same amount of on the quantity of labor more or less skilful which they contain, it will be seen that the most reliable test of value is labor. The man whom this can deter is thus furnished to mankind. The coin known as a dollar was fabricated partly because the metal of which it is formed was near to the value of a day's labor in prosperous communities. It constitutes the basis of our coinage and monetary system. In its subdivisions and in multiplied form the relation of quantity and weight of metal are carefully observed, except when some special object occurs under the law's limitation. In the conceptions of the framers of our laws, a dollar had no other signification than that of a piece of metal containing a certain weight and fineness, coined and stamped to indicate those qualities. It was formed in obedience to the unerring law laid down by Galiani, that "man—that is to say, his labor —is the only true measure of value." These metals, by reason of various qualities they possess, too well known to be enumerated, and because they are found in the earth in quantities which permit neither of redundancy nor of insufficiency, have been chosen for the purpose of money, and they answer the object with all the certainty of which the subject is capable. Instead of being a relic of barbarism, experience through past ages has demonstrated, as it will through future ages, that their use is indispensable to the world.

The theory on which the Government of Indiana proceeded is the erroneous one that a promise to pay the dollar means something else than the dollar of gold and silver described in acts of Congress, and they would substitute a promise in the place of the true dollar as the permanent currency of the United States. If ever this policy shall be adopted all certainty with respect to the measure of value will be at an end, and the repudiation of our public debt and of all debts must necessarily follow. The imposition of money, instead of being committed to labor, will be handed over to speculators, who can strike off enough in an hour with a printing-press to secure possession of the entire productions of the State of Indiana, and compel submission to their exactions. We ask the Mercantile Journal to consider what would be the value of its "paper-money tokens" if the Treasury of the United States were to adopt the doctrine that portion of the Democracy which governs the city of New York, in the expectation that through frauds in naturalization and in the use of repeaters they will be elevated presently to the control of the National Government.

No possible harm can result from the system which encourages labor to produce by its sweat and toil the money of commerce. Such money will never be found in excess of the wants of the world, because it would be unprofitable. The issue of paper-money in excess of those wants invariably stimulates the speculative mind, and discourages labor in the mines, with this result, that promises to pay dollars become abundant, and the measure of performance are impaired in the same ratio. Modern history is full of examples of this folly. They teach the lesson that a currency not immediately and certainly convertible into the precious metals is one of the greatest curses with which the industry of mankind can be afflicted. If we firmly take the road to specie payments, justice, prosperity, integrity, safety, and honor will result to our whole country.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S OPPORTUNITY.

Louis Napoleon has apparently safely turned an ugly corner, the dangers of which, however, will undoubtedly reappear should the Prussian encroachments continue for his crime. The permission for the return of Rochefort, and the wisdom of the new Ministry in allowing Prince Rochau and other Republicans access to some home, show that the Government intends a more liberal policy; while the remark of the new Minister of Justice, M. Ollivier, that the Government has been moderation and law, but that it will be power also if forced to it by the irreconcilables, shows that it means to conciliate the liberal movement, and not to abandon the country to anarchy. That unquestionably must have been the result of any serious conflict now had the Government been overpowered. Henri Rochefort has a sharp and reckless pen. He is a cogent and effective local discomfort of the France, but he is not a sagacious and controlling brain. When the revolution of 1848 took place he was a mere boy, and all intelligent people with recognized leaders which immediately assumed control of affairs. But the new régime in Europe is not of course disturbed the opposition. Even Jules Favre evidently prefers peaceful remedies and trusts the possibility of the law. Thiers, therefore, is plain that the Government proposes to shield the murderer, it would have been criminal folly in the Parisians to precipitate an insurrection.

There is no reason to suppose that the new experiment in France will not be fairly tried; and, as we have before said, the fault in it only is that the people are not likely to believe it. The new régime is the grant of a man who has not implicit confidence to believe he will. But he is, nevertheless, shrewd enough to see that the only chance for his son's succession lies in a plain change in the system of personal government. The removal of Haussmann against the Emperor's known wish, the return of the republican exiles and the greater freedom of the press, are signs that French liberals can appreciate of Louis Napoleon's willingness to make actual concession. And if, as from all the homicide by the Prince Pierre, the course of justice is allowed to have its way, as in the case of Troppmann, a serious evasion of any kind, France will feel more assured that a Government which is strictly just toward a citizen of the reigning family is a Government that can be trusted. The event gives Louis Napoleon and M. Ollivier an immense opportunity, and a temporary success for a long time may be inferred from their use of it.

NOTES.

We are glad to know that the President is friendly to the St. Thomas treaty, and it will be very pleasant to learn that the Senate will be willing to embarrass, by rejecting it, one of the most faithful Democratic allies. The present minority in Denmark is one of the ablest that the country has had; but it considers its honor so involved in the ratification of the treaty to which it has acted at the persistent and earnest request of the United States, that it will not consent to the negotiation fail. There is no part of the contemplated extension of the territory of this country which can be regarded with so much satisfaction as St. Thomas.

If is very pleasant to observe that the new University lectures, at Harvard College, which include not the progressive and elder spirit it recent in each department, are open to women as to men: while the University of Michigan opens all its doors equally, and the St. Louis Law School has already done. Meanwhile the friends of Women Suffrage in the West and in the state as clear from entangling alliances with other reforms and the endless host of individual whims and vagaries which would pursue it with the strangeness of sun that marks the movement in England, and the experience and other

A NEGRO HOLIDAY IN HAVANA.

THE celebration of Three Holy Kings' Day by the negroes of Havana is something which gives the beholder the feeling of being transported beyond all limits of civilization, into the country of gorilla and monkeys of all descriptions. A stranger arriving in that city on the 6th of January, the day set apart for the observance of this strange festival, would be struck with horror and wonder at the sights presented to his eye. We heard once of two gentlemen, Englishmen, and possessors of all the delicate sensibilities of that nation, who were so unfortunate as to land in Havana when these festivities were at their height. On going into the street from the door of the Custom-house they were immediately surrounded by a fantastically-dressed crowd of men and women, who, with every species of wild yells and grotesque attitudes, sought to arrest the progress of the strangers. One English friends, far from appreciating the fun, were frightened quite out of their wits, and after many and vain endeavors to escape from their persecutors and proceed quietly to their hotel, they at last, with a desperate effort, broke through the crowd, and rushing in the direction of the dock where they had so recently landed, were seen no more.

Our mind had been prepared for all kinds of hideous uproar; and so, when on the early morning we sauntered to the Cathedral Square, our only astonishment consisted in finding the place so quiet and peaceful. The front of the old cathedral was positively golden in the clear, tropical morning sunlight, and the many clusters of trailing vines, which winds have planted on every broken corner of rock where earth could hold, were waving gently back and forth, throwing trembling shadows on the crumbling yellow stone. There was but little life in the square. A few heavy-faced Spanish peasants were lounging about, and now and then a train of little donkeys waddled along under the immense burden of green fodder which allows only the four clumsy feet and funny little nose of the animal to be visible. Generally four or five donkeys are tied in a string, and driven ahead by a merciless Chinaman, who punches the little things with a sharp stick whenever they show an inclination to stop for breath. From a little distance they look like animated haycocks jogging through the street.

AN INTERESTING PAIR.

But suddenly the bell-ringer stepped under the bell in the cathedral tower, and seizing the small rope attached to the top, commenced ringing with all his might. Was the man deaf when he accepted the position under the big bell, or has he become so since? for deaf he must be to stand quiet and immovable, his head actually within the thing which rouses half the city with its loud vibrations. Who will deny him to be the greatest living disciple of Poe? Does he not "dwell up in the steeple, all alone?" And are not

"The jangling
And the wrangling
Of the bells,
Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells," forever ringing through his head? We always supposed Poe to have written that poem within the walls of La Bella Ferrara, but after sleeping —or, more fully speaking, trying to sleep—through the Christmas and New-Year's holidays directly under the shadow of this cathedral, with its big bells and little bells, its bells for mass and bells for vespers, to say nothing of the old English clock in the left tower—which, as it only rings four times an hour, may be classed as very quiet and respectable—we have been forced to change our opinion, and now believe it was written in no spot of the earth but Havana. It is true there are no "sledges with the bells" here; but that was probably a sweet reminiscence of the writer's far-off home.

As the bells rang the morning mass was concluded, and the crowd poured out of the church, the negroes scattering rapidly in all directions to prepare for the festivities of the day, and the white portion of the congregation—which was by far the smallest—standing about the door to watch the old bishop pass out to his carriage.

But the sound of loud outcries in the distance gave notice that the day's carnival had begun, and soon a wild and singular-appearing party came round the corner into the square. Four negroes, dressed in bright green, and ornamented from head to foot with streamers of every color, were carrying between them a large model of a ship gayly decked out with ribbons. Behind followed two others, dressed in suits made of gunny-bag fringed round the ankles. A flaming red scarf was tied over the shoulder. These fellows carried immense tin rattles, which they swung over their heads continually. In front of the most grotesque party walked a heavy black personage in very quiet citizen's clothing. This was the treasurer of the company; and while the others yelled and shouted and danced, he took his hat from his woolly head and held it toward us for money. It is useless to refuse giving.—Wherever an unfortunate mortal with a white skin is to be seen, there the negroes crowd; and no door so slightly ajar, no window so shaded, no balcony so high as to escape their sharp eye. They congregate, howling and shrieking and dancing, until something is thrown out. A very small silver coin contents them, and they curtains their noisy march. And now in all directions might be heard sounds such as seldom reach the ears of any but a LIVINGSTONE or DU CHAILLU, and the square was soon filled by a motley mixture of Congo, Mandingo, and other African tribes. These tribes cling together with great tenacity, and each forms a regular society, with its chosen leader, who acts as spokesman on all important occasions. They preserve many of their wild tastes, and indulge in many dances, chants, and curious ceremonies which were originally practiced in their native land.

THE FRIGHTENED ENGLISHMAN.

THE GRAND PROCESSION.

GROUP OF MASQUERADERS.

The festival costume of these creatures can scarcely be described. No two were alike, but each seemed vying with the other to produce effects the most grotesque and ridiculous. Many were dressed in gunny-bagging trimmed in every possible fashion. One was stuck all over with playing-cards, another appeared striped with all kinds of brilliant colors. Many costumes were almost picturesque, being composed of brilliant scarfs and blankets twisted about the figure in true savage fashion. A principal ornamentation was cocks' feathers. These were used as head-dresses in some instances, or placed in huge tufts upon the shoulders, wrists, and ankles. Nearly all the rioters carried mock weapons, ranging from an immense wooden sword to a club of sugar-cane.

This crowd was divided up into parties composed of from six to twenty persons, generally half women, each party having its flag-bearer, treasurer, and head musician. The music was generally performed on an African war-drum—a curious hollow piece of wood, about three feet long, with a goat-skin stretched tightly across one end, the drum-stick being the fist palms of the drummer. One party of Congos gathered directly under the balcony where we had taken refuge, and gathering about the drummer, who was doing his best to deafen every body in the neighborhood, they commenced a curious dance, in which every muscle of the body was brought into play. Did our teachers of gymnastics take lessons of the Congos? We strongly suspect so, for no head more civilized could have invented all the sensible twistings and squirmings that the modern school-boy is put through under their direction.

The singing of these negroes was one of the most curious parts of the performance, if such odd, monotonous shouting could be dignified by that name. The leader would strike up a sound —not a tune—and all the party would fall in at the last word of each line, repeating it over and over until they seemed to be mere echoes of themselves. The only really remarkable thing about this singing was the time, and that was maintained with so much precision that any New York orchestra leader would have bolted over with envy to hear it.

The women were attired in more civilized costumes than the men; and in many a party, where the men were dressed like savages in all sorts of gay old rags, the women were quite passable in missus's cast-off finery, and their heads neatly dressed with green wreaths. Nothing, indeed, is more remarkable than the taste with which the negro women of this city dress, unless it be the grace and perfect elegance of their carriage, as they sweep proudly through the narrow streets of the city.

The feces of some of the wildest masqueraders reminded one forcibly of various animals of BARNUM memory—ape or gorilla, who shall say?

THE TIN-PAIL DRUMMER.

One curious customer, who marched all alone, was dressed in a costume which must have been imported direct from "Africa's sunny fountain" for this special purpose. It consisted of short striped breeches, high moccasins, of so many colors that it would be impossible to tell the fabric from which they were sewn, a pink gauze shirt, the color considerably darkened by the black skin underneath, and on the head a huge waving bunch of something like tow. This fantastically attired individual carried a bent and rusty tin pail, from which, with an immense club, he brought forth such an uproar that we expected to see the rabbet to COLUMBUS on the wall of the cathedral altar start from its position, and the dry bones behind it spring forth. As we looked closer at him, he rolled up his eyes, and opened his mouth with wild shrieks for money, all the while striking the tin pail and dancing wildly. The whites of his eyes, and two rows of glazing teeth, with the huge red opening between them, together with the cold-blackness of his face, formed a picture horrible to civilized mortals. Was this creature man or baboon? If man, where, oh! where was the human element to be sought?

Apart from this festive throng there appeared to be an upper-crust of the black element, the movements of which were very amusing to watch. The men all in holiday attire—white pants and black coat, when they could get one—walked about twirling little canes, and wasting only a very superior air the mad pranks of their more humble brethren. The women of the middle class sailed majestically around, carrying their long muslin trains and tossing their heads with a grace and real beauty of motion that many a Broadway belle might envy.

As the day wore on toward night the excitement grew wilder, and even the upper-crust found it very hard to keep their step down to an indifferent time, and whenever the drum and hoarse little pipe were heard, the heel and toe would keep time in spite of the possessor.

After nightfall the streets became clear, and all the mad rout betook themselves to their ball-rooms, where, with dance and shriek and yells, they passed away what remained of the Day of the Three Holy Kings.

THE THUGS OF INDIA.

THIS ferocious sect, now nearly exterminated by the British authorities, is by some supposed to have originated with Mahommedan banditti in India, though it afterward became more a Hindoo than a Mohammedan practice. They were once found in all parts of India, and their atrocious deeds made them the terror of the country. They were worshipers of the goddess Kali, the divinity who presided over sensual indulgences and death, and followed their cruel practices from religious motives rather than for the gratification of malice or desire for blood. The members of the sect belong to all the different castes, and each has its own department in the service. The gangs were from 30 to 300 in number, divided into different classes under a leader and a teacher. These classes were: 1. The spies, who were learners or apprentices; 2. Stranglers; 3. Entrappers, who were sometimes women; 4. Grave-diggers. They usually assumed the dress of merchants or pilgrims, and often craved the protection of those whom they intended to destroy. Their usual instrument of death was the handkerchief, or rumal, with which, by a dextrous movement, they strangled their victim. The spies having informed their associates in regard to their intended victims, the members of the gang traveled to the spot in such a manner as to be near each other, and the entrappers, by artful management, would endeavor to attract the doomed persons to some secluded place where the strranglers could dispatch them. After stripping the bodies of every thing, the grave-diggers buried them with such precautions as were necessary to prevent discovery. The plunder was divided—one-third to the widows and orphans of the sect, one-third to the goddess Kali, and the remainder among the assassins. After a murder the Thugs who had been engaged in it united in a sort of sacrament, called topassee, at which consecrated sugar was eaten. It was not their practice to kill women or old men, and Europeans were spared, from the danger of detection. The English authorities in India sought to suppress the Thugs as early as 1800; but it was not until 1835 that the gangs were effectually broken up, and their power as an organization destroyed. Between 1826 and 1835 1562 persons were condemned as Thugs, their families put under surveillance, and their children educated to virtuous habits, and taught trades by which they might obtain an honest livelihood. Many of the Thugs were, to all appearance, respectable and worthy people, and their connection with the sect was rarely suspected until it was revealed by their arrest by the authorities, or the discovery of some murder in which they had been engaged. An English officer, for twenty years a resident of India, relates that he was intimate for many years with a native merchant, supposed to be an excellent and exemplary citizen, who turned out to be a Thug chief. The number of Thugs at present in India is very small, and is constantly diminishing. Our illustration represents a group of strangiers—a ferocious-looking set of men, whom it were just as pleasant not to meet in a lonely place.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER, the new Prime Minister of France, is a comparatively young man, having been born at Marseilles in 1825. In 1847 he became a member of the Paris bar. When the Revolution broke out the following year he was sent by LEDRU ROLLIN as Government Commissioner to Marseilles. This was his introduction to public life. He was afterward appointed Prefect at Langres; but in consequence of differences with the government of LOUIS NAPOLEON, then become President, he returned to the bar, where he achieved considerable success. In 1857 he was returned as Opposition candidate for one of the circumscriptions of the capital, and spoke and voted with the other four deputies in steady resistance to the Draconian measures proposed by the government and passed by a docile Corps Législatif. For three years his speeches, as well as those of his colleagues, JULES FAVRE, ERNEST PICARD, PELLETAN, and JULES SIMON, were not allowed to be published; and not until 1860, when the debates were regularly reported in the Moniteur, were the public enabled to form a conception of his powers as a parliamentary orator. At this period OLLIVIER was a bitter irreconcilable, more from personal motives, perhaps, than public ones, for his father had been expelled and ruined by the coup d'état. This portion of his history he has himself narrated with touching simplicity and much graphic power in his book published early last year.

In 1863 he was re-elected for Paris, and soon afterward his hostility to the government became toned down. His report on trade combinations and strikes, which formed the basis of the new law on those subjects, brought him into personal communication with the Emperor, toward whom he gradually approximated, and in 1865 he was chosen—with government support, of course—as one of the members of the Council-General of Toulon. The reforms of January, that crowning of the edifice, a work which has consumed three years in repeated commencements and repeated delays, are attributed to his inspiration. His labors and efforts, in the interval, to make parliamentary government a reality, seem likely to be at length successful.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER is an impressive speaker and ready debater, and in other respects a man of much ability. Four years since he was appointed permanent professional adviser to the Pasha of Egypt with a large salary, and had to take his name off the list of the members of the bar in consequence. He was chosen by the Emperor to arbitrate in the matter of the Suez Canal. He has been twice married. His first wife, a daughter of LISZT the pianist, died a few years back; and he not long since married a young lady from Marseilles, with whom, it is stated, he received a large fortune.

A GROUP OF THUGS.

REFRAIN.

France the sex is, and fickle of fair.
So they say of it. So let it be.
But did ever the landsman's laugher chaffe
The seaman's pride in his dancing deck?
Or did ever the lehuuman, whose home is there,
In place of his own thee hand and eye,
Trust the plowman's skill, when the sea ran high,
And submit to a landsman's amputator?
No! For the seaman loves the sea,
And knows its nature.

Feeli there is on the mountain peak;
When bradling tumbls the turbulent rills.
But did ever the lowland shepherd's fear
Daunt the heart of the mountaineer?
Or did ever the hill-born hunter seek,
When the snow-drift, sweeping the mountain wide,
Fear hail and furies, for a lowland guide
To track the path of a mountain creature?
No! For the hunter loveth the hills,
And knoweth their nature.

Then to whom shall the sailor for counsel go,
Through the volume of science his bark to steer?
Or what, through the ice and the falling snow,
May guide the foot of the mountaineer?
Hath the huntsman heed of the pastoral trills
Which the shepherd pipes to his flock on the lea?
Or the seaman balk the fear that fills
The landsman's babbling prate? Not he!
For the eagle and the dolphin have their ways and wills,
Which they must learn who their lords would be
And the highlander strides and treats the hills,
As the boatman spurns and trusts the sea.

But, O my love, I am thine in vain,
If thou trustest me not! And, oh! why hast thou ta'en
Counsel not of my nature nor time
How a woman should deal with this heart of mine!
The seaman he was took from
And the landsman the hills. But thou,
Thou that hast known me, dost
Trust those that I scorn to know
For the knowledge of me.
Who have been thine own
In vain, if by thee
I be still unknown.

ENTERED according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE NINETEENTH.

CLOSE ON IT.

The object of the invasion of the library by the party in the garden appeared to be twofold.

Sir Patrick had entered the room to restore the newspaper to the place from which he had taken it. The guests, to the number of five, had followed him, to appeal in a body to Geoffrey Delamayn. Between these two apparently dissimilar motives there was a connection, not visible on the surface, which was now to assert itself.

Of the five guests, two were middle-aged gentlemen belonging to the legal profession, the division of the human family whom the hand of Nature has painted in unobtrusive neutral tint. They had absorbed the ideas of their time with such receptive capacity as they possessed; and they cared pretty much the same place in society which the chorus in an opera occupies on the stage. They echoed the general sentiment of the moment; and they gave the solo-singer time to fetch his breath.

The three remaining guests were on the right side of thirty. All profoundly versed in horseracing, in athletic sports, in pipes, beer, billiards, and betting. All profoundly ignorant of every thing else under the sun. All gentlemen by birth, and all marked as such by the stamp of a University education." They may be personally described as four reflections of Geoffrey; and they may be numerically distinguished (in the absence of all other distinction) as One, Two, and Three.

Sir Patrick laid the newspaper on the table, and placed himself in one of the comfortable arm-chairs. He was instantly assailed, in his domestic capacity, by his irrepressible sister-in-law. Lady Lundie dispatched Blanche to him with the list of her guests at the dinner.

"For uncle's approval, my dear, as head of the family."

While Sir Patrick was looking over the list, and while Arnold was making his escape to the house, at the back of her uncle's chair, One, Two, and Three—with the Chorus in attendance on them —descended in a body on Geoffrey, as the head of the room, and appealed in rapid succession to his superior authority, as follows:

"I say, Delamayn. We want You. Here is Sir Patrick running a regular Muck at us. Calls us aboriginal Britons. Talks us out of our skins, actually. Doubts if we could read, write, and cipher, if he tried us. Seems to have a sick of fellows showing their arms and legs, and eating with their fellow's hardest, and who's got three bobs of muscle across his wind, and who's got the best like of that. Says a most infernal thing of a chap. Actually says a chap likes a healthy outof-door life, and trains for rowing and running, and the rest of it, and don't see his way to steering over his books—therefore he's safe to commit all the crimes in the calendar, murder included. Now your name down in the newspaper for the Foot-Race; and said, when we asked him if he'd taken the odds, he'd lay any odds we liked against you in the cabinet. Now for the University meeting, old boy, your Degree. Nasty, that about the Degree, isn't it? The opinion of Sandon Bad taste in Sir Patrick to rake up what we never mention among ourselves—in the opinion of Number Two. Un-English to sneer at a man in that way behind his back—in the opinion of Number Three. Bring him to book, Delamayn. Your name's in the papers; he can't ride roughshod over You."

The two choral gentlemen agreed (in the minor key) with the general opinion. "Sir Patrick's views are extreme, extreme, Smith!" "I think, Jones, it's desirable to hear Mr. Delamayn on the other side."

Geoffrey looked from one to the other of his admirers with an expression on his face which was quite new to it, and said something in his manner which puzzled them all.

"You can't argue with Sir Patrick, you fellows," he said, slowly and doubtfully. "He don't know enough."

One, Two, Three, and the Chorus all answered, "Yes."

"I won't do it."

One, Two, Three, and the Chorus all asked, "Why?"

"Because," answered Geoffrey, "you're all wrong. And Sir Patrick's right."

Not astonishment only, but downright stupefaction, struck the deputation from the garden speechless.

Without saving a word more to any of the persons standing by him, Geoffrey walked straight up to Sir Patrick's arm-chair, and personally addressed him. The satellites followed, and listened (as well they might) in silence.

"You will lay any odds, Sir Patrick, Mr. Delamayn against the long my Degree? You're quite right. I don't know the Degree. I am in doubt whether I, or any of those fellows behind me, could read, write, and cipher, if you put us to the trial us. You're right again—we couldn't. You say you don't Know why men like Me, and men like Them, may be capable of rowing and running, and the like of that, and end in committing all the crimes in the calendar, murder included. Well! you may be right again there. Who's to know what may happen to him? or what he may not end in doing? Nobody can tell, but he's the other, or it may be Me. How do I know? and how do you?" He looked round him, as he said it, standing thunder-struck behind him. "If you want to know what I think, there it is for you, in plain words."

There was something, not only in the shamefulness of the declaration itself, but in the fierce pleasure that the speaker found in making it, which struck the circle of listeners, Sir Patrick included, as monstrous and new.

In the midst of the silence a sixth guest appeared on the lawn, and stepped into the library—a silent, reserved, unassuming man, whom who had arrived the day before on a visit to Geoffrey, and who was well known to the rest, out of London, as one of the first consulting surgeons of his time.

"A discussion going on?" he asked. "Am I in the way?"

"There's no discussion—we are all agreed," cried Geoffrey, answering boisterously for the rest. "The more the merrier, Sir!"

After a glance round, the surgeon suddenly checked himself on the point of advancing to the inner end of the room, and remained standing at the window.

"I beg your pardon," said Sir Patrick, addressing himself to Geoffrey with a strong dignity which was quite new in Arnold's experience of him. "We are not all agreed. I decline, Mr. Delamayn, to allow you to commit what is only such an expression of feeling on your part as we have just heard. Whatever opinion you have formed, one no alternative but to meet your statement of what you suppose me to have said by my statement of what I did say. It is the duty to my faith if the discussion in the garden is revived before another audience, on this occasion."

He looked as he spoke to Arnold and Blanche, and from them to the surgeon standing at the window.

The surgeon found an occupation for himself which suggested to him among the rest of the guests. Keeping his own face in shadow, he was studying Geoffrey's face, in the full flood of light from the window—a face of expression which must have been generally remarked, if all eyes had not been turned toward Sir Patrick at the time.

It was not an easy face to investigate at that moment.

While Sir Patrick had been speaking Geoffrey had seated himself near the window, doggedly impenetrable to the meaning of what he was the object. In his impatience to consult the one authority competent to decide the question of Arnold's position toward Anne, he had sided with Sir Patrick, as a means of ridding himself of the unwelcome presence of his opponent; he had defeated his own purpose, thanks to his own hereditary brutality of temper. He had lost the pursuit of it. Whether he was now discouraged under these circumstances, or whether he was simply repelled by the tone in which the line came, it was impossible, judging by outward appearances, to say. While he sat sullenly across the corners of his mouth, with a stolid indifference staring dull in his eyes, there he sat, a man apparently with no other obstinate resistance against all temptation to engage in the conflict of opinions than the conflict of opinions.

Sir Patrick took up the newspaper which he had brought in from the garden, and looked once more to see if the surgeon was attending to him.

No! The surgeon's attention was absorbed in his own subject. There he was in the same position, with his mind still hard at work on something in Geoffrey which at once interested and puzzled it! "That man," he was thinking to himself, "has come here this morning after spending Sunday in London! Does any ordinary fatigue explain what I see in his face? No!"

"Our little discussion in the garden," resumed Sir Patrick, answering Blanche's inquiring look as she bent over him, "began, my dear, in a paragraph here announcing Mr. Delamayn's forthcoming appearance in a foot-race in the neighborhood of London. I hold very unpopular opinions as to the athletic displays which are so much the fashion in England just now. And it is possible that I may have expressed those opinions a little too strongly in the heat of discussion, to gentlemen who are opposed to me—I don't doubt, conscientiously opposed—on this question."

The two choral gentlemen rose from One, Two, and Three, in return for the little compliment which they had received, and sank back into sleep about rowing and running ending in the Old Bailey and the gallows? You said that, Sir—you know you did."

The two choral gentlemen looked at each other, and agreed with the prevalent sentiment. "It came to that, I think, Smith." "Yes, Jones, it certainly came to that."

The only person who still cared nothing about it were Geoffrey and the surgeon. There sat the first, stolidly neutral—indifferent alike to the attack and the defense. There stood the second, pursuing his investigation — with the growing interest in it of a man who was beginning to see his way to the end.

"Hear my defense, gentlemen," continued Sir Patrick, "before you condemn me." "You belong, remember, to a nation which especially claims to practice what it can't preach. I must also remind you of what I said in the garden. I started with a concession. I admitted—as every man with the smallest sense must admit—that a man will, in the great majority of cases, be all the better for the healthy out-of-door exercise which bines physical exercise along with it. The whole question between the two is a question of proportion. The question of the predominant of the present time is that the present time doesn't see it. Popular opinion, as I argued seems to me to be, not only getting to consider the cultivation of the muscles as of equal importance with the cultivation of the mind, but to be actually attending—in practice, if not in theory to the absurd and dangerous length of putting bodily training in the first place of importance, and mental training in the second. To take a case in point: I never discover any enthusiasm in the nation any thing like so genuine and any thing like so general as the enthusiasm excited by your University boat-race. Again: I see this Athletic Education of yours made a matter of public celebration in schools and colleges; and I ask any unprejudiced witness to tell me which excites most popular enthusiasm, and which gets the most prominent place in the public journals—the exhibition, indoors (on Prize -day), of what the boys can do with their minds; or the exhibition, out of doors (on Sports-day), of what the boys can do with their bodies? You know perfectly well which performance excites the loudest cheers, which occupies the prominent place in the newspapers, and which, as a necessary consequence, attracts the most serious notice on the here of the day."

Another murmur from One, Two, and Three. "We have nothing to say to that, Sir; have it all your own way, so far."

Another murmur of agreement with the prevalent opinion between Smith and Jones.

"Very good," resumed Sir Patrick. "I come to all of one mind as to which the way the public feeling sets. If it is a feeling to be respected and encouraged, I am in the wrong and advantage which has resulted from it. Where is the influence of this vast excitement of manly enthusiasm on the serious concerns of life? and how has it improved the character of the people at large? Why, sir, we individually realize more than we ever were to sacrifice our own little private interests to the public good." Are we dealing with the serious social questions of our time in a conspicuously determined, downright, and definite way? Are we dealing with a visibly and indisputably purer people in our code of commercial morals? Is there a healthier and higher tone in the public amusements which habitually reflect in all countries the public taste? Prove to have no influence whatever to these questions which rest on solid proof, and I'll accept the present mania for athletic sports as something better than the wreck of our insular beneficialness and our insular barbarity in a new form."

"Question of honor!" in general cry, from One, Two, and Three.

"Question! question!" in meek reverberation, from Smith and Jones.

"That is the question," rejoined Sir Patrick. "You admit the existence of the public feeling: and I ask, what good does it do?"

"What harm does it do?" from One, Two, and Three.

"Hear! hear!" from Smith and Jones.

"That's a fair challenge," replied Sir Patrick, "I am bound to answer you on that new ground. I won't point, gentlemen, by way of answer, to the comparative which I am now carrying on our national manners, or to the deterioration which appears to me to be spreading more and more widely in our national tastes. I may fill you with perfect truth that I am too old a man to be a fair judge of manners and tastes which have got beyond my standards. We will try the issue, as it now stands between us, on its abstract merits only. I assert that a state of public feeling which does practically place physical training, in its estimation, above mental and moral training, is a positively bad and dangerous state of feeling in this, that it encourages the inbred reluctances in humanity to submit to the demands which moral and mental cultivation must inevitably make on all of us. While we, as a body, naturally most ready to do—to try how high I can jump? or to try how much I can learn? Which training comes easiest to me as a young man? The training which teaches me to handle an oar? or the training which teaches me to return good for evil, and to love my neighbor as myself? Of those two experiments, of those two trainings, which ought society in England to meet with the warmest encouragement? And which does society in England practically encourage, as a matter of fact?"

"What did you say yourself just now?" from One, Two, and Three.

"Remarkably well put!" from Smith and Jones.

"I said," admitted Sir Patrick, "that a man will go all the better for health and for healthy physical exercise. And I say that again—provided the physical exercise be restrained within its limits. But when public feeling enters into the question, and directly exalts the bodily exercises above the books—then I say public feeling is in a dangerous extreme. The bodily exercises, in that case, will be uppermost in the youth's thoughts, will have the strongest hold on his interest, will take the lion's share of his time, and will, by these means—barring the few surely exceptional instances—slowly and surely end in leaving him, to all good moral and mental purpose, certainly an uncultivated, and, possibly, a dangerous man."

A cry from the camp of the adversaries: "He's got to it at last! A man who leads an out-of-door life, and uses the strength that God has given to him. The man in the merchant service does the same. Both are an honor to their country. A shameful accusation—and see the result! Look at the Map of Crime, and you will find the most hideous offenses in the calendar, committed—not in the towns, where the average man doesn't lead an out-of-door life, and where he has no opportunity, but is, as a rule, comparatively cultivated—not in the towns, but in the agricultural districts. As to the Public-school system, and the Royal Navy catches and cultivates him—ask Mr. Reade's opinion of it. Ask the officers in the merchant navy, what sort of specimen of the moral influence of out-of-door life and muscular cultivation is."

"In nine cases out of ten," said Arnold, "he is a idle and vicious a ruffian as walks the earth."

Another cry from the Opposition: "Are we agricultural farmers? Are we sailors in the merchant service?"

A smart reverberation from the human echoes: "Question! Sir Patrick's question! Yoass! am I a farmer?"

"If you let us not be personal, gentlemen," said Sir Patrick, "I am speaking generally; and I can only meet extreme objections by pushing my argument to the extreme limits. I believe that which I advanced just now. A man may be well-born, well-bred, well-educated, and, finally, if he is an uncultivated man, he is (in spite of all those advantages) a man with special capacities for crime. That is my deliberate belief. Don't mistake me! I am far from saying that the present vague and exclusively muscular accomplishments must lead inevitably downward to the lowest deep of depravity. Fortunately for society, the natural depravity is more or less certainly the result, in the first instance, of special temptation. The ordinary mass of us, think God, pass through life without being exposed to other than ordinary temptations. Thousands of us, gentlemen, indeed, attached to the healthy pursuits of the present time, will get through existence and leave no consequences to themselves than a coarse tone of mind and manners, and a lamentable incapability of feeling any of the higher and gentler influences of civilization, and purify the lives of more cultivated men. But take the other case (which may occur to any body), the case of a special temptation trying a modern young man of your prosperous class and of your healthy habits. Don't permit mayn to honor with his attention what I have now to say, because it refers to the opinion which I did refer to just now—to the opinion which is the opinion which he affects to agree with, and which I never advanced.

Geoffrey's indifference showed no signs of giving way. "Go on!" he said—and still sat looking straight before him, with his hands idle, when noticed nothing, and expressed nothing.

"Take the case," resumed Sir Patrick, "of a young gentleman in which we have now in view, pursued Sir Patrick—" the case of an average young gentleman of our time, blest with every advantage that the world can bestow on him. Let this man be tried by a temptation which naturally calls into action, in his own interests, the savage instincts latent in humanity—the instincts of self-seeking and self-help. Let him, as we say, be tempted, by the admirable capacity and endurance in other physical exercises which he has attained, by a conspicuous cultivation in this kind that has excluded any similarly strenuous cultivation in other kinds —wi these physical attainments help him to win a purely moral victory over his own selfishness and his own cruelty? They won't even help him to see that it is selfishness, and that it is cruelty. The essential principle of his rowing and racing (a harmless principle enough, if you can be sure of applying it to rowing and racing only) has taught him to take every advantage of another man that his superior strength and superior cunning can suggest. These has been nothing in his training to soften the barbarous hardness in his heart, and to enlighten the barbarous darkness in his mind. Temptation finds this man defenseless, when temptation passes his way. I don't care who he is, or how high he stands accidentally in the social scale—he is, to all moral intents and purposes, an animal, and nothing more. In my happiness stands in his way—and if he can do it with impunity to himself—he will trample down my happiness. If my life happens to be a mere obstacle he encounters—and if he can do it with impunity to himself—he will trample down my life. Not, Mr. Delamayn, in the character of a victim to irresistible fatality, or to blind chance; but in the character of a man who has chosen, of seed, and reaps the harvest. That, Sir, is the case which I put as an extreme case only, when that discussion began. And in an extreme case only—but in a perfectly possible case, at the same time—I restate it now.

Before the advocates of the other side of the question could open their lips to reply, Geoffrey suddenly flung off his indifference, and started to his feet.

"Stop!" he cried, threatening the others, in his fierce impatience to answer for himself, with his clenched fist.

"You are a general silence.

Geoffrey turned and looked at Sir Patrick, as if Sir Patrick had personally misused him.

"Who is this anonymous man, who finds his way to his own ends, and picnes nobody and sticks at nothing?" he asked. "Give him a name!"

"I am quoting an example," said Sir Patrick.

"I am not attacking a man."

"What right have you," cried Geoffrey—utterly forgetful, in his strange excitement, of what had seized on him, of the interest that he had in controlling himself before Sir Patrick—"what right have you to pick out an example of a young man who is an infernal scoundrel—when it's quite as likely that a young man may be a good fellow: ay! and a better fellow, if you come to that, than ever stood in your shoes!"

"If the case is quite as likely to occur as the other (which I readily admit)," answered Sir Patrick, "I have surely a right to choose the case I please for illustration. . . . (Wait, Mr. Delamayn! These are the last words I have to say, and I mean to have them.) I have chosen for example—not of a specially depraved man, as you erroneously suppose—but of an average man, with his average share of the moral, and, alas, dangerous qualities, which are part and parcel of unreformed human nature. Experience religion tells you, and as you may see for yourself, if you choose to look at your antagonist fellow-creatures any where. I suppose that man to be faced by a temptation to wickedness, out of the common: and I shall see what two of my allies—completely the moral and mental neglect of himself, which the present material tone of public feeling in England has tacitly encouraged, leave him at the mercy of all the worst instincts in his nature, and how surely, under those conditions, he must go down (or rise, as he is) step by step, from the lowest vagabond in the streets goes down under his special temptation, from the beginning in ignorance to the end in crime. If you deny my right to take such an example as that, in illustration of the views I advocate, if you must either deny that a special temptation to wicked-ness can exist in the case of any single gentleman: or you must assert that gentlemen who are naturally superior to all temptation are the only gentlemen who devote themselves to athletic exercises, there is my defense. In stating my case, I have spoken out of my own sincere respect for the interests of virtue and of learning: out of my own sincere admiration for those young men among us who are meeting the corruption of barbarism about them. In their future is the future hope of England. I have done."

Angrily ready with a violent personal reply, Geoffrey found himself checked, as his turn, by another person with something to say—and with a resolution to say it at that particular moment.

For some little time past the surgeon had discontinued his steady investigation of Geoffrey's face, and had given all his attention to the discussion, with the air of a man whose self-imposed task had come to an end. As the last sentence fell from the last speaker's lips, he approached so quickly and so skillfully between Geoffrey and Sir Patrick, that Geoffrey himself was taken by surprise.

There is something still wanting to make Sir Patrick's statement of the case complete, he said. "I think I can supply it, from the results of my own professional experience. Before I say what I have to say, Mr. Delamayn will perhaps excuse me, if I venture on giving him a caution to control himself."

"Are you going to make a dead set at me, too?" inquired Geoffrey.

"I am recommending you to keep your temper—nothing more. There are plenty of men who can fly into a passion without doing themselves any particular harm. You are not one of them."

"What do you mean?"

"I don't think the state of your health, Mr. Delamayn, is quite as satisfactory as you may be disposed to consider it yourself."

Geoffrey turned to his admirers and adherents with a roar of derisive laughter. The admirers and adherents all echoed him together. Arnold and Blanche smiled at each other. Eyre Sir Patrick looked as if he could hardly credit the evidence of his own ears. There stood the modern Hercules, self-vindicated as a Hercules, to the all eyes that looked at him. And there, opposite, stood a man whom he could have killed with one blow of his fist, biting, in a serious fit of temper, that he was not in perfect health!

"You are a rare fellow!" said Geoffrey, half in jest and half in anger. "What's the matter with me?"

"I have undertaken to give you," what I believe to be, a necessary caution," answered the surgeon, "I am not prepared to say that what I think is the matter with you. That may be a question for consideration some little time hence. In the mean while, I must refer to part my impression about you to the test. Have you any objection to answer a question or two, on a point of particular importance relating to yourself?"

"Let's hear the question first."

"I have noticed something in your behavior while Sir Patrick was speaking. You are much interested in opposing his views as any of those gentlemen who spoke. I can understand your sitting in silence, and leaving it entirely to the others to put the case on your side —until Sir Patrick said something which happened to irritate you. Had you, all the time before that, no strong reply in your own mind?"

"I had as good answers in my mind as any that have been made here to-day."

"And yet you didn't give them?"

"No; I didn't give them."

"Perhaps it was enough you knew your objections to be good ones—that it was hardly worth while to take the trouble of putting them into words? In short, you felt sure of having the better of you, rather than make the effort of answering for yourself?"

Geoffrey looked at his medical adviser with a sudden curiosity and a sudden distrust.

"I say," he asked, "do you come to know what's going on in my mind—without my telling you?"

"It is my business to find out what is going on in people's bodies—and to do that it is sometimes necessary to find out a little of what is going on in their minds. If I have rightly interpreted what was going on in your mind, there is no need for me to press my question. You have answered it already."

He turned to Sir Patrick next.

"There is a side to this subject," he said, "which you have not touched on yet. There is a physical objection to encouraging the race for muscular exercises of all sorts, which is quite as strong, in its way, as the Moral objection. You have stated the consequences as they may affect the mind. I can state the consequences as they do affect the body."

"From your own experience?"

"From my own experience. I can tell you, as a medical man, that a proportion, and not by any means a small one, of the young men who are now publicly trained to the severest athletic tests of their strength and endurance, are taking that course to the serious and permanent injury of their constitutions. They are, in the strictest rowing matches, foot-races, and other exhibitions of that sort, now nothing but successful results of muscular training. Fathers and mothers at home see the failures. There are households in this neighborhood which, to my own knowledge, Sir Patrick, by more than ones and twos—at which there are young men who have to thank the strain laid on their constitutions by the popular physical displays of the present time, for being broken down, and invalided for the rest of their lives."

"Do you hear that?" said Sir Patrick, looking at Geoffrey.

Geoffrey carelessly nodded his head. His irritation had passed away, and left him in a state of indifference had got possession of him again. He had resumed his chair—he sat, with outstretched legs, examining the pattern on the carpet.

"What does it matter to Me?" was the sentiment expressed all over him, from head to foot.

The surgeon went on.

"If one has a remedy for this sad state of things," he said, "as long as the public feeling remains what the public feeling is now, a long healthy-looking young man, with a superb muscular development, longs (naturally enough) to distinguish himself. He enters for the athletic contests in his college, or elsewhere, take to him in hand (naturally enough again) as the strength of outward appearances. And whether or they have been right or wrong in choosing a man in sound health to make the first experiment has been tried, and the mischief has been, in many cases, irretrievably done. How many of them are ruined, I cannot guess: physiological truth, that the muscular power of a man is no fair criterion of the vital power of the heart, lungs, and brain. Even if they did know this—even if they could be induced to believe it—would be in the last degree doubtful, in most cases, whether any previous examination would result in any discovery of the real fitness of the man to undergo the stress of muscular exercise laid on him. Apply to any life insurance office; and they will tell you, as the result of their own professional observation, that I am, in no sense, overstating this serious evil, or exaggerating the deplorable and dangerous consequences to which it leads. I have a patient at this moment, who is a young man of twenty, and who possesses one of the finest muscular developments I ever saw in my life. . . . If you can but consulted me, before he followed the example of the other young men about him, I can not honestly say that I could have foreseen the results. As things are, sitter going through a certain amount of muscular training, after performing a certain number of muscular feats, he suddenly fainted one day, to the astonishment of his family and friends. I was called in, and I have watched the case since. He will probably live, but he will never recover. I am obliged to take him about with this youth of twenty which I should take with an old man of eighty. He is fag enough, muscular enough to sit to a painter as a model for Samson—and only last week I saw him sweep away like a young girl, in his mother's carriage."

"Name!" cried Geoffrey's admirers, still fighting the battle on their side, in the absence of any encouragement from Geoffrey himself.

"I am not in the habit of mentioning my patients' names," said the surgeon. "But if you insist on my producing an example of a man broken by athletic exercises, I can do it."

"Do it! Who is he?"

"You all know him perfectly well."

"Is he in the doctor's hands?"

"Not yet."

"Where is he?"

"There!"

In a pause of breathless silence—with the eyes of every person in the room eagerly fastened on him—the surgeon lifted his hand and pointed to Geoffrey Delamayn.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

MR. HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, of Philadelphia, proposes a new variorum edition of Shakspeare. The text will be that of the Cambridge editors, and to the text will be added the notes of all the other variorum editors of Singer, Knight, Campbell, Cornwall, Collier, Verplanck, Halliwell, Bulmer, Dyce, Delius, Hunter, Dyce, White, Chambers, Halliwell, Clark, and Staunton. The notes of these editors will be preceded by all the notes of the Variorum of 1821 that have been retained; and English, French, and German criticism will be represented by selected notations from Douce, Nares, Hunter, Hazlitt, Coleridge, Mrs. Jameson, Lloyd, Gervinus, Hallam, Guizot, Philpot, Milford, Hartley Coleridge, Craik, Massey, Beaconsfield, Knight, Hudson, Kreyssig, Fraser, Rümelin, Gervinus, Delius, Ulrici, Kreysig, Rötscher, Monnerstein, Chatenbriand, Villemain, Marc-Girardin, Guizot, Lacroix, Mezières, Taine, Hugo, and many others. The first volume, containing "Romeo and Juliet," is already in the hands of the Lippincotts. The price will be ten dollars, and the work will be thoroughly and admirably done.

The Long Island Historical Society has just published, in the second volume of its "Memoirs," a document of great interest, containing accounts of the battle of Long Island, including the military events immediately preceding, and the numerous events subsequent upon the defeat of the patriot army. It is compiled by Mr. Thomas W. Field, who has evinced considerable industry and discrimination in the handling of his work, and skill in arranging it into a succinct and readably interesting narrative. The many of the incidents of our late war, those of the Revolution and the last war, will be found highly interesting and valuable, their importance is not to be measured by the number of men engaged, or to the length of the field of battle which extends. For the results. Viewed in this light, the battle of Long Island was one of the most important of the whole war. Mr. Field has made his learned and useful society under whose auspices this valuable work was published, to receive the thanks, service of old, books, pamphlets, newspapers, diaries, and other documents, bearing of information, all these details of the event. The volume is of special interest, of course, to Long Islanders: but all students of American history will find it a valuable acquisition. The volume is elegantly printed, and contains a fine portrait of Washington. It is illustrated with a photo-lithographic fac-simile of an original map of the battle-ground drawn by a Hessian officer who was engaged in the fight.

It is announced that P. Konewka is about to give to the world another collection of his original designs in the difficult art of silhouette drawing, in a work entitled "Shakspeare's Sommer Nacht's Traum." We have seen his admirable designs to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," published in 1868 in Germany by Robert Brothers, Boston, will look for the new volume with eager interest. Konewka is the first artist who has ever succeeded in causing the shadow to be ranked as works of art, as he is, we believe, alone in the attempt to make the shadow picturesque, to make these shadow-pictures interpreters of poetic thought and feeling. In the hands of Konewka, who is the more admirable—the grace, lightness, and beauty with which he gives his figures, whether they are those of sylphs and elves or the more solid forms of men, or the expression of character and feeling which he throws into them. Even the shadow of a real Puck, thrown on the wall by the sun, has not half the grotesque humor and mischievous malice of the unreal Titania more gracefully. We have seen the shadow of a Faust, a Mephistopheles, and a Mephistopheles in which we should recognize our ideal of each of these characters.

The winter of New York has been mild enough, but it does not therefore follow that it is mild every where. The Boston Post says that it has been very severe. If any one doubts it, the following fact (?) must be convincing: An ancient young lady of that city, who was dressing for church a short time ago while drinking a glass of water, by a piece of ice sticking in her throat, became very insensible. A council of eminent physicians decided that nothing could be done to remove the obstruction but amputation.

Connecticut is going to surprise the world, and especially all her sister States. She proposes to have a universal system of public schools, requiring divorces until they have been married at least two weeks!

In the annual report of the Metropolitan Board of Health for 1869, it is stated that, under an ordinance passed about a year ago, establishing certain tests for kerosene oil, upward of four hundred retail dealers of adulterated kerosene oil have been brought into the courts of New York and Brooklyn. More than twelve months ago an investigation was made respecting the explosive grade of kerosene then held in common use in New York city. Seventy-nine specimens of kerosene were collected from the principal retail grocery dealers, and submitted to the proper analysis and tests. Out of the number seventy-eight samples were found unsafe. The dangerous ingredients were found to be benzine, gasoline, and naphtha. This result of the analysis plainly revealed the cause of so many serious accidents from the explosion of burning fluids. The ordinance passed made it necessary that kerosene or other burning fluids should not take fire or burn at a temperature below 110° Fahrenheit, and that they should not evolve an explosive vapor below 100° Fahrenheit. During the past year there has been a gradual but marked improvement in the quality of the oils offered for sale.

Outlyingland is the latest colored word, whatever it may mean, and is appropriately given to the exchange "a four-story polyrhythm with a French roof."

It does not pay to eat a fashion so odd that nobody can understand it. Some very fashionable ladies in New Orleans have a yellow ribbon on their neckbands. New-Year's Day, as an indication that they would receive calls. The calls didn't come, and it was afterward found that the ribbon had been considered a sign of small-pox.

The alarming increase of consumption in the vicinity of New York has induced a number of individuals prominent to establish a "Home for Consumptives," where such relief as is possible may be afforded to those suffering with this disease. For the present a building has been secured at Tremont, Westchester County, and all comforts suitable for patients have been provided. Medical skill of the first character will be afforded, and nothing will be left undone which will tend to alleviate or sustain the afflicted. There are now accommodations for thirty; and as soon as another wing and will be erected, the kitchen and permanent and suitable buildings be erected. The design is to make the institution as complete as possible. To do the same, money is received from patients who have means, because the funds of the charity are limited.

Previous to the passage of a recent law of Congress, the duties of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were very arduous, and the time in performing their special functions in connection with the Supreme Court, they were required to go to the various Circuit Courts of the United States. In accordance with the provisions of this Circuit System, there been recently appointed to relieve the Justices of the Supreme Court of Circuit duties, the following gentlemen who are understood to Hon. Lewis B. Woodruff, the newly-appointed Judge to the most important of the Union Circuits, comprising New York, Connecticut, and Vermont. The occasion was one of much interest to the legal profession, and the full court-room was crowded with members of the bench and bar of this city.

The annual meeting of the Scientific Association of France we learn that the vine occupies in France about 6,175,000 acres. The annual product is the twentieth part of the French territory, and the sixteenth part of its soil capable of cultivation. The vineyards yield annually 1,700,000,000 francs. This industry occupies six million men, women, and children, and nearly two million merchants, agents, and traders.

In France they have a somewhat novel method of preventing the destruction of the vineyards by an excellent quality, which ripens early. The gardener selects a few plants in the midst of the plain and the cluster of flowers which appears on them, thus forcing the sap into the bulbs before the rest of the plant has come into flower. By this means the plants become stout dwarf bushes not over 18 inches high, and they are not subject to the ravages by phylloxera.

The discovery in Oil City of a well-preserved skeleton, which is eighteen feet in height, has given rise to considerable of satelite regarding the whole giant family. It seems that eighteen feet is not an unprecedented height for a man, and we have been informed that there was a gentleman in Rouen, in 1830, who measured seventy-two feet in height. Not near the same city a skeleton was found, in 1856, whose skull held a bushel of corn, and in the year 1613 Father Magni, that Ferrogus, slain by Orlando, the nephew of Charlemagne, stood twenty-eight feet and that a man of the same size was found cattle in Dauphine, in 1825, twenty-five and a quarter feet high, ten feet around the shoulders, and four feet from the breast-bone to the back! But the most astonishing and well authenticated instance of large growth in these very days is to be found in the following announcement, which recently appeared in the Paris "Figaro": "Henry Bowen, with Beard, for Gentlemen measuring 33 feet by 17. Terms moderate." Exclamation of exclaim with Hamlet, "Oh, wonderful! most horrible!"

Labouliye lives in summer at Glatigny, Versailles, and he is known to have lived in Paris. He is described by a recent visitor as a short, plainly-dressed man, evidently not at his ease in society. One of that gracious politeness in which the Frenchman of genius and native artistic taste excels. His conversation, also, was inspiriting one, and his voice low and eloquently sweet, and he never spoke of himself or his productions except when questioned. The number of presents that M. Labouliye has received from America is astonishing. He has a large collection of autographs from his Yankee admirers. The givers of some of these gifts are unknown to fame, but others, like Mrs. Stowe, should be well never visit American—but he is "done out," though not without a fresh and lively interest in the subject.

A real tragedy recently occurred at the Theatre Royal, Melbourne. Bandmann, the actor, in playing Othello, killed Desdemona, Mrs. Simpson. She fell to the ground uttering piercing shrieks, which for a moment were thought to be a part of the acting, but on the business of the scene; but it was immediately obvious that her cries were the expression of terrible pain. The curtain was immediately lowered amidst great excitement. But it was soon ascertained that Desdemona had been stabbed in earnest. It became that Bandmann's sword became entangled in the dress of Mrs. Simpson, and in withdrawing it, as she stood somewhat obliquely at the time, the point of the weapon passed through the body, entered through the dress and pierced the flesh. The latest accounts say that Bandmann's conduct has undergone much mental distress in consequence of the accident.

A scientific botanist of Ceylon writes of the consternation produced among the coffee-planters of that island in consequence of the rapid increase of a parasitic fungus in the coffee-plantations, causing the leaves to fall from their proper time, and endangering the safety of the crop. It is a singular fact that, among the many parasitic plants of Ceylon, this is the only one which has been received in England from Ceylon, this particular fungus is not known to exist in any botanical museum, but it is with difficulty referable to any recognized section.

A REMARKABLE ROMAN BULL.

THE very nice old gentleman whose father, three-quarters of a century ago, called him GIOVANNI MARIA MASTAI FERRETTI, but who is now best known as PIO NONO, or Pope PIUS THE NINTH, put forth on the 12th of October, 1869, a rather remarkable document touching excommunications, and such matters. The document, duly signed by a couple of cardinals, and countersigned by two other officials is written in fearful Latin, which we think would have puzzled CICERO or QUINTILIAN. By this document, as we understand it, about nineteen persons in twenty now living are excommunicated "latæ sententiæ," which we suppose to mean "by published decision;" and of these hardly an individual can be set free from the pains of excommunication except by the Pope, their cases being "especially reserved to the Roman Pontiff." These especially reserved cases are grouped under twenty-nine heads. The first class comprehends all heretics, and those who believe in, receive, favor, or defend them. Pagans, Buddhists, and Mohammedans are thus excommunicated. The third class is composed of "schismatics, and those who obstinately withdraw or secede from obedience to the Roman Pontiff at that time living." This cuts off the Greek Church, the Maronites, and all Protestants—rather more than half of what is known as Christendom. The second specification steers rather closely into the Catholics themselves. It excommunicates every person who "without the authority of the Holy See" reads or retains any book "prohibited by letters apostolic." Now, as a single case out of many, among the books formally placed in the Prohibitory Index is a poem written by an Englishman named JOHN MILTON, and entitled "Paradise Lost." We dare say there are few American Catholic clergymen, from the archbishops downward, who have not read, and who have not in their possession, this poem. Do they know that they are all excommunicated "latæ sententiæ," and that their cases are "specially reserved to the Roman Pontiff for the time being," who alone can absolve them?

There are about a dozen classes thus excommunicated who can be absolved only by the Pope, touching whose cases we have only to say that we trust that the Pontiff will not absolve them except upon clear proof of penitence and reformation. Among these are "forgers of apostolic letters;" those priests who, except under certain limitations, "absolve an accomplice in a disgraceful crime, even in articulo mortis;" those who are guilty of "simony," that is, trading in ecclesiastical preferments—we could wish that members of "rings" who trade in civil offices had been also included; those who, "making a trade of indulgences or other spiritual graces, are subject to excommunication" by the decree of Pope PIUS V., dated January 2, 1554; then also all those who "fight in a duel, or simply send or receive a challenge," who in any way aid or abet in a duel, or who do not, as far as in them lies, prevent it, "whatever may be their dignity, be it royal or imperial."

Two or three classes excommunicated "latæ sententiæ" may be absolved by the "bishops and ordinaries." First come "clerics in sacris, or regulars of either sex, who after taking the vow of chastity have the presumption to contract marriage, and those too who have the presumption to contract marriage with the said persons." We certainly hope that the ecclesiastical authorities, in this country at least, will deal very leniently with these persons; they might certainly do much worse than commit matrimony. Second are excommunicated "those who procure abortions;" and we hope sincerely that these persons will find scant favor from the "bishops and ordinaries."

This "Constitution"—for such is the technical word to designate it—a "Bull" properly differing from it in some points, mainly in the kind of seal affixed—is to "endure forever"—a long time even for a Pope's orders to last. It would have been well had the poor Pope or his advisers, before inserting the first three sweeping clauses touching heretics, schismatics, and the readers of prohibited books, read a chapter of a "prohibited" book entitled "Pilgrim's Progress," wherein mention is made of a certain old giant who, "though he be still alive, is by reason of age and also of the many shrewd brushes that he met with in his younger days, grown so crazy and stiff in his joints that he can now do little more than sit in his cave's mouth, grinning at pilgrims as they go by, and biting his lips because he can not come at them." We of course do not believe that the present amiable Pope would say to any peaceable pilgrim, "You will never mend till more of you be burnt." Pope PIUS IX., we are sure, would not harm a fly, unless it happened to alight without orders upon the walls of the Vatican; and then he would only scare him off with the feather-brush of excommunication, which would not hurt the fly.

There is a story that some Pope once sent out a Bull to stop a comet. We do not learn that the comet was particularly troubled, but kept on just as before. "Heretics," "schismatics," and PIUS THE NINTH.

CHURCH OF SAINT PETER AND THE VATICAN.

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY—THE SERGEANT'S STORY.—[FROM A SKETCH BY GENERAL M'MAHON.]

the like, we imagine will be quite as little disturbed by this Bull. There was a time when papal Bulls had very sharp horns, with which they could gore even kings and emperors—and, in fact, it was quite well in those days that such should be the case. But this poor Bull, turned loose three months ago, is a beast of a different sort. We assure all good people that he is quite harmless. By all means let him run through all the streets and roads of Christendom. It is not worth while even to drive him to the pound.

Meanwhile it is worth asking: Are Popes as well as Bourbons incapable of forgetting or learning any thing?

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY.

In the February Number of Harper's Magazine General M'MAHON, our late Minister to Paraguay, gives a very interesting statement as to the causes of the war made upon that country by the Allies, and also as to the principles upon which the war has been conducted. He shows very clearly that, whatever we may think of President LOPEZ, the people of Paraguay have displayed the most remarkable heroism in the defense of their country against the monstrous designs of her enemies, and that they have maintained their enthusiasm to the very last, suffering unusual privations and immense loss of life on the battle-field, while witnessing the desolation of their homes and the devastation of their property by the invaders. We must refer our readers to this interesting paper for a detailed statement of the grievances of ill-fated Paraguay. In the mean while we give on this page two illustrations of the war, from sketches furnished by General M'MAHON.

President LOPEZ's head-quarters, as seen in one of these illustrations, were situated—when the sketch was made—six miles from Angostura, on the hill of Pikysyry. The buildings were of one story, thatched with straw, and arranged on three sides of a square, including an area of little more than an acre. The side nearest the river was occupied by LOPEZ. Under one of the sheds on this side were three large telescopes on tripods, through which, all day long, observations were taken of the enemy's movements, by aids, who reported from time to time to the President. These officers, when not engaged in their military duties, would amuse themselves by pitching coins. Their uniform consisted of a red flannel blouse, or a finer garment of dark blue cloth, handsomely trimmed with black or red, with pantaloons of blue or red cloth, and fatigue cap of the French model, with the gold-lace indications of rank. The head-quarters formed the centre of the Paraguayan position, and were intrenched on three sides, at a distance of about half a mile. This position was captured by the Allies, after a severe conflict, on the 27th of December, 1868; but LOPEZ had already retired to Cerro Leon, further in the interior.

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY—HEAD-QUARTERS OF PRESIDENT LOPEZ.—[FROM A SKETCH BY GENERAL M'MAHON.]

Shortly afterward Asuncion was surrendered. But as Cerro Leon nothing was heard of the event until the evening of the day subsequent to its occurrence. Then there came to LOPEZ's camp a boy-sergeant of fourteen years, dripping from the swamps, shrieking, before he nearly thirty hours, he had swum and waded, and he told the humiliating story—how gun-boats had been sent with flags of truce and plausible messages from the allied chiefs; how Paraguayan deserters had misinformed the principal officers of the batteries, telling the old story, since periodically repeated, that LOPEZ was trying to escape to Bolivia; how at last the whole garrison, numbering 3000, were marched out of their works, and suddenly ordered to stack arms in the hated presence of the enemy; and how he, with many others, scorning the surrender, betook himself to the swamps, and rested not until he stood before his chief. All this he told with streaming tears and voice almost choked with sobs.

With the fall of Asuncion the river La Plata was lost to Paraguay; and not long afterward the abandoned capital, Asuncion, fell into the hands of the Allies.

WON.

IF I could breathe my heart in speech,
It would, indeed, be all of you;
But all unworthy—for to reach
Your worth were more than words could do.

I love you. Let that one word be,
I can not strengthen it by more;
And yet I mean as much as he
Who lisps endearments by the score.

These sweet eyes droop. Oh, Heaven! I hold Your hand in mine. Can this, so be
A dream, or am I overbold
In drawing you thus close to me?

E'en now I wake not: and this cheek
So near my lip. Aye, love, and this Indeed be true! Oh, do not speak!
My life is crowned with that one kiss.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Three Books.—Book FIFTH.

CHAPTER XV.

WHAT SAYS THE LAW?

MR. FROST's cross-examination elicited more truth from Veronica than she had intended to tell, or than she was aware she had told. She had meant, indeed, to narrate the main facts of her case as they were; but at the same time to present them in such a manner as to gain her hearer's sympathies wholly for herself. She could not have spoken to the raggedest labourer without trying to make an effect; only in different cases she adopted different means for the attainment of the same end.

Mr. Frost read her like a book. For Mr. Frost's clear judgment was not dazzled by the glamour of her beauty. He was infatuatedly in love with another woman. He had been infatuated as for handsomer and more stately than this girl. And how superbly indifferent she was to his feelings! He knew that her heart was as hard as the nether millstone. But he had taken the first downward step in his life to win her.

When a man like Mr. Frost has done so much to gain any object, he does not easily cease to prize it. That would be to self-condemn the whole life a failure; and Mr. Frost hated failure, and, more deeply still, he hated the acknowledgment of failure.

The natural bias of his mind being toward hard judgments, and his professional experience having taught him to expect evil, he had at first been more than half convinced that Veronica or having known all along that Sir John was a married man, and of having been an accomplice in the commission of bigamy. But at last he satisfied himself that she had been duped.

"But still I do not quite understand why he should have run that risk," said Mr. Frost, thoughtfully.

"He ran no risk. His doctors had told him that he could not live a month. And I—I——"

"You importuned him, I suppose?"

"I did not importune Sir John. I never importuned him. And as to our marriage—he was bound by the most solemn obligations to make he his wife."

"Obligations which he never could have looked upon as binding, in the least; since he knew, as though you did not, that his real wife was living. No, no: the solemn obligation had nothing to do with it."

"But I had threatened to leave him, unless he did me right and justice."

"No doubt he would not have liked that. His pride (to speak of no other feeling) would have sufficed to make that painful to him. But, excuse me, that threat would scarcely have had any influence so long as he thought it a vain one!"

"It was not a vain threat; and he knew it was not. I could have left him, and I would have done so. I should have appealed to my cousin, Prince Cesare, for assistance and protection."

"Ay, ay, that, indeed! A mixture of real resentment, and bitterness, and envy of the folks who are going to live after he was dead! Yes; and then he secured peace and quietness for himself at the last, and prevented your leaving him."

"And he thought he was snaring me!" said Veronica, her breath coming quickly, and her splendid brows creasing themselves near together. "He thought I was his dupe and his victim. He meant me to awaken to suspended shame and misery after he was dead. And he thought he was preparing an eternal misery and discomfiture for Cesare, too! Oh, it was devilish!"

Mr. Frost declined to enter into the question of Sir John's deviltry.

"It is one of the strangest stories altogether that ever came under my notice," said he. "And two lawyers, of course, come in the way of strange stories; or they come to us."

Veronica had had much to learn as well as to narrate. It will be remembered that she had been kept from knowledge of the world since her eight. And almost the bitterest drop in her lot was that she discovered the identity of Sir John's forsaken wife with Maud's aunt, Judy Tallis.

It was so intolerably galling to her to think that her story must now be known and canvassed by all the people she knew! Had Sir John left her to die in the streets of Algiers, or Australia, there might (or so Veronica fancied) have been some hope that the world she came of and which would never have been made acquainted with the real circumstances. By skilful management they might have been kept back. But Veronica was no hope of that. Lady Tallis had belonged to a wide circle of society. And Miss Bayne, Boyce, whose after-dinner gossip at Lowater now came back vividly to Veronica's mind, would receive all the old story and industriously spread it on to the new one. It would be the town talk! The thought was distracting. For in proportion as Veronica would never be entirely happy without an audience to witness her happiness, so was the idea that most have people suspect her humiliation and misfortune intolerable to her.

Evil that could be hidden did not seem so evil to Veronica.

She had clung during so many months to the hope of returning to England as the wife of Sir Gale, throughout the gradual progress of Sir John's illness she had suffered such fluctuations of hope and fear, that the sense of relief and compensation were due to her.

How did she regard it? Had she not suffered? As to others—what had others done for her? The good people had drawn off from her. (And were they so much better than she was, pray?—except Maud? Maud was good! She understood how it was that Miss Bayne had seemed to desert her, and had never answered her letter. But then Maud was different from any one else. Her aunt must have prevented her from writing.) And as for the bad people, they had been desperately bad to her.

Her thoughts were drawn toward the brain as she sat with her hands clasped before her, leaning back in the easy-chair which Mr. Frost had placed her. And she looked full of a noble melancholy, with her dark eyes fixed obstructedly on the ground, and her lips apart.

If Mr. Frost had seen her portrait faithfully reproducing itself in his own possessions, he would have formed all kinds of exalted ideas about the original. But Mr. Frost had fathomed her nature. He had studied it. He had learned to discovery over him! And yet—and yet it is certain that he would have behaved to her much in the same manner if she had been fat, or freckled, or had lost her front teeth.

Veronica's face brightened suddenly entering the room, "you promised to send for me. It is so long ago. I thought you could come and see me with you. You see, Mr. Frost, how exhausted she is. Ought she not to take some rest?"

"Mr. Frost has come two o'clock, until Mr. Frost came," she answered, languidly. "It is not bedtime yet, aunt!"

"You understand, my friend," pursued Barletti, addressing Mr. Frost, "that I am Mitchell Bayne's nearest relative. And as Veronica has no one there, therefore, the proper person to give her every assistance and protection in the position in which she is so unexpectedly placed.

"Oh, undoubtedly, prince. Ahem! Your position naturally is one to a duke, as standing in the place of a brother to her."

The most subtle of mocking smiles lurked about his thin lips as he uttered the last words.

Ceasre, with a grave bow, accepted the position assigned to him. But Veronica detected the wholly unconscious of its irony. But Veronica answered at once with disdainful frankness:

"Not one, Mr. Frost. I do not look to Prince Cesare de' Barletti as a brother. My cousin he is truly, and as such I am glad to claim his protection. But it will be as well for you to understand at once that he is, moreover, my promised husband. And your interests are identical. It will, doubtless, not surprise you that I do not think it necessary to condescend to any hypocrisy of grief at my widowhood. The prince and I do not hesitate to repose full confidence in you and to seek advice.

Ceasre took her hand and kissed it gratefully, as he had a little startled, and one might almost say, shocked. Why be so confidential? Of course Mr. Frost understood their real position. But, why speak of it? It was such a moment it seemed almost indecorous. Of course she could not be supposed to mourn for Sir John Gale, but why not make-believe a little, if even only to the extent of saying nothing?

Mr. Frost looked at Veronica with a good deal of undisguised admiration, and no little secret surprise. She had more spirit and cleverness than he had supposed. He had not thought she owned her character after all!

And Veronica was perfectly sensible of the impression she had made.

"I suppose," she said, after a little pause, "that the best thing will be for me to go to London at once?"

"It will be well to do so as soon as possible," said Mr. Frost.

"Our good friend has no doubt of your getting your rights?" said Barletti, glancing from the lawyer to Veronica.

"Prince, we must speak to the point. The facts is, that the legality of your cousin's marriage will, in my judgment, depend entirely on the hour at which Lady Tallis Gale expired. If she died before the ceremony at Naples took place, the marriage is good. If she survived that ceremony—pray, for the minutes—"

Mr. Frost finished his sentence by an expressive shrug. There was a dead silence.

A slenderly built man, with a good face, entered the room, "you promised to send for me. It is so long ago. I thought you could come and see you with you. You see, Mr. Frost, how exhausted she is. Ought she not to take some rest?"

"Mr. Frost came two o'clock, until Mr. Frost came," she answered, languidly. "It is not bedtime yet, aunt!"

"You understand, my friend," pursued Barletti, addressing Mr. Frost, "that I am Mitchell Bayne's nearest relative. And as Veronica has no one there, therefore, the proper person to give her every assistance and protection in the position in which she is so unexpectedly placed.

"Oh, undoubtedly, prince. Ahem! Your cousin

"But you had previously signed the will as a witness, I am told."

"Yes, Sir, I was witness; but my master did not inform me what was in the will."

"And was there no other witness but yourself?"

"There was yet another, Sir. Sir John did not like that any of his own servants should be witness, so he told me to get a local person to sign the testament. Sir John wished he should be English, that other person. So I found a man who had brought home here for a gentleman; and this man was going back to England; and before he went, I asked him one evening to supper with me, and then Sir John signed the testament, and I signed it, and the other witness signed it. The man can be found, Sir, John made him leave his name and address in my care, and I have them."

Every word that Paul uttered fed Veronica's rising indignation.

Barletti understood very little of what was being said; but he watched Veronica's face, and reflected its expression encounter apparent.

"Ha! Very, very systematic," muttered Mr. Frost. Then he asked aloud, "How long is this ago, Paul?"

"About a fortnight ago, Sir. The Signor Principe may remember the date. It was three days after the morning when I saw him and Miss Judith in the Villa Reale."

"Ah!" ejaculated Mr. Frost. "That's decisive. A fortnight ago. There may, however, be a codicil added later."

Veronica's anger was less impressed by this fact than by the other one admitted by Paul, that he had watched her and Barletti in the Villa Reale.

"You have the audacity to confess—" she broke out in high excitement. But Mr. Frost stopped her.

"Pray, Madam," he said, gravely, "do not let us allow anger to enter into our discussion of this matter."

There was a short silence.

At length Paul said, bluntly, addressing Mr. Frost: "Were you a friend of my master's, Sir? Did you know him well?"

"I am an English lawyer, Paul. My name is Frost. You have heard my name mentioned here. You have, eh? Well, I am that same Mr. Frost. I did not know Sir John Gale personally; but you may be sure that in allowing your master's will to be inspected in my presence you are running no risk of failing in your duty."

Paul looked somewhat reassured, though he still hesitated. "May I ask your name to you, Sir?" he whispered.

Mr. Frost stepped with him outside the door, which Paul closed and held in his hand while he spoke.

"Sir," said he, "she is not his wife. You see, I knew it all along, but it was not for me to interfere. How could I? I am but a domestic. But the gentleman—the soldier, I mean —of Sir John in England will know very well who has a right to the property. I am positive from what I've seen that the truth is, that Sir John was angry with her for some time before he died, and was going to make a change. But, if there is any thing left to her in it she will get it safely, by the law."

Paul explained his speech by a prolonged and grave shaking of his head from side to side.

"Paul," said Mr. Frost, with a confident deliberation, "mindi, as you call her, was married to Sir John Gale." Then he told him in a few words what and when the ceremony had been performed.

Paul remembered the expedition to the ship of war, and how ill and exhausted his master had been after it. He was much astonished to hear Mr. Frost's account, and reiterated his assertion that Sir John had been very angry with "mindi" before he died. How was it then that he had made her his wife at the eleventh hour?

It appeared clear to Mr. Frost that Paul had no suspicion of the existence of a former wife, or of any fraudulent intention on the part of his late master.

"At all events I suppose you believe my word, do you not?" said Mr. Frost. "I am a passenger on board the man-of-war I have reason to be sure did take place."

"Oh, no doubt, Sir."

"And remember, Paul, although I perfectly appreciate your fidelity to the memory of your late master, that you have no conceivable right to retain possession of that key when Lady Gale bids you give it up."

"I am sure, Sir, I desire nothing but to do my duty. I have been hard in my conscience, but he has done a great deal for me. He took me from being a courier to be his valet; and he gave me a liberal salary, Sir, and I am comfortable from my sparings to do well for my family. I could not go against my duty to Sir John, Sir!"

There was absolutely a quiver of emotion in Paul's well-regulated voice at the end. He was so fond of his boys in the Piedmontese hills, that Sir John, from constant conversation with them in his valet, had attracted some soft sentiments of Paul's to his own share. And besides, under the little mask of a grave impassivity there was quite a feminine power of becoming attached to that which needed him, in proportion as it was unattractive to the rest of the world. He had often told himself that if he were to leave Sir John, the latter would never get any one to serve him so well. For Sir John was a terribly hard gentleman, to say truth! Paul and Sir John's Piedmont had occasionally come nigh to finding him intolerable. But now that he was dead, the man actually missed and mourned for his daily plague.

"Have you succeeded in making my servant understand that he will have to obey me, Mr. Frost?" asked Veronica, when the two men reopened the door of the hotel.

"Paul quite understands," said Mr. Frost, quietly.

Barletti looked angry, but he gave his arm to Veronica without making any remark, and they all ascended the stairs to the ground-floor, on which Sir John's bedroom was situated.

"Go on, Paul, and open the door," said Mr. Frost. But, as he spoke, the door was ajar, he fell back a step or two, and said in a low voice to Barletti and Veronica: "If you will take my advice you will not enter this room. I know, I think. And it might come to pass that you would be glad to have him on your side."

"Conciliate him!" echoed Veronica, with a frown and a cruel compression of her red lips. "I would not go into the room with this monster. He should not be another night beneath this roof if I could have my way."

"Carn, mia Luce!" Be reasonable!" whispered Barletti, on whom the lawyer's warning produced a strong effect.

Paul unlocked the door of the dead man's chamber, and, holding a lamp high above his head, stood aside, with his back presented to let the others pass. All traces of disorder had been removed from the room. It was dim and still. The one oil lamp that burned there threw deep shadows on the walls, and faintly illuminated the objects that were most conspicuous in its flame. The floor was covered with a thick carpet into which the foot sank noiselessly; the bed of gold shone mysteriously here and there; and a soft glow of ruby velvet from the furniture and hangings mingled with the general dimness, where some salient fold caught the light. At one end of the room was a large swing glass that reflected the lights and shades with rich dark curtains touched here and there with light, and the bed itself, a large, ghastly burden covered with a large white sheet.

Veronica, when her eyes encountered this object in the gloom, stopped suddenly, and clung to Barletti's arm. He, too, was not unmoved by the scene, and he pressed her hand in silence.

"No one watches here?" said Mr. Frost, in a subdued voice, which yet seemed to startle the solemn silence.

"No one, Sir. But I have the key of the chamber. And, as for that, not one of the domestics would enter it after dark, even now if the room was all unguarded and unreckoned gold was scattered about in it."

In silence they proceeded to open the desk—Mr. Frost holding the light while Paul unlocked it, opened at once and took out the well-known folded paper.

"You recognize this as being the paper which your master told you was his will, and made you sign? And you see that, as far as you can tell, it has been opened since you put it there, by his command, last night?"

"Yes, Sir?"

"And you, prince?" asked Mr. Frost, handing the will to Barletti.

The latter bowed forward and examined it, without touching it. Veronica barely glanced at it for a moment, and then her gaze returned to that which seemed to fascinate her.

"I believe it to be the same paper which he had in his hand last night," said Barletti, speaking scarcely above his breath.

Mr. Frost opened the will and read it silently.

It bore date the seventeenth of February, and was expressed in short and clear sentences. It bequeathed the whole of Sir John Tullis Gale's personal property and real estate to "my dear wife" during her lifetime; and, in case of her death before the death of the testator, to her only child, named Judith Maud Hilda Sherwood. There was no subsequent codicil, and no mention of any other wife. The sum of the property was many pounds to Mr. Adam Lane, Sir John's agent, who was also appointed sole executor.

Mr. Frost folded the document.

"What I say is of less consequence than the date it bears," said Veronica, scornfully, "but a good one, this will is mere waste paper."

Then, turning to Paul, Mr. Frost added: "In accordance with the testator's wish, I shall hand-by, in your presence, such documents, and retain all that I consider to be of importance to England. You understand that I am responsible for its safety until then."

Paul answered after a little grave deliberation: "If course, Sir, I desire to do my duty to Sir John. I hope you will not take it ill, Sir—that you will not be offended—if I say that I shall write to Mr. Lane, the agent of Sir John, and inform him of what has taken place. But I shall tell Mr. Lane that I am ready to bear testimony if I am needed."

"Quite right, Paul," answered Mr. Frost, a little stiffly. "You may be sure that every thing will be done in a proper manner."

Then Paul proceeded to replace the empty drawer, and to re-lock the desk; and, as he did so, Veronica sank down on a prie-dieu in the others stood by in profound silence. It was a silence that seemed to be filled with the sense of vague shape beneath the cold white linen that was slightly raised, with an outline at once terribly suggestive and terribly indefinite.

Veronica had not dared to look directly at the bed, but she seemed to catch it in her image in the glass. All her old horror and dread of death seemed to be stealing over her. The fectitious excitement which had given her courage to enter the room was failing fast: Her head throbbed, and her eyes were hot. She felt dizzy, with the impression of the awful scene during Sir John's last moments seemed to come back to her with the distinctness of a bad dream.

In coming away from the desk Paul accidentally gave a slight touch to the great glass, and it instantly swung to a different angle—making one who looked into it giddy with a sudden vague sense of insecurity.

As the mirror swung slowly down, it seemed to Veronica's eyes as though the white form on the bed were stirring and rising.

"He moves, he moves! he is not dead, he is moving!" she cried. And with a stifled shriek that shook in her throat, she burst from Cesare, who was scarcely less horror-stricken than herself, and rushed out of the room, where, after a few paces, she fell down heavily in a swoon.

ABOUT CATS.

THE cat is such a universal animal that perhaps a few rambling remarks about "Pussy" may not be out of place. We should like to know why cats are as much underrated as they usually are. The dog is a companion of man, but not much more so than the cat; and yet, while every body is fond of his dog, and is ready with anecdotes to show forth his intelligence, how many have a good word for the poor cat? Now this is hardly fair: the cat is as affectionate in her way as the dog, and, to our thinking, her liking for man and her confidence in him are more wonderful, and deserve more to be encouraged than the same qualities in the dog, for they come naturally to him and not to her. A cat is originally of a wild nature, and has as much first to overcome its natural instinct to fly from man; while the dog can not help seeking him, and loving him as a friend and companion. Don't think, reader, that we dislike or despise dogs; our poor old Scotch terrier knows better. But we are just now bent on doing a little justice to cats. Why, the poor things have not even individuality given to them, as they are all called "Puss." Here and there, we admit, there is a Dick or a Peter, and they rise above the rest of "Tom;" but the rule they are called Puss. Perhaps they don't know that ingenuity has been exhausted to find fresh and attractive names for dogs, and they would naturally feel aggrieved if they did; and what makes it still more unfair is, that as far as they are concerned they would be happy to answer to any other names if they had a chance.

French cats are not called Puss, they are commonly called "Minnie;" and it is related of a late eminent English prelate that, while staying at a French hotel, he had tried to coax a cat to him by calling "Puss! Puss!" as he had been used. He was informed that he must call it "Minnie;" he did so, and the cat came at once, extorting from the bishop an exclamation of surprise at the ease with which understanding is given.

All sorts of things are said about cats. Even Shakespeare, who ought to have known better, repeats the proverb which says they are afraid to wet their feet; but it is not true. A cat probably does not like to wet its paws, but if any end is to be compassed, she will do it readily enough. We know a cat who would sit for hours together on the cold stones, exposed to the occasional dripping of the old-fashioned water-butt, because at that season good fishing came to effect. We remember one Tom-cat, a fine, intelligent-looking fellow, who was apparently a gentleman, who took objection to his mistress's working so much with her needle; having doubtless observed that when she sat at work she took notice was taken of him. He accordingly hit upon the plan of stealing her thimble, and carrying it under the carpet; and by this practice he continued steadily until he was one day summarily chastised. We have known cats devour a mouse, and taught themselves to open doors fastened by a latch—a feat which would certainly require some thought in the execution, we admit. Pussy steals; but then she is so ingenious about it that she ought to be forgiven. One cat, we remember, was very fond of fish, and having noticed how they were broken, used to mount the dresser and push with her paw till she got one out of the basket in which they were kept: she would then roll it off the dresser on to the floor, and of course it cracked, and she could leisurely devour it. She gave great uneasiness to the servants until her capacity was discovered, as she could account for the mysterious disappearance of the eggs.

If a cat does not show her inferior one creature is to the other, that you can not get a cat to follow you like a dog. Well, as we know, this proud, aloof manner are different, but a great deal can be effected by kindness in this respect. A young lady who lived in a very retired part of the country, used, when at home for her holidays, to walk to the village post-office for the letters. Two times her cottage consisted of two dogs and three favorite cats, and these would usually accompany her on her walks all the way to the village, a distance of more than two miles. Again, some people declare that cats have only what is not precisely called a memory. It is said, for instance, that they will not remove with a family to a new house; but indeed your Peter in a bag can contradict for themselves. Probably the cats derived its chief support from the remarkable power and love of finding their way to their old homes; which power every one who has tried to "lose" a cat must have observed. Well, one gentleman once owned a favorite black cat, which became afflicted with the mange; and having some wish to destroy it—for—he would not trust my one else with the office of execution—but himself—he confined poor Peter in a bag with several heavy stones, and carried him to a deep stream at a considerable distance, and threw the bag in. The master's horror, puss burst the bag in his struggles, and swimming to the steep bank crept into a drain which discharged itself into the stream. His master went home, much grieved to think what hardships his favorite might suffer; but about six hours after, as he was leaving the house, he felt something rub against his legs, and, looking down, he beheld poor Peter! How the cat had found its way back no one could guess.

With kindly usage, cats will live a long time. We have known a stray cat live eighteen years in the house to which she attached herself; but what her age was when she came there no one knew. Who cats have the peculiarity of being always deaf. This is strange but true—indeed, it is a rule with scarcely an exception. We once saw a white cat which was only "hard of hearing," but she was considered a curiosity.

And now let us beg our young readers never to ill-treat or make furious a cat, both for the cat's sake and for their own. From what cause it is so we know not, but the bite or scratch of a cat is exceedingly dangerous, and very difficult to heal. Indeed, we have known a cat clawed by a cat had every separate laceration, as he thought, harmless, but he could certainly not scarcely visible, on his wrist, and when last we heard of him his arm, from this trivial injury, was swollen to about its size right up to the shoulder, and was so fearfully inflamed that the worst consequences were to be feared. Almost any neighborhood will supply similar instances, and a cat given to biting and scratching should always be destroyed.

Below stairs the cat is invaluable, not only for the rats and mice that she devours, but for the fun she gives the servants. Indeed her back is broad enough to bear all that is put upon it; and we don't know that whatever any thing is missed or broken, and the question comes to be asked who took it, or who broke it, the ready answer is, invariably, "The cat did it!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"MUGGINS, what are in the world's history do you regard with the greatest admiration?" asked Mr. Cadbury, of Clapham Rise, with a spasmodic shudder.

OLD RHYMES REWRITTEN.

LAZY AND LAZIER.

Busy and giddy now your play,
That all belongs to another day.
They after will be glad to be
Of league in open-box or stall.
They would be glad to think it due
With all the big quality-folks to shoe.

SELF-ESTEEM.

Poor Miss Bell
Is not very well
What makes her so?
She thinks she's lovely
Was not be a naughty man
He broke her heart.

TO A SHAREHOLDER OF THE

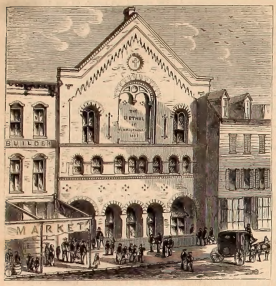
Grocery Gooney Gander,
Where'll he do, I'm sure?
Up shares, down shares,
Not a bit of either.
Catch me the director
Who'll pay up, Pretty Poll!
If not the right sort
Seize on the left leg.
Your shareholder has nothing left
But tails, trials, and cares.

DEDICATED TO THE WEARERS OF THE FORCE.

Constable Dull
Hid in a corner,
Acting as Christmas spy!
He smelled on the cook,
And his eyes were dry,
Saying, "What a policeman am I!"

"Is your master at home?" "No, Sir; he's out." "Minnie's out, too, Sir." "Ah, she's out, too. Then I'll step in and sit by the fire." "That's out too."

A minister traveling along a Texas road met a stranger driving his wife and baby in a two-horse ox-cart. As the minister approached, he heard the man say, "Get up, Pretty Girl." "Get up, Buck-eye!" How, Bagtail! What are you doing, Buckeye?" Is the ministry's salary in the vicinity of such names being given to cattle, remarked the minister, in his solemn tones for your oxen, and I wish for the sake of the heathen they were known by. The driver replied: "I call that land-ox in front Preacher, because he is the best ox I have got. He believes in pulling through every difficult place, perhaps that is why I call him Preacher better than all the rest. The one by his side I call Campbellite; he is always for going his own way, and he can do his best to make every other ox do the same. The next one I call Methodist; he is always for going on as far as he can, and then he stops and waits for



THE BROOKLYN BETHEL.

THE BROOKLYN BETHEL.

As every one of the many thousands of castaways and criminals that infest our streets and burden society was once an innocent boy or girl whom Christian kindness and proper training might have saved from ruin, such an institution as the Brooklyn Bethel should be regarded as one of the most beneficent and important of Christian charities. It is founded on the sound principle that prevention is better than cure; and though it has been in existence but a few years, it has already more than fulfilled the expectations of those who have established and sustained it.

Originally started as a mission Sunday-school, for the benefit of the children of the very poor, it soon assumed larger proportions, chiefly under the generous patronage of Plymouth Church, and now, as shown by the illustrations on this page, possesses a handsome and attractive building, with well-furnished reading-rooms, library, etc., where the children of the poor can assemble every night in the week for instruction and innocent amusement. The founders of the Bethel wisely aim to make the institution attractive. All the rooms present a cheerful appearance, are furnished with an eye to comfort and taste, the walls hung with pictures, and the library and reading-room supplied with papers, magazines, and books especially adapted to the wants of working people.

The Bethel was popular from the start. Every night the reading-rooms are filled with men and boys; and the evening classes for study are so crowded that numbers are turned away from want of room to seat them. It is especially popular with boys. Every evening, for half an hour before the time of opening, the doors are besieged by an army of eager and impatient urchins clamorous for admission. On entering, they are first conducted to the wash-room, where plentiful supplies of water, soap, and towels are provided, and each one is compelled to make himself fairly presentable before being admitted to the other rooms. Boys who never washed before now scrub themselves vigorously every evening, and, besides learning the lesson which is next to godliness, many of them become very fastidious in the use of comb and brush. From the wash-room they disperse—some to the reading-room, some to the checker-room, some to the evening classes. The average attendance is nearly three hundred; and it is noticed that those who come once rarely fail to attend several times a week; and many never miss an evening.

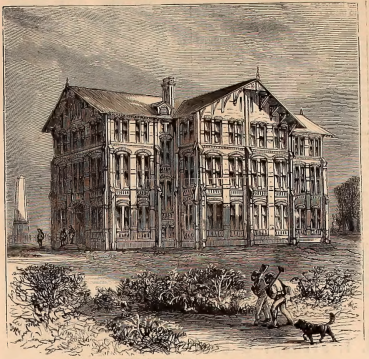
During the winter season a series of popular entertainments is given at the Bethel. The programme comprises concerts, lectures, readings, exhibitions, etc. The concerts and stereopticon exhibitions have always been largely attended; but the lectures have been less popular. A small entrance fee to these entertainments is charged, but every thing else is free. A large Sunday-school is connected with the Bethel, with a membership of nearly nine hundred boys and girls. Besides a large force of teachers, the Bethel employs a regular missionary to visit the parents of these children and render assistance in cases of

THE BROOKLYN BETHEL—THE WASH-ROOM.

THE BROOKLYN BETHEL—THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

THE BROOKLYN BETHEL—THE READING-ROOM.

THE BROOKLYN BETHEL—THE BOYS' CHECKER-ROOM.



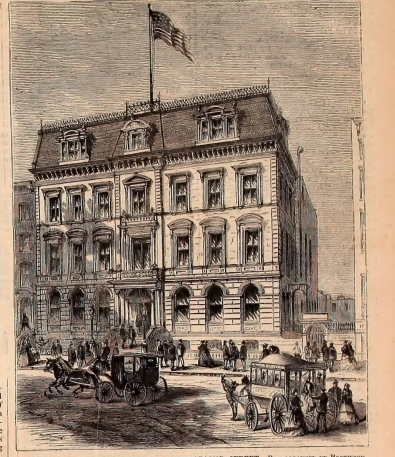
NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE, HAMPTON, VIRGINIA.

sickness and destitution. In this way many families are brought under good influences, and parents as well as children are saved from ruin. It would be well for New York if institutions like the Brooklyn Bethel were established in every part of the city populated by the poorer classes. The working-people appreciate such attempts to provide instruction and amusement for them, and show that they are ready to leave the low theatre, the dance-house, and the bar-room just as fast as moral and rational means of recreation are opened to them.

THE HAMPTON, VIRGINIA, NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE.

THIS institution, of which a view will be found on this page, is located in Hampton, Virginia, within sight of Fortress Monroe. It was established in 1868, under the auspices of the American Missionary Association, for the purpose of preparing youth of the South, without distinction of color, for the work of organizing and instructing schools in the Southern States. The extreme poverty of those who needed such an institution, and the value of self-help as a means of culture and true manhood, induced the Association to purchase a farm of one hundred and twenty acres and provide it with all appliances of profitable labor. The farm lies upon Hampton Roads. The school and home buildings, valued at $50,000, occupy a beautiful site upon the shore. They are so furnished and arranged as to offer to the students the helps to right living which belong to a cultivated Christian home. In the farm-work, under the constant direction of an educated practical farmer, the graduates of this institution will have learned both the theory and practice of the most profitable methods of agriculture. The female students do all the house-work of the boarding department. Then in the home, on the farm, and in the schoolroom the students have the opportunity to learn the three great lessons of life—how to live, how to labor, and how to teach others. There are at present about 80 pupils at the Institute. The terms of tuition are merely nominal; and, to meet the necessities of the Institute, the managers solicit temporary endowments for scholarships yielding $85 for males, and $100 for females. All labor performed on the farm by the inmates is paid for at rates varying from four to twelve cents an hour.

SOLDIERS' NATIONAL ASYLUM AT MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN.



THE NEW GERMAN CLUB-HOUSE IN FORTY-SECOND STREET.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD. [SEE PAGE 78.]

NATIONAL ASYLUM FOR SOLDIERS.

ON this page we give a view of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, erected near Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The grounds on which it is built comprise about four hundred acres, laid out with taste as a park immediately around the main edifice, and affording ample opportunity for such light outdoor work as the condition of the inmates will allow them to perform, and for which they receive pay. Soldiers admitted to this asylum are not obliged to surrender their pensions, are well cared for in every respect, and subjected to such discipline only as is required to preserve order and promote the health and moral well-being of all the inmates.

The main building is cruciform in shape, with a front of 300 feet and a depth of 280 feet. Two wings are to be added, to complete the original design, one at each end, with a projection to the front corresponding to the centre, and having the same elevation. The building is constructed with Milwaukee brick on a stone foundation, and, as may be seen from our illustration, is a very handsome specimen of architecture. The cost of the completed building will be about $230,000. The arrangements and general management of this institution are under the control of a Board, of whom the President of the United

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT GLENN'S FALLS, N. Y.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY S. R. STODDARD, GLENN'S FALLS.—[SEE PAGE 78.]

States, the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and the Secretary of War, are ex-officio members, Major-General BUTLER, President, and General MARTINDALE and JAY COOKE, Esq., Vice-Presidents. The number of men in the asylum is now about 250; with the hospital it affords accommodations for about 1000 inmates. The situation is one of the most delightful and salubrious in the country.

THE NEW GERMAN CLUB-HOUSE.

On page 77 we give a view of the new German Club-house, recently erected for the Harmonic Social Club in Forty-second Street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues. Externally it is a structure of very handsome appearance, and the internal arrangements are befitting the requirements of the wealthy and cultivated organization for whose accommodation the building was erected. Its cost, not including the land, was a quarter of a million dollars. The architect was Mr. HENRY FERNBACH. The lot is one hundred and four feet front, and one hundred feet deep; the building eighty feet front and one hundred feet deep. Twenty feet are reserved on the Fifth Avenue side for a summer garden and arbor, to be planted with vines and flowers, with refreshment-tables at the sides and a fountain in the centre.

The Club, composed principally of Germans, is limited to four hundred members, and during the winter season concerts, balls, and other social entertainments are given at least once a week. The officers are: President, M. SIMONSON, Jun.; Vice-President, JOSEPH RAU; Secretaries, H. COHN, JULIUS LEBMAIER; Treasurer, JULIUS BINGE.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT GLENN'S FALLS.

A fine monument, of which we give an engraving on page 77, was recently erected at Glenn's Falls, New York, by the town of Queensbury, to the memory of her sons who fell in the war for the Union. The structure is of Nova Scotia freestone, and is composed of a solid die resting on a triple base, from which rises a bonded shaft. Within the bands are engraved the names of twelve prominent battle-fields of the war. Over the top of the shaft are draped the national colors, clutched in the hand of an eagle that surmounts the whole. The total height of the structure is forty-six feet.

At the base of the shaft, on the west side, stands the life-size figure of an officer; on the reverse that of a private soldier. On the die underneath these figures are engraved the names of the officers and soldiers to whose memory the monument was erected. On the north side of the die appropriate inscriptions are engraved. The monument, which was erected under the superintendence of Mr. R. T. BAXTER, of Glenn's Falls, is a credit to the taste of the beautiful village where it stands.

A WAIF.

I CAN recall neither the day nor the hour, but the incident I am about to relate is as fresh in my mind as if it had happened yesterday. I was lingering at a small watering-place, situated on the rocky shores of the east coast of Scotland. The ordinary visitors had already left, because the high winds and terrific storms which were of frequent occurrence at that time of year, and it was only a few hardy ones like myself who still found pleasure in facing the raging elements of wind and water combined.

It had been a more than usually stormy night, and many an anxious heart had been passed through its vigils, for it seemed as if some terrible disaster must be heralded by the booming sound of the waves, and the screeching of the wind that beat it found opposition to its course in the shut doors and windows of the little hamlet. But morning broke at last, and brought a few watery gleams of sunlight to brighten the agitated atmosphere, though the waves and clouds as yet seemed to carry roaring, and dashed against the rocks as though bent on their destruction.

I wandered along the low line of sand which, broken as it is into many small bays, runs under the high bathing cliffs of the place, and was about one of the most retired of these spots. Here I sat down on a flat rock, which guarded the entrance of the bay, to enjoy the luxury and misery of the scene. I had not long sat thus when I was disturbed by the undoubted cry of a fishing sound, and, looking down, saw a dog standing before me. Its coat was dripping with water, one of the fore-feet was cut and bleeding, and the sad, wistful look in its eyes went to my heart. I gently patted its head, and offered a piece of bread from my pocket, offered it some; but the animal scarcely even glanced at it, and only continued to look at me with that touching, crying gaze, as if asking assistance. After a while he turned a little way back on the sands and beckoned himself down, casting a look toward me. My curiosity and interest were both aroused, and I followed. At first I could see nothing; but presently, from under the paw of the animal, which was placed protectingly upon it, there came out of the glove—only a little well-worn child's glove, where the second and third fingering, so completely had it retained the form of the fingers which had once worn it. I cast my eyes over the wide waters, but no sign of life or death was there; only the mute token in my hand spoke of both. Long I searched up and down the shore, but in vain. The poor little body must have been carried out to sea, and was never found, as far as I know. "Ah! little one," I sighed, "the cruel, cruel waves, then, required such a holocaust as thine, young, innocent, and forlorn; and is there no mourner for thee save this faithful dog, and no monument save this little glove? At least," I continued, as I folded it carefully into my pocket-book, "it shall live in my memory and mine, poor creature, in my affections. I stooped, as I spoke, to caress the still constant animal, and so great had been the absorption of my feelings that I had not marked the incoming tide; but now a wave rushed nearly up, and though it still beyond its reach, it wrapped its coronal of foam round the rock and wetted the feet of the faithful dog, and carried it helplessly back into the ocean. One short, sharp bark, one feeble struggle, and the brave heart was no more. It is long since this happened, but the plain still lies in my pocket-book, and the relics in my heart whenever I recall its guardian's fate.

A NEW ERA FOR THE EAST.

THAT the Suez Canal will bring about a revolution in the commercial world to a certain extent of the civilized world, must be left to future times to decide. The Mediterranean is no longer a huge cesspool, completely shut out by a narrow isthmus of sand from the seas which wash the shores of the richest, most productive countries of modern times. It has now burst its way into the Eastern Ocean. It has forever given up its exclusive-ness—fatally dangerous as it proved to be to self-interest: and, in joining with the wider world without, it has inaugurated a new era of commercial activity, a vast increase in wealth, a mighty advance in civilization—not more for its own shores than for those of Indian seas. From the New World it has never been excluded, the Straits of Gibraltar connecting it with the wide Atlantic; and, with the new direct passage to the East, is there not every probability of the ports of North Africa and of South Europe becoming the great commercial emporiums of the future? The way is now clear from North America to Hindostan, China, and the exception of the detour made by the Red Sea, the course is a direct one. The Mediterranean lies in the line between East and West, and must be said to connect both. What an enviable position! On the one hand, America, Europe, England, young, and active; on the other India, surpassingly wealthy, and itself the connecting link between almost boundless gold mines, and almost every where the fringes of good and large. The golden fleece is now the time for Europe and Marseilles to bestir themselves. The golden opportunity is offered, and the earliest bidder will obtain the greatest bargain. The vessels where will be the London, the pre-eminent commercial city of future times? It would be bold, indeed, if, contrary to all modern anticipations, it should not be in North America, but in one of the old-established ports of the Old World. The change is very much larger than the new; is as rich, or richer, in minerals, and contains a greater proportion of richly productive soil. After mature reflection, then, it should not be surprising if the commercial supremacy which successively left Tyre, Rome, and Venice should desert London for the New York, but for some place on the ancient coasts of the Mediterranean. Should this really happen (of course it is at present a mere speculation, and a few years will decide the probability or improbability of its ultimate occurrence), there can be no doubt that the Suez Canal will have been the cause, if not the sole cause, of the regeneration of the world of the ancients.

MEN AND THEIR FEMALE RELATIONS.

THERE are women of sufficient shrewdness to see that the common attitude of the men who surround them is that of an amiable hypocrisy—a kind of mask which is assumed to cover up characteristics which underlie this pleasant exterior. Where women make quick to detect the weak points in their husbands' character; but to these they extend a becoming toleration, for they know that their husbands are not angels, but mere people. They accept the profound homage which is paid to women by men as a myth, and are not the least blinded to the fact that the men around who have, during a long evening, been distinguished for politeness by their extraordinary courtesy, may have been merely playing the rôle which they considered best suited, that, in their own private and domestic life, they may be found very different from the much more plain-spoken persons which they appear to be in public society. The common-sense and penetration of this sort of woman would constitute her a terrible critic, if her knowledge did not lead to a spirit of toleration. She has a wonderful tact in detecting the presence of hypocrisy, when distinguished persons do shelter itself behind silence and circumspection. She can instantly distinguish between the man who is thoroughly true to his principles and fashionable way, because that is the habit of the people with whom he moves, and because he does not care to be amusing to people who would only be surprised or puzzled by his wit, and who would be apt to look down upon it, behind a short-front similar to that worn by their men and behind an air of indifferent humor. Such a woman is never a worshiper of those manly qualities which are peculiar to the hero of the boarding-school miss in the French novelist. She is not much an admirer of brute force per se. She is more than likely to conceive a positive detestation for the large, stolid, small-brained, self-willed, and selfish idiot of six feet two, who is so much admired by women of a certain physiological development. In her estimation, humanities does not consist in combining the tastes of a groom with the dress of a gentleman; and if there is any thing she is likely to abhor, it is a bully of that fine, confident breed, lief in the power of mere male size to captivate women, which is the sole creed of this well-known hero. If her girlish imagination has led her to marry some such man, his position some dozen years after is not to be envied.

But it must not be supposed for a moment that we consider all this system of gentle hypocrisy which may so far influence the judgment of the majority of women in regarding men. In the first place, the highest compliment men can pay to women. Even as the lion, in innumerable legends, pays the real nature and mischief submissively before an innocent girl, so do most brave behind them selfishness, arrogance, and anger in the presence of women. And, if they are not exactly what they pretend to be, it is conclusive to their effect that they know they ought to be something different from what they are. If the influence of feminine society does nothing more than cause them to assume, pro tem., a gentleness and toleration and politeness of demeanor which are not exhibited by them elsewhere, it has already done much.

CREPTON HAYNE AND FACE, SURE INLY, &c., cited at once by the use of Heyenway's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Depot, 49 Park Row, New York. Sent on receipt of 39 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

THOSE WHO SUFFER from nervous irritations, itching sensations, and the discomfort that follows from an impure state of the blood, should use Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. It purifies, and cleanses the blood. Purges out the lurking elements of disease, invigorates the whole, and the constitutional vigor will return.—(Com.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

offer to close at the following

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES:

Ladies' Poplin Walking Suits,

Handsomely Trimmed, only $5 each.

Black Alpaca do., $10 each.

Rich Tartan Poplin do., $25 each.

BLACK AND COLORED SILK SUITS.

TARLATAN AND SWISS MUSLIN EVENING DRESSES.

Paris-made, Elegantly Trimmed.

TWO SPLENDID

WHITE SATIN BRIDAL DRESSES,

Trimmed with Lace, Orange Blossoms, &c.

A few Paris-made Silk Walking Suits,

Trimmed with Lace, &c.,

AT LESS THAN ONE-HALF COST,

To which the attention and inspection of their customers is respectfully invited.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST

A THIEF.

He has been traveling about humbugging druggists and grocers with a Paper and Tea Canister-cased in Oxide of Gold, Superior to Paper Collars, Linen Cuffs, Silver and Brass Work, Glass Cruetstand, Silver Cruet Frame, Glass Crystal, size of lady's watch. Will defend against Fire, Water, and 20 years, except such always entirely of metal. This is no WOOD Compass. It cutting away, pierced. 600 sold in three weeks. Only 81 each, three for $2, in neat case, mailed free. Agents wanted. Address, with stamp for circular, MAGNETIC WATCH CO., HINSDALE, N. H.

EMPLOYMENT.

Very little capital required, and no risk. Success certain. Business highly respectable, and Profit from 5 to 10 per cent. Persons desiring Lucrative employment should write for particulars at once. Address BENJ. WOOD & CO., 34 Broadway St., N. Y.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and interesting, 25 cents. Agents wanted. Circulars for 50 cents. Send to W. C. WINTER, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, &c., or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SHAPLEIGH, Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

Harper's Cheap Edition.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS.

By WILLIAM GODWIN, Esq., Author of "St. Leon," "Cloudesley," &c. &c.

Complete in One Volume.

16mo, Paper, 37 cents.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 37 cents.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.

MEDORA LEIGH: a Sketch from Real Life. An Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introductory Letter and Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Harriet Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village, &c." Related in a Selection from her Letters. Edited by the Rev. Henry Richard Haweis, and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange. 3 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $5 00.

4.

ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Faire Colors," "Denis Donne," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By the Rev. JOHN ADAM. Text from the Editions of Orelli, Maclaine, and Kemps. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

6.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By Dr. BERNARD COMFORT, Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

7.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

8.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misfortunes of Robert Alsleigh. With 16 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

9.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

10.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JOHNS MCCARTHY, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors," "Paul Massie," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

11.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Tropical World," "The Subterranean World," "Tropical Work," With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

12.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By ROBERT NAYE. Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By FRED. B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Wild Life under the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," &c. With numerous Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

14.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

15.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Parson. By the Rev. JOHN EYRE BRIDGE, M.A., Author of "Curlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

16.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Literature, Soil, Climate, Scenery, and Inhabitants of the Principal Battle-Fields of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, LL.D., Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 883 Illustrations, engraved on Wood, chiefly by Lossing and Barritt, Mostly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1088 pages, 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Sheep, $7 00; Roan, $8 00; Full Morocco extra, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

17.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy; Embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Author of "Natural and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College." With Portrait. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50; Sheep, $4 50.

18.

WHITE LIES. A Novel. By WILLIAM GILBERT. Illustrated Library Edition. Complete in 8 vols. 18mo, Paper, Green Cloth, Gilt and Gilt Edges, $4 00. The set complete, in a neat case, $8 50.

19.

ANNE BEDE.—The Mill on the Floss.—Fifth Holy.—Scenes of Clerical Life and Silas Marner.—Romola.

20.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

VANITY FAIR. 32 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

PENDENNIS. 24 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

THE VIRGINIANS. 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—The Newcomes. 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—The Adventures of Philip. 77 Illustrations and Portrait of Author. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Henry Esmond and The Wiverse. 13 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

21.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—Griffith Gaunt; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—It is Never Too Late to Mend. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—The Cloister and the Hearth. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—Love me Little, Love me Long. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—White Lies. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Peg Woffington, and Christie Johnstone. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Foul Play. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Put Yourself in His Place. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Propria Quæ Maribus. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—The Autobiography of a Thief, and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Jack of All Trades; A Day's Adventures; and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Singleheart and Doubleface. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, free from United States taxes, in New York or Harper's Ferry bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold. Trust Company, of New York.

The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $13,000 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. This line, connecting St. Joseph with Denver City, will make a short and through route to California.

The Company have a Capital

of.....$10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress

of 1,600,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at.....1,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds.....1,500,000

Total.....$12,500,000

Length of Road, 271 miles. Price 97½ and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. These bonds, being at well secured at this price, and large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,

No. 44 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Financial Agents,

No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the alternate inhalation of two harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first dye's use, and a permanent cure in the course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at the fountain head—restores the healthy secretions, stops the pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the nasal passages, relieves the throat from the hawking and spitting, sweetens the breath, and prevents deafness, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome malady in all its forms and stages, and is the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, 1 Wall St., N. Y.

1870—STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." NOW, 1870, at the opening of a new year, is the time to subscribe for your very best reading. For $1 50 you can have the cheapest paper in the world a whole year, and the best, as measured on a rolling standard that superb patriot enterprising "Kossuthite, Hon. Theodore Tilton, never lowers. Only $1 50 for the best and cheapest paper, every week, in the United States! Send "Specimen." Letter size, 40 long columns, 8 pages. It is the cleanest, wittiest, and the ablest weekly projected. It "ventilates" all swindlers. It is full of Fun, Fact, and Fearless Criticism. Specimen Free. If you will send 75 cents, and the superb engraving and paper are not worth you, we will return your money. Now is the Time. Only 75 cts. for a whole year—superbly engraving GRATIS, inclosed. Address "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

"The contents and illustrations are excellent."

The GERMANTOWN (Pa.) TELEGRAPH, speaks as above of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading paper of its class in New England.

TERMS: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 00, per year.

Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

R. P. EATON & CO., BOSTON MASS.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $15, $30, $60, $100, $300.

Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO.,

18 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

GOLD PENS Reputed equal to new. Warranted. Price 50 cents by mail. LEWIS H. MARTIN, 41 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS.

WITH

Numerous Illustrations by Eminent Artists,

AND

Three Characteristic Portraits.

8vo, Paper, 50 cts.; Cloth Extra, $1.

Tennyson is, without exception, the most popular of living poets. Wherever the English language is spoken, in America as in England, his poetry has already become familiar as a household word, and some volume of the many he has published is to be found in almost every library. For several years a complete cheap edition of his collected works has been the acknowledged desideratum. Messrs. Harper & Brothers, taking advantage of the recent expiration of Macfarlane's patents, have now supplied this want of public feeling, and have issued the entire works of the laureate, bound in one volume, clear and readable in type, and illustrated with many engravings after designs by Gustave Doré, Millais, Maclise, W. H. Hunt, and other eminent artists. The volume contains more than has hitherto been published, including the latest of his productions, which completes the noble cycle of Arthurian poetry, which, drawn from a fragmentary series of exquisite cabinet pictures into a magnificent tragic epic, of which the theme is the gradual dethronement of Arthur from his spiritual rule over the realm, through the sin of Guinevere and Lancelot; the spread of their leprous taint among the Knights of the Round Table; and the final Day of Doom in the Battle of Lyonnesse, when the realm was deserted by many of his own knights, and deeply wounded in the best great battle with the traitor and the heathen, vassalites into the darkness of the world beyond.

To American admirers of Tennyson this complete edition of his works, so attractive in all its features, and yet offered at a price which brings it within every body's reach, will prove most welcome.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO CLUBS.—Where SIX watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent to express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 Ann and 35 Beekman Streets, New York.

☞ Only one watch sold on Price-List.

The Byron Mystery.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Item just published:

MEDORA LEIGH.

A History and an Autobiography.

EDITED BY CHARLES MACKAY.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION,

AND A COMMENTARY ON THE CHARGES BROUGHT AGAINST LORD BYRON BY MRS. BEECHER STOWE.

8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S

Establishment for the sale of

HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, (EXCLUSIVELY,) is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.

Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Brass Work of their own manufacture. Old household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of first class makers, AT EXTRAORDINARY prices for Cash during the next thirty days; or will take from $10 to $25 per month until paid. Now is the time to buy a bargain. Second-hand Pianos for $40 and upward; New Organs for $40 and upward, for cash.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and useful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell a staple article to the trade. Address H. H. RICHARDS & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

POCKET REVOLVERS, HALL'S Breechloader,

A neat, durable weapon, for each barrel. Price $12. Address HALL & CO., Bath, Me., or 10 Broadway, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. 3 Samples free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

THE COLLINS METAL WATCH

Has proved itself the best imitation of gold we have ever seen. It is

Solid Metal,

Is not liable to get out of order, and will give general satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $15 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS.

THE LIFE OF MARY RUSSELL MITFORD, Authoress of "Our Village, &c." Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by the Rev. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 Vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

The interest of these volumes is twofold—personal and literary. Miss Mitford possessed the talent of conversation, and the discovering of remembrance than any of her writings. Her letters, like her published articles, of illustrations—and shall we add, of illustration?—of the old saying that home is the school understanding. The letters, which commence with the earliest recollections of the writer, form a full and faithful literary gossip and personal reminiscences. The style is admirable—simple, natural, graceful, and the touch of rural description reminds us of "Our Village," and the scenes it so well knows and so tenderly loves. To eliminating. Such a book allures us on from page to page with a constantly increasing charm. Moreover, the eye is attracted by a familiar name, or by a criticism which compels us to read and interest in books and men hitherto to the last. These letters illustrate Art and literature for fifty years, and are full of interest of them is the portraits, characters, and traits of distinguished people who came in their author's way.—Saturday Review.

Miss Mitford possesses the interest of this work. It is a capital example of epistolary correspondence, full of reminiscences of public characters. There is abundance of most agreeable and readable matter to satisfy all tastes.—London Observer.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST TOTALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its columns are given to Literature, Art, Social and local interest. The best artists in the country are employed to illustrate it, and its Literary Contributors and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographic Reports from the large cities of America, Europe, and the Baltic. Journal and variety of matter, HARPER'S WEEKLY is unrivalled by any weekly literature issued in this country. It has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of the most valuable features. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 419, for November 20, was commenced the new story by the author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with No. 419 from the beginning, commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for SIX.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and remarkable in the history of periodical literature, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper published. It is also admitted throughout the Union that no publication is published in NEW YORK simultaneously with their appearance in HARPER'S BAZAR.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to the Fashions, and contains Illustrations, Descriptive Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Fashion Plates are the best that can be obtained, and are published weekly in advance of other publications, and will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the high position it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in the country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Fortieth Volume. Its success illustrates—unrivaled by that of any other periodical of the day in America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents. The conductors of HARPER'S MAGAZINE in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary and artistic contributions, and in liberally adapting to its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Fiction the pencils of the most eminent artists, have but followed the demands of the age, which has developed the enormous reading public, the wonderful increase of interest in the current literature of the day, and the consequent necessity of the special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, the Record of Current Events. The elements upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that with increasing facilities for the gratification of the reading public they will be able to enhance even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred and forty original Illustrations in each number pecedent of its publication. No single agent has the disposal of the Publishers will enable them to satisfy all of the topics embraced in full force.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking the liberal support for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 52 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must remit 24 cents additional with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 52 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the Number next after the receipt of the order.

When the volumes of the MAGAZINE are bound, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give the Numbers.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of the Publishers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be replaced, and the loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $50; Half Page, $25; Quarter Page, $13—each insertion; or, for a shorter space, $2 50 per line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per line—each insertion.

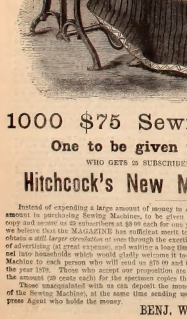
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send it free to any one who applies. Mrs. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N. J.

A CHEERFUL WALK IN THE EIGHTH AVENUE.

SPLENDID PRESENTS!



1000 $75 Sewing Machines.

One to be given to every person

WHO GETS 25 SUBSCRIBERS, AT $3 00 EACH, TO

Hitchcock's New Monthly Magazine.

Instead of expending a large amount of money in advertising our MAGAZINE, we propose to use the amount in purchasing Sewing Machines, to be given gratuitously to those who will personally exhibit a copy and secure as 25 subscribers at $3 00 each for one year. We are induced to pursue this course because we believe that the MAGAZINE has sufficient merit to commend itself wherever shown, and we prefer to obtain a still larger circulation at once through the exertions of live agents, rather than pursue a long course of advertising (at great expense), and waiting a long time for the MAGAZINE to find its way by that channel into households which would gladly welcome it to-day. Therefore we offer a first-class $75 00 Sewing Machine to each person who will send us $75 00 and the names of 25 subscribers to our MAGAZINE for the year 1870. Those who accept our proposition are requested to notify us at once, by mail, enclosing the amount (25 cents each) for the specimen copies they desire—one or more.

Those unacquainted with us can deposit the money at their Express Office (to be paid upon receipt of the Sewing Machine), at the same time sending us the list of subscribers and the receipt of the Express Agent who holds the money.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. P. Dent & Co., Watchmakers to the Queen, 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of
CORAL JEWELRY.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,
Can not be Excelled.

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED;

and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. GEORGE FREE.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

CLEANS WINDOWS, MARBLE, KNIVES.

POLISHES TIN WARE, IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

N. Y. MUSICAL PIONEER,

FOR JANUARY, 1870.

Eight pages fresh and specially Music; the same of agreeable matter. Monthly, and the best as it is the cheapest at 50c. a year. Circular free, and specimen 40c. only. Send for specimen.—F. J. HUNTINGTON & CO., 459 Broome St., New York.

Patents.

American and Foreign, promptly secured.
Send for pamphlet. No pains, free.
Address
MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
49 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

Waltham Watches.

Mr. Beecher on the Waltham Watch.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 21, 1869.

GENTLEMEN,—I am happy to make you a good report of the Waltham Watch that I procured of you. It has far exceeded my expectations, and leaves me nothing to be desired. I have had it about five months, and during that time it has been running by the side of a superlative English watch (which one of the first chronologers pronounces "the finest watch that ever came to New York"), and the Waltham Watch has run more steadily, evenly, and accurately than its foreign competitor.

I can not conceive that a better watch can be made, and I am proud of it as a specimen of American skill and industry. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

OPALINE for the Teeth, Gums & Breath.
OPALINE is reliable, efficient, and convenient.
OPALINE is sold by Druggists and dealers throughout the United States and Europe.
OPALINE is recommended by physicians & dentists. Use no other dentifrice.
Inventor and prop'r, CHAS. E. PERRY, Dentist, Worcester, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Genuine Meerschaum Goods. Stores: 819 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to latter store. Repairing and dyeing also done.

No library, however modest, should be without this work of reference.—N. Y. World.

HAYDN'S
DICTIONARY OF DATES.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the United States by American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

FOR A LIVE AMERICAN PEOPLE

VOL. XIV.—No. 684.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

MANTON MARBLE.

MR. MARBLE was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, November 16, 1855. The only circumstance worth noting in this record is the date, which shows that he was a young man of seven or eight and twenty when he assumed charge of the World, which immediately became, under his management, a powerful journal. His ancestors, on both sides, are of an old Puritan stock. They came over at an early period, one of them, WILLIAM MARBLE, having taken the freeman's oath in Boston, May 3, 1654. How much the subject of this sketch owes to his remote Puritan progenitors we can not judge: but if they were grim and forbidding, after the Puritan fashion, the repulsive severity ran out long before it reached him. We have been told that his grandfather, SOLOMON MARBLE, had even more than the Puritan strength and stolidity of purpose: a peculiarity which did not run out, though, in passing through the intermediate link, and blending with the other branch of the lineage, it slipped on a mask of winning suavity. MR. MARBLE'S parents, both of whom are living, are estimable religious people, remarkable for sterling good sense, and simple, old-fashioned cordiality.

MR. MARBLE was educated at first by his father; then at the High School in Providence, R. I.; afterward at the Albany Academy, under the principalship of Prof. GEO. H. COOK, now of Rutger's College, and State Geologist of New Jersey; and he completed his school studies at the University of Rochester, where he entered in the sophomore class January 1, 1853, and was graduated with honors in July, 1855, taking the President's prize for an essay on the Ancient and Modern Idea of a State, in which he maintained the non-interference theory of modern Democracy. The politics of a youth of twenty are likely to be right or wrong by accident. The Democratic sentiments of the prize essay only prove that in the greater maturity of his faculties MR. MARBLE saw no reason to change his politics. He probably got his bias from his early surroundings, and the admiration felt by the Baptist communion, to which his parents belonged, for ROGER WILLIAMS, in whose history and opinions we should expect to find the pedigree of MR. MARBLE'S political views. More creditable to him than his early Democracy is the fact that he was the favorite pupil of that distinguished educator and very able man, Dr. M. B. ANDERSON, the President of the University, between whom and MR. MARBLE a warm friendship has since continued to subsist.

Immediately on leaving college, MR. MARBLE went to Boston and embarked in journalism; at first accepting a place on the staff of the Boston Journal, and afterward becoming the responsible editor of the Courier. In 1856 he came to New York, on the Evening Post, then edited by MR. BRYANT, MR. BIGELOW, and WILLIAM STORY THAYER (afterward United States Consul General to Egypt). He continued his connection with the Evening Post until the World was established, in June, 1860. He spent the summer and autumn of 1859 in traveling and buffalo hunting in Northwestern British America; and, besides his letters to the Evening Post, he made a record of his trip with pen and pencil, in a series of illustrated papers published in Harper's Magazine, in 1860, under the title "To Red River and Beyond."

The World was started by a company of gentlemen belonging to the "evangelical" denominations, with a view to make that great diffusor of intelligence, the daily press, a vehicle of Christian influence. In politics its prospectus announced that it would be independent. In 1860, estimable editor MR. JAMES R. SPALDING (then recently of the Courier and Enquirer, a Conservative Whig until the Whig party was defunct), in conscientious pursuance of the no-party promise of the prospectus; and, as no man with any brains in his head could be really neutral in such a crisis as was then coming, the writing force of the paper was like a divided team, a pair hitched to each end of the coach. The paper pleased no body by its politics, and the temper of the times permitted it to please nobody long by its religion. In less than two years it sunk $200,000 of capital. Its despairing owners, seeing no end of the drain, tried to sell the establishment to Republican politicians and journalists, entering into several fruitless negotiations for that purpose; among other parties, with MR. THURLOW WEED. At last, April 12, 1862, they sold it to MR. MARBLE at a price but little above the value of the presses, types, and material.

MANTON MARBLE.—(PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, NEW YORK.)

This brings us to a new epoch in MR. MARBLE'S history, in which he displayed qualities little suspected by some persons who had previously known him.

MR. MARBLE'S connection with the World commenced, as we have stated, when the paper was bankrupt, in the summer of 1862. To a stranger he would have seemed, at this time, a young man of a quick, excitable temperament, captivating address, and a refinement almost fastidious in his personal tastes. He enjoyed a good joke, and was clever at a pert repartee. On a nearer intimacy he seemed very companionable and affectionate. But at that time he gave no other evidence that his mind was strong, as well as refined and alert, than a keen partisanship for the metaphysical doctrines of Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON, which he had studied with great care, and for which he was always ready to take up the gauntlet. He handled the heavy weapons of that kind of controversy with surprising dexterity and ease for so young a man. The range of his curiosity was wide: but, apart from metaphysics, it concerned itself mostly with current events and elegant literature. His extensive reading in political economy, jurisprudence, and history was of subsequent growth. At that early period an assemblage of light accomplishments, which set very easily upon him, obscured the robuster features of his mind.

But his real strength began to appear (and he needed it all) when he undertook to lift, and carry upon his juvenile shoulders, the establishment which the experienced veterans to whom it had been offered thought too far gone to be saved. He immediately reorganized its staff, boldly increased its expenses for news, and put it on the political course which it has since pursued. In the autumn of 1862 he formed a joint-stock company for its publication, selling shares of the establishment, but retaining a controlling interest. It was in the first few months following this change that his character came out in full relief, resembling what is sometimes observed in the other sex when a sudden weight of responsibility transforms giddiness at once into full womanhood. His co-proprietors were six or seven Democrats, all men of wealth and great business experience; some of them active, veteran politicians. As was natural, they expected to mould the policy of the paper and shape its course. Its young editor supposed that function belonged to him. Articles and communications which they sent him for insertion were revised with as free a hand, or rejected with as firm a decision, as if they had come from unknown outsiders. This was more than independence, it was wilfulness; for if the paper had fallen under the control of mere politicians, it would soon have been among the wrecks which are scattered along the journalistic history of the last thirty years.

The Democratic bosses, however, Democratic enough. It provoked the highest indignation of the Republican party. It outstripped all its Democratic contemporaries in high and bitter denunciation of some of the leading and favorite measures of Mr. LINCOLN'S administration. We prefer to pass lightly over Mr. MARBLE'S politics, in which this journal can find little to commend; to bring the sole purpose of this sketch to exhibit the man, and explain his personal success. But although there can appear in these columns only repudiation of his politics, we must recognize his just sense of the dignity of his profession, and his superiority to control by office-seeking politicians. The fact that he has kept no terms with the Tammany Ring, when his subserviency or even his silence might have enabled him to share their gains, shows that he is a politician of no vulgar order. His refusal to advocate Mr. PENDLETON'S greenback theory, after it had been indorsed in the national Democratic platform, and his advice to substitute a new candidate for General BLAIR, after the October elections had proved that the party, with him on the ticket, was foredoomed to defeat, are well-known illustrations of his steadiness and independence.

In January, 1869, Mr. MARBLE purchased back the shares of the World with which he started in 1862, and became its sole proprietor.

In May, 1864, Mr. MARBLE was married to DELIA B. WEST, daughter of the late IRA WEST, of Rochester; a lady of remarkable intelligence, sweetness, and grace, womanly elevation of character, and fine moral intuitions. She died in June, 1865, leaving two children. All who ever knew her cherish her memory with loving reverence.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1870.

THE POPE OF ROME AND AMERICAN SCHOOLS.

THE Rev. Mr. PRESTON, a Roman Catholic clergyman of New York, recently delivered a lecture upon "the Catholic [by which is meant Roman Catholic] view of the Public School Question." We have not yet had the Methodist, or Congregational, or Baptist, or Unitarian, or Presbyterian view. Nor shall we have it; and for the sufficient reason that it is not a religious or ecclesiastical or denominational question. The schools are open to all as citizens; not as Quakers, or Roman Catholics, or Jews. Mr. PRESTON is requested to have denied any desire upon the part of Roman Catholics to break down the American Common School system. That may be true of those who are not clergymen, but it is certainly not true of the Roman Catholic priesthood. They do not wish to break down the system, because they can control it. But if they can not, does Mr. PRESTON say or think that they would not be opposed to the system?

His own remarks furnish the answer to the question. Immediately after saying that Roman Catholics—which term, of course, includes the clergy—do not wish to break down the system, Mr. PRESTON said, according to the report: "The Pope, in the syllabus condemning modern errors, especially censures the doctrine that public schools are to be removed from the control of the clergy." Catholic Republicans, therefore, can not conscientiously allow their children to frequent those schools." Now the people of this country and of this State have forbidden all sectarianism in the public schools. Are they or the Pope of Rome to regulate the subject? Mr. PRESTON says that the zeal of a small Italian state is opposed to our public school system, and therefore certain American citizens can not send their children to the schools. And this small Italian ruler of a domain whose population is especially ignorant, superstitious, and idle, says that a necessary part of the public school money of the United States must be surrendered to a class of agents of his, American citizens, or at least subjects, who acknowledge a spiritual allegiance to him which compels them to oppose the American school system.

The answer to Mr. PRESTON'S address is, that the people of this State and of the United States do not care whether the Pope likes their Common School system or not. They have tried it for a century, more or less, and they are satisfied. They look across the sea at the conditions of the Pope, or to the countries in which he has been allowed to have his way, and they do not behold a condition of the people which inspires their admiration or stimulates them to imitation. They see that the most ignorant countries in Europe—the countries in which there is the least general comfort, intelligence, industry, peace, and prosperity—are the Papal states and Spain under its late Papal regime. And, knowing the intimate and vital relation between the public schools and the general welfare, the very last system for which they would wish to change their own is that which prevails in those countries.

Again, looking over the ocean, the American people see Austria, which had been long subject to ecclesiastical domination, recoiling from the humiliating field of Sadowa, instinctively feeling that the cause of its defeat is its absolute subjugation to ecclesiastical rule, which eats away the manliness of any people, and striking at the heart of its shame by removing the schools from clerical supervisory. The American people say, therefore, to the Pope and his agents: "If you do not choose to have your children educated in our free schools —if you will let them wallow in ignorance rather than grow up in intelligence—if you insist that they shall stay away, unless we will give you money to educate them in your peculiar religious views, to be it. We have jails as well as schools; and if you prefer to fit your children for prison rather than to make them, at our expense, intelligent citizens, so be it again. But so long as we understand the principles of our government, so long as we can see the consequences of our system, and in our own country the result of ours, so long we shall decline to support sectarian schools by giving to each sect a share of the school money."

Mr. PRESTON, in the report of his address, said, that the early subversion by the Jews, of Pope, the chief bishop of his church, is willing that other denominations, which desire to organize societies with equal rights, should enjoy the same privilege. Undoubtedly; but the Pope does not in the remotest degree "comprehend American institutions." He can hardly believe that what they call the religious, or more truly the ecclesiastical authority, should be to remain in the State, America will say, "Yes, and insist, that the state shall have no religion, but shall protect every citizen in the exercise of his chosen religion with equal care to the rights of every other. The Jews-house of the Chinese, the synagogue of the Jew, the mosque-house of the Mohammedan denomination, the shrine-house of the Jew, the Jews-house, or the meeting-house tries to go further and ask for religious patronage as well as protection, the state shakes it off and says, "Hands off! My independence is essential to the liberty of all my people."

This is a truth which the Pope can never learn. And, on the other hand, the Pope can never teach the American people any thing about free common schools.

VIRGINIA AND CONGRESS.

THE debate in the Senate upon the admission of Virginia was very animated, and ended in a passage of peculiar bitterness between Senators TRUMBULL and SUMNER. Mr. TRUMBULL declared that Mr. SUMNER'S charges and statements after they had been disproved, and in general undertook to brow-beat the Senate very much in the manner of the old slave-master. Mr. SUMNER retorted that Mr. TRUMBULL had opposed all efforts to help the colored citizen, and was the representative of the Jim Crow Klan; and, moreover, that he made a technical argument to screen the criminal ANDREW JOHNSON. Senator TRUMBULL replied, that Mr. SUMNER had spoken the question was taken, and the bill was passed by a strict Republican vote. It will, probably, have been considered by the House before this paper is issued.

The ground taken by those who were opposed to the admission of Virginia under the original act was, that if Congress may reconstruct a State, and finds before the work is done that there is some serious defect in the system proposed—some vital omission in the measures adopted—it may and should consider the object of the whole action, and not consider itself and imperil the country upon mere technical grounds. In its strongest form this argument is, that if Congress has made a law that a State shall be admitted upon certain conditions, and the State has conformed to the conditions, but Congress discovers before giving the last order that it has not done all that it should have done to secure the objects for which it imposed the conditions, it may re-open the subject, and impose others which will secure it. To this it is replied that Congress by its law imposing conditions makes a solemn compact with the State, and has bound itself in honor to accept the State whenever it conforms, because, if it may decline to admit the State after it has complied with the set of conditions, so it may decline after another similar compliance; and it is urged that Virginia has in many respects done all that was permitted to representation now than it had last summer.

Of course the only answer to this argument which can be urged is the renewed assertion that the nature of the case imposes upon Congress the utmost care, and that the moments before the admission is actually accomplished, if there be good reason to fear that the public welfare will be imperiled by admission, the public safety and the rights of all the people in Virginia were not endangered by the admission without further conditions; and that, even if they were, a much more fatal peril to the whole country was the withdrawal of the country from its solemnly-pledged word. If Congress may break faith with the people of Virginia, why not with the public creditor? If it may repudiate one contract, why not another? And how is its promise to the public creditor to pay more binding than its promise to the Virginia citizen to admit? The complications involved in the imposition of fresh conditions seems to be that Congress is the judge whether its word shall be kept or broken. It is certainly not too much to say, that no such principle in government can be honorably maintained. Nor can the strict observance by Congress of the terms imposed by itself, in so serious a public act, be called "technical" compliance. And what excuse can there be for not incorporating in the original act the conditions now adopted, which cover the main points that Senators always wished to secure?

In many ways, we have never been impatient for the restoration of any State, whether "a grand old commonwealth" or not, until the great fundamental amendment had been secured by the conditions precedent. There is a great deal, indeed, that can not be done by legislation without careful revision; but there is a great deal that can. It is not possible by law to make the late slaveholding class friendly to the late slaves; but it is quite practicable to prevent abuse of the colored citizens under the forms of law. If the various methods of abuse were only to be ascertained by waiting and experiment, that was an admirable reason for delay, but none whatever for a conclusive action which was also premature. If, however, such action were taken, there remained the ethical question whether the country loses more by admitting Virginia under inadequate conditions, than by breaking its pledged faith. If, indeed, it has been shown that its faith was not pledged, or that Virginia had not complied with the original conditions, we have been so unfortunate as to overlook the fact.

THE GOLD CONSPIRACY INVESTIGATION.

NOR the least important of the tasks which Congress has before it is the investigation of the gold conspiracy which created such wide-spread confusion and ruin in September last. History contains few examples of so baleful a plot against the interests of a commercial people. It is not too much to say that this entire mercantile community, from the heaviest dry-goods jobbers in New York to the small jobber in St. Louis or Cincinnati, were victims of the conspiracy. Some lost money which they could ill spare, others sacrificed half their capital to save the other half, and many left their last dollar in the Gold Room. Nor were the farmers spared. By forcing up the price of gold against its natural tendency, the conspirators produced a decided lock in the domestic exchange market; and hence just at the season when Great Britain required grain from abroad, and we are prepared to supply the demand, it was impossible to sell half, and consequently to ship. Prussia and the Baltic countries made swift haste to profit by the accident, by which they could undersell us, and by the time our exchange market returned to its normal condition, the foreign demand no longer existed. Cotton, in a great measure, the heavy decline in wheat this winter. The sur plus which farmers had sent forward for export being thrown back on the domestic market, produced a glut which has caused wheat to decline to $1 15 in this city, 75 cents at Chicago, and 60 and 65 cents in the place of production, in Iowa and Minnesota. The September conspiracy was a crime, not only against the merchant and farmer, but against the nation itself. For several days the value of the national money was so unsettled as to recall the darkest days of the war. The financial credit was so grossly shaken that foreigners did not recover their faith in it for some weeks after the conspiracy. Who could be induced to place confidence in a currency which the artifices of a few designing knaves could depreciate ten or fifteen per cent. in a single day?

If the laws which we have—imperfect as they are—were faithfully administered, it might not be necessary for Congress to take this inquest. But be is either very bold or very unsophisticated who appeals to the courts of law in New York against the Erie Tammany Ring. The crime was yet fresh in our ears when a shower of injunctions from Judges BARNARD and CARdozo secured the criminals at least, temporary immunity. An investigation by the Grand Jury followed—so skillfully managed that the conspirators were soon summoned to tell their story, and those who could have proved their guilt were not wanted at all. Twenty-one subpœnas were issued for GOULD, and not one for ALBERT SEYERS. Do not, however, fall into the common error of supposing that the investigation is useless. It is developed the fact that the conspirators were liable to prosecution under the Conspiracy law; and as a time might come when the Grand Jury summoned, District Attorney would fill the office of Judge GARVIN, the Legislature no sooner met than the very first measure taken by them was a bill to repeal the Conspiracy law—of course in the interest of the working-men and trades unions.

It was therefore a necessity, if any inquiry was ever to be instituted into the great crime of September, that the work should be done by Congress. When the resolution was first introduced, the intention was to cast a slur on the President and his friends and office-holders. With a view to this purpose Mr. GOODRICH could did not declare the challenge. Every one knows that fying the resolution so as to divest it of its offensive features, and to extend the field of inquiry to a wider range, he passed and referred it to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

This Committee, to which Congress is very properly referring all measures touching the currency, contains some of the best men in the House, and but little "light timber." The chairman is General JOHN A. GARFIELD, of Ohio, at one time during the war Chief-of-Staff to General ROSECRANS, and since well known as a lawyer. He is one of the hardest workers in Congress. Other members are Mr. JUDD, of Illinois, the personal friend of Mr. LINCOLN; Mr. CONGER, of Michigan, cool and clear-headed; Mr. LYNCH, of Maine, one of the strongest men on the Committee; Mr. BUTLER, of Kentucky, and others of like stamp.

The Committee commenced its inquiries about a fortnight since. Ignoring the examination of them by General Dix in that city, they began by ascertaining from a few well-informed persons the general history of the conspiracy. Passing from general to particular facts, they next sought to ascertain from the Ring brokers how the operations of the Ring were carried on, how many gold they bought, and how they disposed of it; and lastly, with the light derived from these inquiries, to proceed to the examination of FISK and GOULD—the chiefs of the conspiracy—with some prospect of ascertaining the truth. Some time must elapse before the results of all the general inquiry are made known. It is probable that their investigation will be in no hurry to close their investigations as long as any material witnesses remain to be examined, or any essential facts continue unexplained. It is more than likely that, before the report is made, Congress will find it necessary to exert its power to compel the attendance of some of the minor conspirators, who will naturally prefer withholding their share of the performance, and thus far refuse to obey the summons of the Sergeant-at-Arms. But, as the House, as a Congressional committee, witnesses are not allowed to refuse to answer questions on the ground that their answer would criminate themselves. Some of the witnesses who have been summoned may, therefore, be placed in the unpleasant dilemma of choosing between perjury and self-criminating of guilt. But these persons need expect no favors from the Committee. It is General GARFIELD'S policy to ascertain the truth, and those who know him need not be assured that he will accomplish it—however tedious the task may prove, and however harsh measures the pertinacity of guilty men may compel him to adopt.

Enough is known of the evidence already obtained to warrant a certain belief that the chief of the conspiracy were the men known as the Erie clique; that they bought four times as much gold as was in the city at the close of the Sub-treasury; that certain subordinate government officials and lobby men—but no official in the Administration—were in the ring; that with them; that their plot was consummated with the direct aid of one city bank, and by means of the facilities afforded by others; that the government sale of gold had little or nothing to do with the collapse of the movement; that the corner would probably have failed with every one connected with it but for the determination of the conspirators to sacrifice SEYERS and BELDEN, in order to save the rest; that these two men were sent into the Gold Room to buy all the gold they could at 140, 150, and 160, for the express purpose that they should never pay for what they bought, while other Ring brokers were sent into the same market at the same time with orders to sell as fast as it could sell below 140, and not on any account to sell to SEYERS or BELDEN. That the Gold Exchange Bank submitted a commission of so gross an outrage as this is due to the fact that it has been enjoined by Judge BARNARD from executing its corporate powers; and as to the victims of the conspiracy, they have been in some cases enjoined by the same judge from prosecuting their claims before the ordinary tribunals, and, in others, met by pleas of delay or the statute of frauds, which secure, at all events, indefinite delay to the conspirators.

Some of the papers sneeringly ask: What good will come of the investigation? Can Congress punish the knave?

Unfortunately not. But it will not be a slight gain if the Committee should furnish the public with a complete body of sworn testimony on the subject, so clear and connected that any reasonable some of the victims to make the conspirators punishable for their acts in courts not controlled by the Erie Ring. It is said that among the victims are some men who can resist, from the length of their purses, but should tend to show the danger of the present system of over-certing by banks. It is in evidence that the Erie Ring owned a bank, and obtained from it on September 23d certificates to an amount so vastly in excess of its capital that it could not have paid five cents on the dollar had the collapse occurred twenty-four hours before. It is surely within the province of Congress to regulate a matter of this kind, and to render it impossible for a party of speculators to buy up a bank with a capital of half a million, and then to obtain from it certification—in other words, money—to the extent of twenty or thirty millions. Whether the disastrous speculation of September could have taken place without the agency of the Gold Exchange Bank, and if it could not, whether some restrictions can or should be placed upon the working of that institution, will be matters for the Committee to determine according to the evidence.

The country has practically committed to General GARFIELD and his associates supreme control over the banking interests and the currency; whatever recommendations they may make to Congress will in all probability be adopted and embodied in laws. It is unreasonable to expect them to foresee all the accidents which are likely to occur so long as our currency remains inconvertible. But they owe it to the nation to inform themselves thoroughly regarding the accidents which have occurred, and to take all proper precautions against their repetition.

"THE RESPECT DUE" TO ROBERT E. LEE.

THE NEW YORK World, in speaking of the public visit of ROBERT E. LEE to Portland, to attend the funeral ceremonies of HOWARD COLLOMB, says: "From what we find in the New England papers on the subject, we are sure that he will be as honored participant in the ceremonies. All the animosities of other days will be buried, at least for the time being, on this mournful occasion, and the people of Massachusetts will receive the distinguished man with the respect due to his own character and the circumstances of his visit." But certainly ROBERT E. LEE is no more a "distinguished man" than JEFFERSON DAVIS. If respect is "due" to the character of a man who remained in the military family of the General-in-Chief of the country's armies until he had learned all his command secrets, and then resigned his commission in order to advance his country's foes and destroy its government that human slavery might be extended and perpetuated, then it is certain, by not less due to the man who practised even the enterprise. If ROBERT E. LEE is to be an "honored participant" upon the occasion in question, the publication of JEFFERSON DAVIS should be more honored.

What is "the respect due to his own character" in the case of LEE? The circumstances of his career are not forgotten; nor will they be omitted by history. The massilin sentimentality that saluted him when he was described as "a Christian hero," and which stigmatizes the soldiers of the Union as LINCOLN'S hirelings—that cowardly frivolity that called the rebel chief "the great captain," will not affect the truthful record of the war. No rhetoric about "honest difference" will conceal the fact that Colonel LEE, the confidential aid of General SCOTT, remained as long as practicable in the most intimate relations with the War Office, wrote to his sister that he did not think there was any reason for hostilities, and then, professing allegiance to the State, immediately engaged in those hostilities, the object of which was the overthrow of the government and the unrestrained liberty of himself and his associates to traffic in human beings. The attempt to liken such a cause and its abettors to that of FALKLAND and the cavaliers, of JOHN HAMPDEN and the Parliament, is an inexpressible absurdity.

Robert E. LEE is in no honorable sense a "distinguished man." In no sense could he be "an honored participant" in the ceremonies described, and "the respect due to his own character" is that which is due to JEFFERSON DAVIS, to JAMES M. MASON, to ROBERT TOOMBS, and to HOWELL COBB. We repeat what we have said upon every occasion when the attempt is made to throw LEE into further publicity, that it is a fatal mistake. The great people of the United States, who have saved their government and liberty, will permit him to remain in the obscurity into which he has fallen. But the effort to represent him as a hero to be honored, as a citizen to be respected, as a man in any noble or generous sense heroic or desirable sense "distinguished," is an effort at public demoralization which shall not pass unexposed. The Boston citizens by whom LEE was MAGNUDEN to their dinner, may beg to be allowed the honor of respectfully escorting ROBERT E. LEE through the streets by which the noblest of Boston youth marched to return no more. But self-respecting American citizens, who cherish no vindictive feeling toward LEE and the baffled rebels, will not therefore think it necessary or decent to honor them as distinguished men, as patriots, or as public benefactors.

WITHIN AND WITHOUT THE COUNCIL.

MR. RIPLEY, in one of his interesting letters from Rome to the Tribune, speaks of a late sermon preached in that city by Archbishop MANNING, who is the chief English representative in the Œcumenical Council. The Archbishop takes the extremest ground for the absolute Papal supremacy, as the consequence of his infallibility. It is understood that Dr. MANNING's influence with the Pope is very great, and his sermon is so entirely in accordance with the Pope's Bull on Ecommunications, of which we recently published a description, that it may be regarded as the manifest of the Papal policy in the Council. That policy is the declaration of infallibility; and the substance of the dogma of infallibility is that the Pope is by Divine ordinance not only the spiritual chief of his Church, but the absolute and irresponsible head of all human governments.

The consequences of this assumption, and its folly, when viewed historically, are most powerfully stated in a letter from Dr. DÖLLINGER, of Munich, a work written by German Roman Catholic scholars who are wholly opposed to the new dogma, to his friend and fellow-professor here in the Church. To Protestants this is the most remarkable Roman Catholic work of the time. As an historical exposition of the Papacy it is masterly and unanswerable. As a blow delivered from within the Church at the Jesuit and reactionary influence which controls it, it is unparalleled. It is necessary to read it in order to understand how profoundly stirred to its very depths is the Roman Church at this moment.

The Papal intention in calling the Council was to warn mankind against the danger of the progress of civilization; to engage it in the most unnatural and monstrous endeavor to subjugate liberty of thought and political freedom to the whim of any ignorant monk or priest who may be made Pope. The power of the Church over its members is very great; but it seems hardly possible that the men whom MONTALEMBERT and HYACINTHE are representatives can acquiesce in the declarations of the Pope. Should it be proclaimed, Father HYACINTHE and the whole liberal Catholic party must utterly recant or leave the Church. And as the proclamation is the long-cherished purpose of the governing influence which has long been supreme in the Roman Church, it is most probable that it will be made.

At this moment of intense and universal interest in the world of religious Rome comes the announcement that the Bull of EXCOMMUNICATION, which will be issued immediately by the HARPERS. Its scene is laid in Rome, and it is the most important event in the life of the Papal Italy of what he believes to be the crafty, cruel, sensual, and soul-destroying system of priestcraft. The Pope foreshadows the temporal supremacy by excommunicating those who shall appeal from his decision to that of a council, and all their abettors. And a single regard for humanity, or for fine profuseness made when out of power, there is not such faith to be found elsewhere, as in the Pope. The moment he supposes that the order of the city of New York and the rights of its citizens would be as well protected by the police as would inevitably be appointed by the local Ring masters, he would withdraw from it. We have had no chance since FERNANDO WOOD and his men in 1857, rather than under ACTON and his men in 1862. When the local Ring masters control the Governor and the Legislature, it is of less importance where the police is appointed. But the sole question with those gentry will be, not what have we promised or professed, but how can we make the most of the situation for ourselves? When GOVERNOR HOFFMAN talked about the honesty of the new Legislature, did "Smith" really believe that? Or did not even he know that Republicans, and that the scent to unchecked power of MR. SWEENY, MR. TWEED, and their associates was an actual advantage to the State?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 17.—In the Senate the House bill of last session, prohibiting the assignment of soldiers' claims to duty on full pay, was passed. Mr. Sumner introduced a resolution for the full recognition of international telegraphic communication, and reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the Civil Rights Amendment, providing that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Mr. Conkling moved that the amendment be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to report a bill for its execution. The motion was agreed to. The House bill to amend the Supreme Court to the number of nine was passed. Mr. Sherman introduced a bill to repeal the act creating the Legal-Tender Clause. Mr. Pomeroy introduced a bill for the election of three Police Commissioners in New York by the Legislature. The Senate bill to amend the Judiciary was passed in regard to the encroachments of the New Jersey Railway Company upon the harbor of New York.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

EX-Secretary Seward was received at Havana, on his way home from his long journey on the Pacific Coast, with the highest honors accompanied by the Spanish officials, and on the 18th of January was serenaded by the Germania band, and replying to a welcoming address, Mr. Seward said he daily saw something to admire in the Spanish character.

The Elevated Railroad Company will run from Brooklyn and the Sth, and by Mississippi on the 16th of February.

Postmaster-General Creswell has made arrangements for a direct mail service between Canada from New York city to Europe, by the steamers of the Hamburg line. He secures a speedy tri-weekly mail communication.

A severe tornado, accompanied by a heavy flood, recently swept over the West, causing great destruction of life and property, especially in Kentucky. A great part of Louisville was submerged by the flood, and many houses carried away. Mr. Seward, while over twenty lives were lost. Many other disasters are reported. Advices have been received that Senate bound over Mr. Mumford, the former for the long and the latter for the short term. W. H. Rhoads, Crockett, a prominent Democrat of Memphis, has been chosen Senator for the term expiring March, 1871, to which Mr. Starkey was elected, but not admitted.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE trial of Rochefort was very brief, and resulted in his conviction. He was sentenced to imprisonment for six months and to pay a fine of 3,000 francs. Execution of his political rights, though he still remains a deputy.

An alarming outbreak occurred on the 18th of January among the workmen at Le Creusot, France. The largest iron-manufacturing establishment in the world. Some of the workmen, discovering workmen were employed, went to the factory to restore the old rate of wages. The police refused to interfere with the workmen. A terrible accident, by which a number of persons were killed, added to the excitement. Troops were at once sent to the disaffected district, and the disturbances ceased. It is reported that quiet is very serious, was suppressed.

Prussian, the murderer of the Klinck family, was executed at Paris January 19. The last words he uttered were: "I am innocent of these crimes." Preparations were taken to prevent a disturbance, and consequently the execution passed off without incident.

An assessory for offenses against the press in France will be issued, and a proposed new law regulating the journalism is to be submitted to the Corps Legislatif.

The Œcumenical Council is still occupied with the discussion of the Schema. Letters from Rome state that the American Archbishops are endeavoring to modify the infallibility, alleging that it will check progress and civilization in the United States. Most of the members of the Council have refused to sign a petition in favor of the infallibility. The Archbishops opponents are preparing a counter petition, believing that it must meet with support enough to defeat it.

Advices received in London from Baker's African Expedition up to January 1 are to the effect that the party had arrived at the head waters of the Nile, and were all in good health.

A correspondence between Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame has been published in Berlin. Prussia accepts Imperial Chinese Embassy, and Mr. Burlingame is to be its chief. He is to be its guarantor of order and of safety. Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame are of the opinion that Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame are of the opinion that the Embassy may be received in Berlin, and there is reason to suppose that the Chinese Treaty has been satisfactorily arranged.

January 19.—The Senate, by a vote of 40 to 16, adopted Mr. Edmunds's amendment to the Virginia bill, requiring the imposition of an oath of the State officers that they are eligible under the Fourteenth Amendment.—In the House the concurrent resolution for an adjournment on the second Monday in April was rejected. A bill was introduced providing for a Centennial Exhibition.

January 20.—In the Senate the status of the Brownsville-Matamoras General Nathaniel Greene was formally presented by Congress by Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island. Among the bills introduced was one incorporating the Nicaraguan Postal Company, with extensive duties and powers. No progress was made on the Virginia bill.—In the House a bill was introduced by Mr. Bingham making it a penal offense for any person to prejudge or prevent the action of a State legislature in ratifying any proposed constitutional amendment. Resolutions of the resolutions were declaring the absence of constitutional authority in making treaties with the Dominican Republic, Hayti, and Liberia without the action of Congress.

January 21.—In the Senate, the discussion on the Virginia bill was closed, and the vote taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Drake was adopted, which requires the disfranchisement of the officers of that State, and prohibits any change or amendment to the State Constitution to deprive citizens of the right of franchise who are now entitled to vote, except as a punishment for crime. A further amendment, by Mr. Drake, imposing further conditions that the State shall never deprive any citizen, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, from holding office, adopted—yeas 33, nays 16. A third amendment, by Mr. Wilson, in regard to the school fund, was also adopted—yeas 33, nays 16. The amendment as thus amended was then adopted—yeas 33, nays 16, the Senate setting forth that Virginia had adopted a Constitution republican in form, and that the persons duly elected under it had ratified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments in good faith, and were entitled to representation. This substitute was adopted—yeas 33, nays 16. The bill, as amended, was then passed to a third reading by a vote of yeas 41, nays 8.—In the House, no important business of importance was transacted.

January 22.—The Senate was not in session, and in the House the day was devoted to the discussion and disposition of business on the state of the Union, in Committee of the Whole.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

January 18.—In the Senate a bill was introduced to incorporate the Lenox Library, in New York city. In the Assembly no bill was introduced.

January 19.—In the Senate Mr. Tweed reported a bill to amend the charter relating to the government of New York city.—In the Assembly several bills to provide for the better government of New York city were introduced, but nothing of importance was done.

January 20.—In the Senate a bill was passed to amend the charter of the city of Brooklyn. The New York City Excise Law was considered in Committee of the Whole.—In the Assembly Mr. Creamer gave notice of a bill to repeal the act creating the Metropolitan Police District, and providing for the election of three Police Commissioners in New York by the Legislature. The Excise Bill was introduced: To repeal the act exempting milkmen from taxation; for the abolition of Commissioners and the establishment of a police force in Brooklyn; to repeal the act to provide for the sale of Staten Island; to sell the Senate's Retreat at Staten Island. The resolution to refer to the Committee of the whole the Brooklyn obsequies was amended so as to consist of three members from each district. The vote on the resolution as amended was then carried—yeas 74, nays 24.

January 21.—Nothing of importance was done in the Senate.—In the Assembly the Excise Bill in Committee of the Whole was further considered. The Senate bill incorporating the Lenox Library was passed.

January 22.—Nothing of importance was done in the Senate.—In the Assembly the Excise Bill in Committee of the Whole was further considered. The Senate bill incorporating the Lenox Library was passed.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

EX-Secretary Seward was received at Havana, on his way home from his long journey on the Pacific Coast, with the highest honors accompanied by the Spanish officials, and on the 18th of January was serenaded by the Germania band, and replying to a welcoming address, Mr. Seward said he daily saw something to admire in the Spanish character.

The Elevated Railroad Company will run from Brooklyn and the Sth, and by Mississippi on the 16th of February.

Postmaster-General Creswell has made arrangements for a direct mail service between Canada from New York city to Europe, by the steamers of the Hamburg line. He secures a speedy tri-weekly mail communication.

A severe tornado, accompanied by a heavy flood, recently swept over the West, causing great destruction of life and property, especially in Kentucky. A great part of Louisville was submerged by the flood, and many houses carried away. Mr. Seward, while over twenty lives were lost. Many other disasters are reported. Advices have been received that Senate bound over Mr. Mumford, the former for the long and the latter for the short term. W. H. Rhoads, Crockett, a prominent Democrat of Memphis, has been chosen Senator for the term expiring March, 1871, to which Mr. Starkey was elected, but not admitted.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE trial of Rochefort was very brief, and resulted in his conviction. He was sentenced to imprisonment for six months and to pay a fine of 3,000 francs. Execution of his political rights, though he still remains a deputy.

An alarming outbreak occurred on the 18th of January among the workmen at Le Creusot, France. The largest iron-manufacturing establishment in the world. Some of the workmen, discovering workmen were employed, went to the factory to restore the old rate of wages. The police refused to interfere with the workmen. A terrible accident, by which a number of persons were killed, added to the excitement. Troops were at once sent to the disaffected district, and the disturbances ceased. It is reported that quiet is very serious, was suppressed.

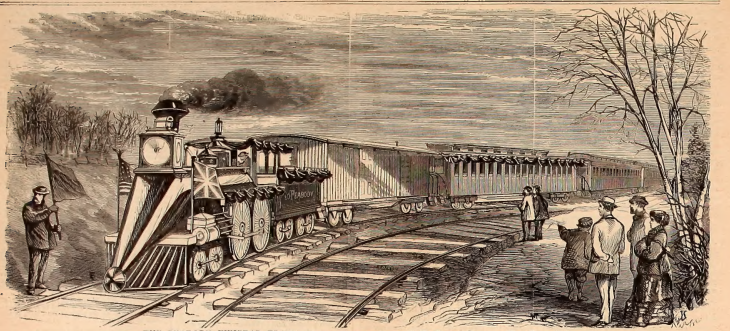
Prussian, the murderer of the Klinck family, was executed at Paris January 19. The last words he uttered were: "I am innocent of these crimes." Preparations were taken to prevent a disturbance, and consequently the execution passed off without incident.

An assessory for offenses against the press in France will be issued, and a proposed new law regulating the journalism is to be submitted to the Corps Legislatif.

The Œcumenical Council is still occupied with the discussion of the Schema. Letters from Rome state that the American Archbishops are endeavoring to modify the infallibility, alleging that it will check progress and civilization in the United States. Most of the members of the Council have refused to sign a petition in favor of the infallibility. The Archbishops opponents are preparing a counter petition, believing that it must meet with support enough to defeat it.

Advices received in London from Baker's African Expedition up to January 1 are to the effect that the party had arrived at the head waters of the Nile, and were all in good health.

A correspondence between Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame has been published in Berlin. Prussia accepts Imperial Chinese Embassy, and Mr. Burlingame is to be its chief. He is to be its guarantor of order and of safety. Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame are of the opinion that Count Bismarck and Mr. Burlingame are of the opinion that the Embassy may be received in Berlin, and there is reason to suppose that the Chinese Treaty has been satisfactorily arranged.



THE PEABODY FUNERAL TRAIN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY J. W. BLACK, BOSTON.—[SEE PAGE 87.]

THE BEGGAR AT THE DOOR.
ONE OF ANDERSON'S EARLY WOOD-CUTS.

ALEXANDER ANDERSON, M.D.

IN the death of DR. ANDERSON, who breathed his last on the 17th of January, at the residence of his son-in-law, in Jersey City, the bookmaker's craft and the world of book-readers have lost a long-familiar friend—a man whose genius, not meteoric in splendor, but planet-like in its effulgence, has burned in our firmament with steady lustre for almost three generations.

DR. ANDERSON was the pioneer engraver on wood in America. He was the virtual inventor of the art on this side of the Atlantic. His name has been familiar to booksellers and readers in America from the beginning of the present century, and the mysterious little monogram "A.A." in the corners of wood-cuts in educational books has attracted the attention of millions of children in our schools and at our firesides when experiencing the delight of his pictures.

ALEXANDER ANDERSON,
ENGRAVED BY HIMSELF IN HIS EIGHTY-FIRST YEAR.

DR. ANDERSON was of Scotch descent, his father being a native of Scotland. He was born near Beekman's Slip, New York city, on the 21st of April, 1775, two days after the first bloodshed in the old war for independence had occurred at Lexington and Concord. His father differed in politics from most of his countrymen in America at that time, who were generally distinguished for their loyalty to the king; and at the time of ALEXANDER'S birth he was the publisher of a republican newspaper in the city of New York, called The Constitutional Gazette. He continued to publish it in opposition to the ministerial papers of RIVINGTON and GAINE until the autumn of 1776, when the British took possession of New York city. Then the "rebel printer" was compelled to fly, with his books and printing materials, nearly all of which were lost before he reached a place of absolute safety in Connecticut.

WILLIAM AND AMELIA IN THE ORCHARD.
ONE OF ANDERSON'S EARLY WOOD-CUTS.

ENFORCING THE WHISKY LAWS IN THE MOUNTAINS OF WEST VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 87.]

At the age of twelve years young ANDERSON began to use the graver for his own amusement. He was a timid lad, shrunk from asking questions, and gained information by silent and modest observation. Peeping into the shop windows of silver-smiths he saw the shape and the method of manipulating the graver in the lettering of spoons: and rolled-out copper cents gave him his plates for first efforts. The wonders of general science early engaged his attention, especially that branch which pertains to the economy of man's physical life. Some of his earlier efforts in the engraver's art were in making copies of anatomical figures from medical books. His father perceived this proclivity with pleasure, and deprecating the lad's manifest love of Art, he allowed him to make preparations for the profession of a physician. In May, 1796, at the age of twenty-one years, he received the degree of Medical Doctor from the Faculty of Columbia College. The subject of his address on that occasion was "Chronic Mania;" and the theories which he then advanced, concerning its cause and cure, have now been long-established facts in medical science.

Soon after young ANDERSON commenced his professional studies, at the age of about seventeen years, his proficiency in Art had become so great, notwithstanding the many difficulties that lay in his way, that he was employed by WILLIAM DURELL, a bookseller, to copy the illustrations of a popular little English work entitled "The Looking-Glass for the Mind." The engravings that adorned it were made on wood by BEWICK, the father of modern wood-engraving. Up to this time ANDERSON'S engravings had been made on type-metal, and he had no idea that wood was used for the purpose. When he had completed about half the illustrations he was informed that BEWICK'S pictures were engraved on box-wood. He immediately procured some pieces of that wood from a rule-maker's shop, invented proper tools, experimented, and, to his great joy, he found the material much more agreeable to work upon, and more easily managed, than type-metal. Two of these wood blocks, the first ever engraved in America, are in the possession of the writer, somewhat worn by use, and are herewith printed. The first, representing a beggar at a door, is at the head of the little story in "The Looking-Glass," entitled "The Destructive Consequences of Dissipation and Luxury." The second illustrates a part of the story of "William and Amelia."

PRINCE ARTHUR OF ENGLAND.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. NOTMAN, MONTREAL.—[SEE PAGE 87.]

In the first year of his practice of medicine, Dr. ANDERSON drew and engraved on wood, in a most admirable manner, even when compared with the art at the present day, a full-length human skeleton, from ALBINUS'S "Anatomy," which he enlarged to the length of three feet. This, it is believed, is the largest fine and carefully elaborated engraving on wood ever attempted, and has never been excelled in accuracy of drawing and characteristic execution.

When Dr. ANDERSON was at the age of twenty-three years his family all died of the yellow-fever. He was attacked while in attendance upon the physician with whom he had studied, and who had been prostrated by it. Both recovered; and ANDERSON made a voyage to the West Indies, to visit a paternal uncle, ALEXANDER ANDERSON, who was "the king's botanist" at St. Vincent. On his return, he resolved to abandon the medical profession as a business and devote himself to engraving, for which he had conceived an irresistible passion. At that time JOHN ROBERTS, an eccentric Scotchman and friend of ANDERSON'S deceased father, who painted miniatures, etched and engraved on copper, was a clever musician and mathematician, and a competent draughtsman, became his instructor. ANDERSON preferred wood-engraving; but the demand for it being small, he practiced on copper, and, under ROBERTS'S instruction, gained great proficiency. His skill was well attested by the frontispiece to ROBERTSON'S "History of Charles the Fifth," and a portrait of FRANCIS THE FIRST. These he engraved in the year 1800 for an edition published in NEW YORK by HOPKINS. But ROBERTS'S habits were so irregular that ANDERSON did not remain with him long; and, finally, his master's intemperance compelled him to give up the advantages which he might have derived from that artist's practical suggestions.

ANDERSON established himself as an engraver soon after leaving ROBERTS, and up to the year 1830 he used both wood and metal, as occasions required. He illustrated the earliest editions of "Webster's Spelling-Book," which, for about seventy years, has been a leading elementary book in the schools of the United States. Its sale has been enormous, and at one time amounted to about a million of copies a year. In 1857 a new and more fully illustrated edition of that work was published, the engravings executed by ANDERSON, from drawings by MORGAN, one of his pupils, who was about eight years his junior.

During his long and busy life Dr. ANDERSON

ENGLISH BOY COLONISTS FOR AMERICA.—[SEE PAGE 91.]

engraved many thousands of subjects. In the year 1799 he engraved several large copper-plates for JOSEPHUS'S "History of the Jews;" and in 1808 he executed on wood sixty or seventy illustrations for an American edition of BELL'S "Anatomy," copied from the originals, etched by BELL himself. His last engraving in copper was made about the year 1812, to illustrate a quarto Bible. The subject was "The Last Supper," from an English model, and from that time he engraved on wood exclusively, and found continual employment until called upon to lay aside every implement of his power. Between 1804 and 1850 he engraved forty octavo and forty small-size illustrations of SHAKSPEARE'S plays, from original designs, for CHARLES & MARY LAMB, then the publishers of "Webster's Spelling-Book." They were executed in the substantial and characteristic style of English wood-cuts thirty or forty years previously.

In the spring of 1859, when in the eighty-fifth year of his age, DR. ANDERSON changed his place of residence, and removed from where he had lived about thirty years. At that time he issued a new business-card, drawn and engraved by himself, with the appropriate motto—"LEBEN ZUR ERACTES—"Rest, not broken."

DR. ANDERSON'S reminiscences of the past were extremely vivid, and his relations of them were very instructive. They extended back to the closing scenes of the Revolution. With most of the literary and professional men in New York in the early part of this century he was more or less familiar, and was beloved by all for his sterling virtues. The writer has heard the late WASHINGTON IRVING speak of him in a most affectionate manner, as one of the earliest friends of his youth, and from whom, when IRVING was a lad, he learned to play the flageolet.

At the time of his death DR. ANDERSON was in his ninety-fifth year of his age. At seven he was a little below the medium height, rather thick-set, and presented a countenance always beaming with benevolence and kindly feeling. He was extremely regular and temperate in his habits. "I would not sit up with you one night," he said to say, "to see an angel." He was genial in thought and conversation, and unecommonly consistent in acting. It was not without much persuasion from the writer that he consented, several years ago, to sit for the pleasing etype from which our portrait was copied, and which he himself engraved when he was past the eightieth year of his age.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIRST.

TOUCHING IT.

AS soon as the general stupefaction was allayed, the general affectedly asserted itself as a matter of course.

The man who first declared that "seeing" was "believing" laid his finger (whether he knew it himself or not) on one of the fundamental follies of humanity. The easiest of all evidence to receive is the evidence that requires no other judgment to decide it than the judgment of the eye—and it will be, on that account, the evidence which humanity is most ready to accept, as long as humanity lasts. The eyes of every body looked at Geoffrey; and the judgment of everybody decided, on the evidence those eyes, that the surgeon must be wrong. Lady Lundie herself (disturbed even her remorseful devotion) led the general protest. "Mr. Delamayn in broken health!" she exclaimed, appealing to the better sense of her eminent medical friend. "Emily, now, you can't expect us to believe that!"

Sitting immediately on the other side by the startling assertion of which he had been made the subject, Geoffrey rose, and looked the surgeon, steadily and firmly, straight in the face.

"Do you mean what you say?" he asked.

"Yes."

"You point me out before all these people—"

"One moment, Mr. Delamayn. I admit that I may have been wrong in directing your special attention to you. You have a right to complain of my having answered too publicly the public challenge offered to me by your friends.

"I agree for having done that. But I don't retract a single word of what I have said on the subject of your health."

"You stick to it that I am a broken-down man?"

"I do."

"I wish you were twenty years younger, Sir?"

"Why?"

"I'd ask you to step out on the lawn there, and I'd show you whether I'm a broken-down man or not."

Lady Lundie looked at her brother-in-law. Sir Patrick instantly interfered.

"Mr. Delamayn," he said, "you were invited here in the character of a gentleman, and you are a guest in a lady's house."

"No! no!" said the surgeon, good-humorously. "Mr. Delamayn is using a strong argument, Sir Patrick—and I admit it. If I were twenty years younger," he went on, addressing himself to Geoffrey, "and if I did step out on the lawn with you, the result wouldn't affect the question between us in the least. I don't say that the violent bodily exercises in which you are famous have damaged your muscular power. I assert that they have damaged your vital power. In what particular way they have affected it I don't consider myself bound to tell you. I simply give you a warning, as a matter of common humanity. You will do well to be content with the success you have already achieved in the field of athletic pursuits, and to shun your mode of life for the future. Accept my excuses, once more, for having said this publicly instead of privately —and don't forget my warning."

He turned to move away to another part of the room. Geoffrey fairly threw him to return to the subject.

"Wait a bit," he said. "You have had your innings. My turn now. I can't give it words as you do; but I can come to the point. And, by the Lord, I'll tyke you to it! Ten days or a fortnight from this I'm going into training for the Foot-Race at Fulham. Do you say I shall break down?"

"You will probably get through your training."

"Shall I get through the race?"

"You may possibly get through the race. But if you do—"

"If I do?"

"You will never run another."

"And never row in another match?"

"Never."

"I have been asked to row in the Race, next spring: and I have said I will. Do you tell me, in many words, that it won't be able to do it?"

"Yes—in so many words."

"Positively?"

"Positively."

"Back your opinion!" cried Geoffrey, tearing his betting-book out of his pocket. "I lay you an even hundred I'm in the condition to row, in the University Match next spring."

"I don't bet," said the surgeon.

With that final reply the surgeon walked away to the other end of the library. Lady Lundie (taking her Blanche in custody) followed, at the same time, to return to the serious business of the morning. Sir Patrick, Mrs. Delamayn, and, very evidently, bookin hand, to his college friends about him. The British blood was up; and the general contribution to the fund of amusement by the less common decency and common law from one end of the country to the other, was not to be trifled with.

"Come on!" cried Geoffrey. "Back the doctor, one of you!"

Sir Patrick rose in undisguised disgust, and rang the bell. Anne, Lady Lundie's maid, invited to business by their illustrious friend, shook their thick heads at him knowingly, and answered with one accord, in one eloquent word —"Gammon!"

"A fee of you back him!" persisted Geoffrey, appealing to the two choral gentlemen in the back-ground, with his temper fast rising to fever heat. The choral gentlemen compared notes, and, as usual, "We weren't born yesterday, Smith?"

"Not if we know it, Jones."

"Smith!" said Geoffrey, with a sudden assumption of politeness ominous of something unpleasant to come.

Smith said "Yes?"—with a smile.

"Jones!"

Jones said "Yes?"—with a reflection of Smith.

"You're a couple of infernal cads—and you haven't got a hundred pound between you!"

"Come! come!" said Arnold, interfering for the first time. "This is not language, Geoffrey."

"Why the—(never mind what!)—" won't they say of them, if I break down?"

"If you must be a fool," returned Arnold, a little irritably on his side, "and if nothing else will satisfy you, I'll bet you a hundred."

"An even hundred on the doctor!" cried Geoffrey. "Done with you!"

His highest aspirations were satisfied; his temper was in perfect order again. He entered his bet on the instant. "Five hundred to one!" Smith and Jones in the heartiest way. "No offense, old chaps! Shake hands!" The two choral gentlemen shook hands with Geoffrey. "The English aristocracy—eh, Smith?" "Blood of a bewildering age!" Jones.

As soon as he had spoken, Arnold's conscience reproached him: not for betting (who is ashamed of that form of self-indulgence?), but for "backing the doctor." With the best intention toward his friend, he had unquestionably done injury of his friend's health. He anxiously assured Geoffrey that no man in the room could be more heartily pleased than the surgeon was wrong than himself. "I don't cry off from the bet, mind!" he added, "but, I repeat, pray understand that I only take it to please you."

"Bother all that!" answered Geoffrey, with the whole of his good humor restored by one of those choicest virtues in his character. "A bet's a bet—and there's an end of it!" He drew Arnold by the arm out of ear-shot of the others. "I say!" he asked, anxiously. "Do you think I've got the old fogy back up?"

"Do you mean Sir Patrick?"

Geoffrey nodded, and waited.

"I haven't put that little matter to him yet about marrying in Scotland, you know. Suppose we cut short the business of Lying-in?" His eye wandered cunningly, as he put the question, to the other end of the room. The surgeon was looking over a port-folio of prints. The ladies were still at work on their notes of invitation. Sir Patrick was alone at the book-shelves, immersed in a volume which he had just taken down.

"Make an apology," suggested Arnold. "Sir Patrick may be a little irritable and bitter; but he's a just man and a kind man. You may even not guilty of any intentional disrespect toward him—and you will say enough."

"All right!"

Sir Patrick, deep in an old Venetian edition of The Decameron, found himself suddenly recalled from medieval Italy to modern England, by no less a person than Geoffrey Delamayn.

"What do you want?" he asked, coldly.

"I want to make an apology," said Geoffrey. "Let by-gones be by-gones—and that sort of thing. I wasn't guilty of any intentional disrespect to you, Sir. Forgive and forget. Not half a bad motto, Sir—eh?"

It was dismissively expressed—but still it was an apology. Not even Geoffrey could appeal to Sir Patrick's courtesy and Sir Patrick's consideration in vain.

"Not a word more, Mr. Delamayn!" said the polite old man. "Accept my excuses for anything which I may have said too sharply, on my side; and let us by all means forget the rest."

Having made the advance made by him, in those terms, he paused, expecting Geoffrey to leave him free to return to the Decameron. To his unutterable astonishment, Geoffrey suddenly stooped over him, and whispered in his ear, "I want a word in private with you."

Sir Patrick started back, as if Geoffrey had tried to bite him.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Delamayn—what did you say?"

"Could you give me a word in private?"

Sir Patrick put back the Decameron; and bowed in freezing silence. The confidence of Geoffrey Delamayn was the last confidence in the world into which he desired to be drawn. "This is the answer of the coward," he thought. "What can he possibly want with Me?"

It's about a friend of mine," pursued Geoffrey; leading the way toward one of the windows. "He's in a scrape, my friend is. And I want to ask your advice. It's strictly private, you know." There he came to a full stop—and waited to see what impression he had produced, so far.

Sir Patrick bowed, either by word or gesture, to exhibit the slightest anxiety to hear a word more.

"Would you mind taking a turn in the garden?" asked Geoffrey.

Sir Patrick pointed to his lame foot. "I have had an experience of walking this morning," he said. "Let my infirmity excuse me."

Geoffrey looked about him for a substitute for the garden, and led the way back again toward one of the convenient curtained recesses opening out of the front wall of the library. "We shall be private enough here," he said.

Sir Patrick followed him, and waited to expose the confidence—an undisguised effort, this time.

"Pray forgive me, Mr. Delamayn. Are you quite sure that you apply to the right person, in applying to me?"

"You're a Scotch lawyer, ain't you?"

"Certainly."

"Then you understand about Scotch marriages—eh?"

Sir Patrick's manner suddenly altered.

"Is that the subject you wish to consult me on?" he asked.

"It's not me. It's my friend."

"Your friend, then?"

"Yes. It's a scrape with a woman. Here, in Scotland. My friend don't know whether he's married to her or not."

"I am not your service, Mr. Delamayn."

To Geoffrey's mind—by no means unmixed with surprise—Sir Patrick not only showed no sign of consenting to be consulted by him, but actually advanced to meet his wishes, by leading the way to the recess that was nearest to them. The mere mention of the old lawyer had put Geoffrey's application to him for assistance, and Blanche's application to him for protection, together; and had built its own theory on the basis thus obtained. "To I see a connection between the two proceedings!" Blanche's eagerness, and the present position of Mr. Delamayn in Scotland, brought Sir Patrick, to a certainty, to the conclusion that she had been the first to make advances to Geoffrey. The conference between the two men, so trifling in appearance, so terrible in its destined influence over Anne Silvester's future, had over the future of Arnold and Blanche, was, to all practical purposes, a conference with closed doors.

"Now," said Sir Patrick, "what is the question?"

"The question," said Geoffrey, "is whether my friend is married to her or not?"

"Did he mean to marry her?"

"Yes."

"He being a single man, and she being a single woman, at the time? And both in Scotland?"

"Yes."

"Very well. Now tell me the circumstances."

Geoffrey hesitated. The art of stating circumstances (under the circulation of a very rare gift—the gift of arranging ideas. No one was better acquainted with this truth than Sir Patrick. Geoffrey's unready mind, therefore, at starting, under the firm conviction that his client had something to conceal from him. The one process that could be depended on for extracting the truth, under those circumstances, was the process of interrogation. If Geoffrey was submitted to it, at the outset, his cunning would be thrown off the track. Sir Patrick's object was to make the man himself invite interrogation. Geoffrey invited it forthwith, by attempting to state the circumstances, and involving them in the usual confusion. Sir Patrick waited until he had thoroughly lost the thread of his narrative—and then played for the winning trick.

"Would it be easier to you if I asked a few questions?" he inquired, innocently.

"Much easier."

"I am quite at your service. Suppose we clear the ground to begin with? Are you at liberty to mention names?"

"No."

"Places?"

"No."

"Dates?"

"Do you want me to be particular?"

"Be as particular as you can."

"Will it do, if I say the present year?"

"Yes. Were your friend and the lady—at some time in the present year—traveling together in Scotland?"

"No."

"Living together in Scotland?"

"No."

"What were they doing together in Scotland?"

"Well—they were meeting each other at an inn."

"Oh? They were meeting each other at an inn. Which was first at the rendezvous?"

"The woman was first. Stop a bit! We are getting to it now." He produced from his pocket the written memorandum of Arnold's proceedings at the Grey Ferrie, which he had taken down from Arnold's own lips. "I've got a bit of note here, I can read on. "Perhaps, you'd like to have a look at it?"

Sir Patrick took the note—read it rapidly through to himself—then re-read it, sentence by sentence, to Geoffrey; using it as a text to speak from, in making further inquiries.

"I see I am right, so far by the name of his wife, at the door," read Sir Patrick. "Meaning, I presume, the door of the inn? Had the lady previously given herself out as a married woman to the people of the inn?"

"Yes."

"How long had she been at the inn before the gentleman had been?"

"Only an hour or so."

"Did she give a name?"

"I can't be quite sure—I should say not."

"Did the gentleman give a name?"

"Yes. He certain he didn't."

Sir Patrick returned to the memorandum.

"He said at dinner, before the landlady and the waiter, I take those rooms for my wife. He made her say he was her husband, at the same time.' Was that done joco*s*ely, Mr. Delamayn—or later by the lady or the gentleman?"

"No. It was done in downright earnest."

"I see. And the waiter and the landlady heard it, and so to deceive the landlady and the waiter?"

"Yes."

Sir Patrick returned to the memorandum.

"'After that, he stopped all night.' Stopped in the rooms he had taken for himself and his wife?"

"Yes."

"And what happened the next day?"

"He went away. Wait a bit! Said he had business for an excuse."

"That is to say, he kept up the deception with the people of the inn? and for the time left behind him, in the character of his wife?"

"That's it."

"Did he go back to the inn?"

"No."

"How long did the lady stay there, after he had gone?"

"She staid—well, she staid a few days."

"And your friend has not seen her since?"

"No."

"Are your friend and the lady English or Scotch?"

"Both English."

"At the time when they met at the inn, had they either of them arrived in Scotland, from the place in which they were previously living, within a period of less than twenty-one days?"

"Neither of them had."

"Very well. There appears to be no difficulty in answering for Anne. Lady Lundie and the domestic staff of Windygates Manor-House for a much longer period than three weeks before the date of the lawn-party. The question, as it affects Anne, is the only question that required reflection. After searching his memory for details of the conversation which had taken place between them, when he and Arnold had met at the lawn-party, Geoffrey recalled a certain reference to the part of his friend in a performance at the Edinburgh theatre, which at once decided the question of time. Arnold had been necessarily detained in Edinburgh, before his arrival at Windygates, by legal business connected with the affairs of his father. He, like Anne, had certainly been in Scotland, before they met at Craig Ferrie, for a longer period than a period of three weeks. He now accordingly informed Sir Patrick that the lady and gentleman had been in Scotland for more than twenty-one days—and then added a question on his own behalf: "Don't let me hurry you, Sir—but, shall you soon have done?"

"I shall have done, after two more questions," answered Sir Patrick, coldly. He felt it understood that the lady claims, on the strength of the circumstances which you have mentioned to me, to be your friend's wife?"

Geoffrey made an affirmative reply. The readers aware of obstacles which the lady's opinion was, in this case, to answer, Yes. In other words, to represent Anne (in the character of "the lady") as claiming to be married to Arnold (in the character of "his friend").

Sir Patrick reviewed this circumstances. He was, at the same time, quite cunning enough to see that it was of vital importance to the purpose which he had in view, to confine himself strictly to the bare perversion of the truth. There was the possibility involving from Anne's opinion, unless that opinion was given on the facts exactly as they had occurred at the inn. To the facts he had, thus far, carefully adhered; and to the facts (with the one inevitable departure from them which had been just forced on him) he determined to adhere to the end.

"Did no letters pass between the lady and gentleman?" pursued Sir Patrick.

"None that I know of," answered Geoffrey, steadily returning to the truth.

"I have done, Mr. Delamayn."

"Well? and what's your opinion?"

"Before I give my opinion I am bound to preface it by a personal statement which you are not to take, if you please, as a statement of the law. You ask me to decide—on facts with which you have supplied me—whether your friend is, according to the law of Scotland, married or not?"

Geoffrey nodded. "That's it!" he said, eagerly.

"My experience, Mr. Delamayn, is that any single man, in Scotland, may marry any single woman, at any time, and under any circumstances. In short, after thirty years' practice as a lawyer, I don't know what is not a marriage in Scotland."

"In plain English," said Geoffrey, "you mean she's his wife?"

In spite of his cunning; in spite of his self-command, his eyes brightened as he said those words. And the tone in which he spoke—though too carefully guarded to be a tone of triumph—was, to a fine ear, unmistakably a tone of relief.

Neither the look nor the tone was lost on Sir Patrick.

His first suspicion, when he sat down to the conference, had been the obvious suspicion that, in speaking of "a friend," Geoffrey was speaking of himself. But, like all lawyers, he habitually mistrusted first impressions, his own included. His object, thus far, had been to solve the problem of Geoffrey's true position and Geoffrey's real motive. He had set the question accordingly, and had caught his bird.

It was now time to turn round—first, that this man who was consulting him, was, in all probability, really speaking of the case of another person: secondly, that he had an interest (of what nature it was impossible yet to say) in untangling his own mind: "is this married, by the law of Scotland, indisputably a married man, having penetrated to that extent the secret which Geoffrey was withholding from him, he abandoned the hope of making any further advance at that present sitting. The next question to clear up in the investigation, was the question of the anonymous "lady" might be. And the next discovery to make was, whether the lady could, or could not, be identified with Anne Silvester. Pending the inevitable delay in reaching that result, the straight course (as in Sir Patrick's present state of uncertainty) the only course to take, was laying down the law. He once took the question of the marriage in hand—with no concealment whatever, as to the legal bearings of it, from the client who was consulting him.

"I don't rush to conclusions, Mr. Delamayn," he said. "I have only told you what my general experience is thus far. My professional opinion on the special case of your friend does not been given yet."

Geoffrey's face clouded again. Sir Patrick carefully noted the new change in it.

"The law of Scotland," he went on, "so far as it relates to irregular Marriages, is an outrage on common decency and common-sense. If you think my language in thus describing it too strong—I can refer you on the language to a judicial authority. Lord Deas delivered a recent judgment of marriage in Scotland, from the bench on these words: 'Common-law marriage. No form or ceremony, civil or religious; no notice before, or publication after; no witnesses; no writing, no witnesses even, are essential to the constitution of this, the most important contract which two persons can enter into.' Those are Scotch judge's own statement of the law that he administered. Observe, at the same time, if you please, that we make full legal provision in Scotland for contracts affecting the sale of houses and lands, bonds and bills, but the only contract which we leave without safeguards or precautions of any sort is the contract which unites a man and a woman for life. As for the authority of parents, and the innocence of children, our law recognises no claim on it either in the one case or in the other. A girl of twelve and a boy of fourteen have nothing to do but to cross the Border, and to be married—without the interposition of the slightest delay or restraint, and without the slightest attempt to inform the parents on the part of the Scotch law. As to the marriages of men and women, even the mere interchange of consent which, as you have just heard, makes them man and wife, is not required to be directly proved: it may be presumed by inference. And, more even than that, whatever the law for its consistency may presume, men and women are, to point of fact, free to be married in Scotland where consent has never been interchanged at all. Where the parties to a case know that they are legally held to be married persons. Are you sufficiently confused about the law of Irregular Marriages in Scotland by this time, Mr. Delamayn? And have I said enough to justify the strong language I used when I undertook to describe it to you?"

"Who's that 'authority' you talked of just now?" inquired Geoffrey. "Couldn't I ask him?"

"You might find him flatly contradicted, if you did ask him, by another authority equally learned and equally eminent," answered Sir Patrick. "I am not joking—I am only stating facts. Have you heard of the Queen's Commission?"

"No."

"Then listen to this. In March, sixty-five, the Queen appointed a Commission to inquire into the Marriage-Laws of the United Kingdom. The Report of that Commission is published in London; and is accessible to any body who chooses to pay the price of two or three shillings for it. One of the results of the inquiry was, the discovery that high authorities were of contirely contrary opinions on one of the vital questions of Scottish marriage-law. And the Commissioners, in announcing that fact, add that the question of which opinion is right is still disputed, and has not been made the subject of legal decision. Authorities are every where at variance throughout the Report. A haze of doubt and uncertainty hangs in Scotland over the most important contract of civilized life. If no other reason existed for reforming the Scotch marriage-law, there would be reason enough afforded by that one fact. An uncertain marriage-law is a national calamity."

"You can tell me what you think yourself about my friend's marriage, can't you?" said Geoffrey, still holding obstinately to the end that he had in view.

"Certainly. Now that I have given you due warning of the danger of implicitly relying on any individual opinion, I may proceed to answer with a clear conscience. I say that there has not been a positive marriage in this case. There has been evidence of the existence of preliminaries to a marriage—nothing more."

The disclosure was not far too fine to be appreciated by Geoffrey's mind. He frowned heavily, in bewilderment and disgust.

"Not married!" he repeated, "when they said they were man and wife, before witnesses!"

"That is a common popular error," said Sir Patrick. "As I have already told you, witnesses are not legally necessary to make a marriage in Scotland. They are required in England in such a case—to help, at some future time, in proving a marriage that is denied.

Geoffrey caught at the last words.

"The landlady and the waiter might make it out to be a marriage?" he said.

"Yes. And, remember, if you choose to apply to one of my professional colleagues, he might possibly add you that they would make it out. A state of the law which allows the interchange of matrimonial consent to be proved by inference leaves a wide door open to conjecture. Your friend refers to a certain lady, in so many words, as his wife. The lady refers to your friend, in so many words, as her husband. In the room which they have taken, as man and wife, they remain, as man and wife, till the next morning. Your friend goes away, without undeceiving any body. The lady goes away, for some days after, in the character of his wife. And all these circumstances take place in the presence of competent witnesses, legally—if not legally, intelligently—qualified to form an inference of the interchange of matrimonial consent here. I stick to my own opinion, nevertheless. Evidence in proof of a marriage (I say)—nothing more."

While Sir Patrick had been speaking, Geoffrey had been considering with himself. By dint of hard thinking he had found his way to a decisive question on his side.

"Look here!" he said, dropping his heavy hand down on the table by way of calling on it to book, Sir! Suppose my friend had another lady in his eye?"

"Eh?"

"As things are now—would you advise him to marry her?"

"As things are now—certainly not!"

Geoffrey got briskly on his legs, and closed the interview.

"That will do," he said, "for him and for me."

With those words he walked back, without ceremony, into the main thoroughfare of the room.

"I don't know who your friend is," thought Sir Patrick, looking after him. "But if your friend is not married, and if he marries in an honest and a harmless interest, I know no more human nature than I ought to know."

Immediately on leaving Sir Patrick, Geoffrey was encountered by one of the servants in search of him.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," began the man. "The person from the Honorable Mr. Delamayn's—"

"Yes? The fellow who brought me a note from your master this morning?"

"He's expected back, Sir—he's afraid he mustn't wait any longer."

"Come here, and I'll give you the answer for him."

He led the way to the writing-table, and referred to Julian's letter again. He ran his eye carelessly over it, until he reached the final two lines of the postscript, and help us to revive Mrs. Glenarm." For a while he paused, with his eye fixed on those words. Then he took the memorandum of three people—of Anne, who had lived him; of Arnold, who had served him; of Blanche, who had betrayed him—and, with the information that guided his movements for the next day. He read, considered, and reflected patiently. Arnold and Blanche, if he remained at Lady Lundale's, he had no alternative but to perform in addition to Anne. If he returned to his brother's house, he had no alternative but to desert Anne, on the infamous pretext that she was Arnold's wife.

He suddenly tossed the letter away from him on the table, and snatched a sheet of note-paper out of the writing-case. "Here goes for Mrs. Glenarm," he said to himself, and began to write to his brother, in one line: "Dear Julius, Expect me to-morrow. G. D." The impassible servant stood ready to wait for him, looking at his magnificent breadth of chest, and thinking what a glorious thing it was to be a man. Here for the last terrible mile of the coming race.

"There you are!" he said, and handed his note to the man.

"All right, Geoffrey?" asked a friendly voice behind him.

He turned—and saw Arnold, anxious for news of the consultation with Sir Patrick.

"Yes," he said, curtly.

NOTE.—There are certain readers who feel a disposition to doubt the Facts, when they meet with them in a work of fiction. Persons of this way of thinking may find it convenient to the book which first suggested to me the idea of writing the present Novel. The book is the Report of the Commission appointed to Inquire into the Laws of Marriage. Published by the Queen's Printers. For sale by Longman, Paternoster Row, London. I pity What Sir Patrick says professionally of Scotch Marriage-Law, is expressed in the words from his high authority. What the lawyer (in the Prologue) says professionally, is expressed in the words of the Commissioners. I have taken the liberty to condense passages, and to alter words, but by no means of satisfying any readers that I have misrepresented. I subjoin an abstract from my list of references to the Report of the Commissioners, which any person may consult for himself, and so inclined can verify for themselves.

Irish Marriages (in the Prologue).—See Report, pages XII., XIII., XIIIV.

Irregular Marriages in Scotland.—Statement of the law by Lord Deas. Report, page XVI.—Marriages of Majority of tenders years. Examination of Mr. Maclaren by Lord Chelmsford Question 669.—Interchange of Matrimonial Consent. Report, page XVII.—Examination of Mr. Maclaren by the Lord Justice Clerk (Question 1,000).—Marriages by Cohabitation and Habit and Repute. Report, page XVIII.—Examination of Mr. Rose, page XIX.—Contradiction of opinions between authorities. Report, page XVIII. Sir J. Legge provided with a list of horses and dogs. No legal provision for the marriage of the rich and wealthy. Sentence Report, page XXX.—Conclusion of the Commissioners. Report, page XXIV.—Examination of witnesses in favor of not interfering with Irregular Marriages in Scotland. Mr. Maclaren declares their opinion that "Scotch marriages ought not to continue."—Report, page XXV.

In reference to the arguments alluded to above in the Report, I may add, the present disgraceful state of the Scotch marriage-law has been over and over again the ground of "Scotch Novels." Reader of Scotch Novels, I refer you to the Irregular Marriages in Scotland in nothing (!!). That they act, on certain occasions, in the capacity of a moral tract upon the law of illgals man (!!!). Such is the elevated point of view from which the Commissioners of Marriages regarded the some of the most pious and learned men in Scotland.

Mr. Maclaren's apology for the state of the law, is, when you have done with her, or of your husband, writes you "Dear Sir," and you write "Dear Madam," appears to be all that is wanting to render this North British institution (!!!) a Model of Matrimonial Felicity complete. It is only fair to add that, before the Commissioners, Mr. Maclaren's opinions were met by the opinions of the Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Deas, the Marriages of Scotland from the Christian and the Commissioners themselves, with entirely new and authoritative conclusions already cited—that such marriages ought to be abolished.

ENFORCING THE WHISKY LAWS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

THE mountains of West Virginia, covered with forest and traversed by fine roads, offer tempting facilities to those who engage in the illicit distillation of whisky, and the revenue officers of the United States have great difficulty in hunting up their establishments and enforcing the laws. The stills are generally located in places of secluded ravine, to be reached by an obscure bridle-path only; and as the distillers are hardly ever removed from behind their stills, many of them having been rebel guerrillas, and regard revenue officers as natural enemies, the latter are frequently compelled to call upon the military for assistance when making a raid upon a distillery and still. Our illustration on page 84 represents the seizure of such an establishment, and was made by our artist from an actual scene.

THE PEABODY FUNERAL CAR.

WHEN it was decided that the body of the late MR. GEORGE PEABODY was to be transported from the Great Western Railroad from Paddington, the Directors of the road selected a car of the latest pattern to be fitted up for reception of the remains. The decoration was intrusted to the taste and experience of Colonel WILLIAM BEACH, of Boston, U.S., by means of which we give a car with the rest of the funeral train, on page 84, is a model of elegance and taste. It is 45 feet long and 7 feet wide, and the height of the floor from the ground is 6 feet 7 inches. It is carried in black velvet, and is draped in festoons, cut with black and white alpaca. The interior of the roof is hung with gracefully drooping folds of alternate black and white, blending near the ends of the car with the colors of the American and English flags. Between the folds of the drapings of the windows is an elaborate succession of pleasing designs, and the drapery of the windows is looped back in diamond form. At the ends of the car are particolored off with heavy black curtains, looped back with white, and with white ends. The doors are draped outside and in, the upper half matching the decoration of the windows. In the centre of the car is a magnificent bier, 10 feet long, covered with black velvet, festooned with silver bullion fringe, tassels, and rosettes, and bound with heavy silver lace. The effect of the interior, as seen from the doorway, is very solemn and appropriate, and reflects great credit upon the designer. The exterior is draped at the sides and ends, and in harmony with the interior. Two other cars are to be decorated also elaborately for the funeral cortège—long beds of earth extending in graceful curves from point to point of the roof, relieved by bows of white at the intersections, and festoons of white and black at the sides.

The engine selected to draw the funeral train is the splendid locomotive which, by a singular coincidence, was named the "George Peabody," in honor of a gentleman of Salem, a former Governor of Massachusetts. Bands of alternate white and black cover the boiler, converging in a rosette at the extreme front of the engine. The large dome and sand-box are draped with black velvet, studded with silver stars, and trimmed with white fringe. The bell is muffled with black crape. The sides of the tender and driver's cab are ornamented with rows of festoons, bows, and ornaments. The flag-staffs at the front gives on opposite sides, the cross of St. George and the Stars and Stripes, draped with black crape, the latter exercise giving an effect of sombre richness.

PRINCE ARTHUR IN THE UNITED STATES.

PRINCE ARTHUR, who arrived in Canada last August for the purpose of joining the regiment to which he is attached, and which is now stationed in that country, is now on a visit to the United States, partly to attend the funeral of the late Mr. PEABODY, and partly to see the lions at Washington while Congress is in session. He is the seventh child and third son of Queen VICTORIA, and is now about nineteen years old—very nearly of the same age that his brother, the Prince of Wales, was when he visited this country about nine years ago. Our portrait of the latter we page 85 shows him to be a fine-looking young gentleman, with features very unlike those of his elder brother. The London Times, referring to the Prince's visit, expresses the hope that it may be productive of happy results in cementing both countries to a more cordial understanding.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

EVERY body has to be interviewed nowadays, either in person or by proxy. Even the unassuming "president of the press" has to have press-men, it is said, to do his talking for him. Mr. GRANT has had to submit to an interview with Mr. HORACE RUBY in his company with the British Minister and Colonel Ripley, the interviewer, and Mr. GRANT has had to submit to the next best possible way. Accosting a colored gentleman who, again as ever, was leaving the Prince's room, he said:

"Well, John, what have you have just been serving his Royal Highness?"

"Sah, Sah, I have had dat honor."

"You heard the conversation?"

"Yes, Sah, I heard it all."

"My dear friend, you are just the gentleman I want to see. Here is a dollar; now tell me what his Royal Highness said." The dollar disappeared in the waiter's pocket. "Now, my dear Sir, what did the Prince say, when he first entered the room, to the QUEEN, when he heard from her, and how she was?"

The dark face puffed with pride. "Why, Sah—"

"Any thing about the Alabama?"

"Yes, Sah, he did, and de QUEEN say thing 'bout de Alabam."

"Did he tell what he was going to say to President Grant?"

"Yes, Sah. Didn't mention Miss Grant's name."

"Did he say how he liked the American people?"

"Yes, Sah. He didn't say any thing 'bout de American people."

"Did he tell what he thought about New York?"

"Yes, Sah, he did, and he say—"

"Well then, my dear fellow, what did he say? and what did the QUEEN say?"

"Well den, the Prince he says: 'I say, Thornton, does you know how I like to be treated?' and Mass Thornton, 'Don't my sentiments 'zactly,' says de QUEEN to Prince, an' dat's how he say it, an' say the Prince told me to bring a jolly lot more of 'em," and he paid over the fifth dollar. Success, Sah."

And that was the end of the "interview."

A school visitor lately gave a teacher the following answer to a question: "Why, Miss, a beautiful writer of Wrightsine, down in Torrington, claims the copyright for her hand. She is a correspondent of his church, and has secured a copyright for his writing. If you don't believe me see the advertisement; it writhes three inches: now it is honorable for the Right Reverend Mr. Wrightsine to have a copyright upon right in the practice of the right-handed wretched writers."

"You can't stand there," said a watchman to a thin man in a white overcoat, who was endeavoring to maintain a favorable position for viewing a fire. "You must move down, you know." "I mean to remain, if you please; I am a reporter, and it is necessary that I see what is going on." "I don't care," responded the guardian: "if ye want a report ye'll just have to get it from somebody else."

At a recent examination of a Scotch farmer, on his sister entering the box to be examined, the following conversation took place between her and the counsel engaged:

Counsel.—How old are you?

Miss JANE.—Well, well, I am an unmarried woman, and I dinna think it richt to answer that question.

The JUDGE.—Oh yes, answer the gentleman how old you are.

Miss JANE.—Well a well, I am fifty.

Counsel.—Are you not more than fifty?

Miss JANE.—Well, I am sixty."

The unmarried female witness further asked if she had any hopes of getting married, to which she replied: "Well, I hae had offers doon, but I hae never had at all hope yet." And she scornfully added: "But I hae had offers doon, but I hae tried it and tired o' your palaver already."

The examination proceeded.

Let each one strive with all his might
To be a blessing
And love his brother as himself—
Not envy him.
And if his neighbor chance to be More favored
Than himself, remember
Why love her all the more—you see
She needs your love.

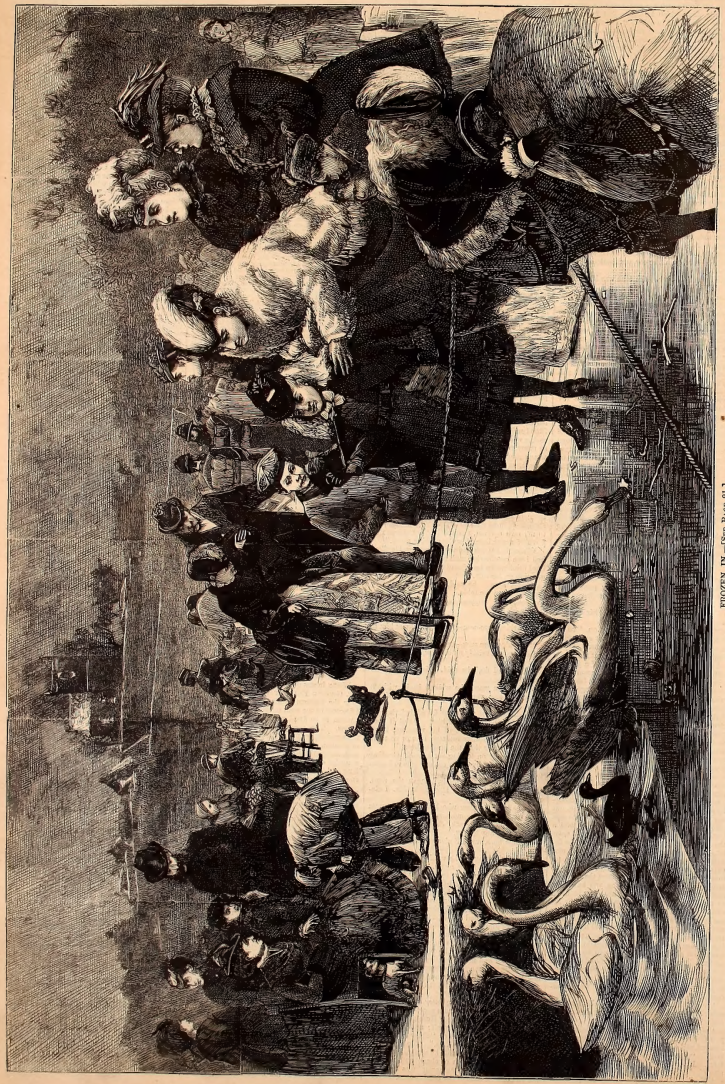
A compose clergyman once said to a chubby-faced lad, who was passing him without raising his hat, "Why don't you take off your hat when you meet your minister?" "You are better fed than taught, I see," was the reply. "I am not your minister's boy," for you teaches me, as I feede myself."

An Arkansas editor, in announcing a marriage, gives us the reason that "it made it smell as though there was a skunk around."

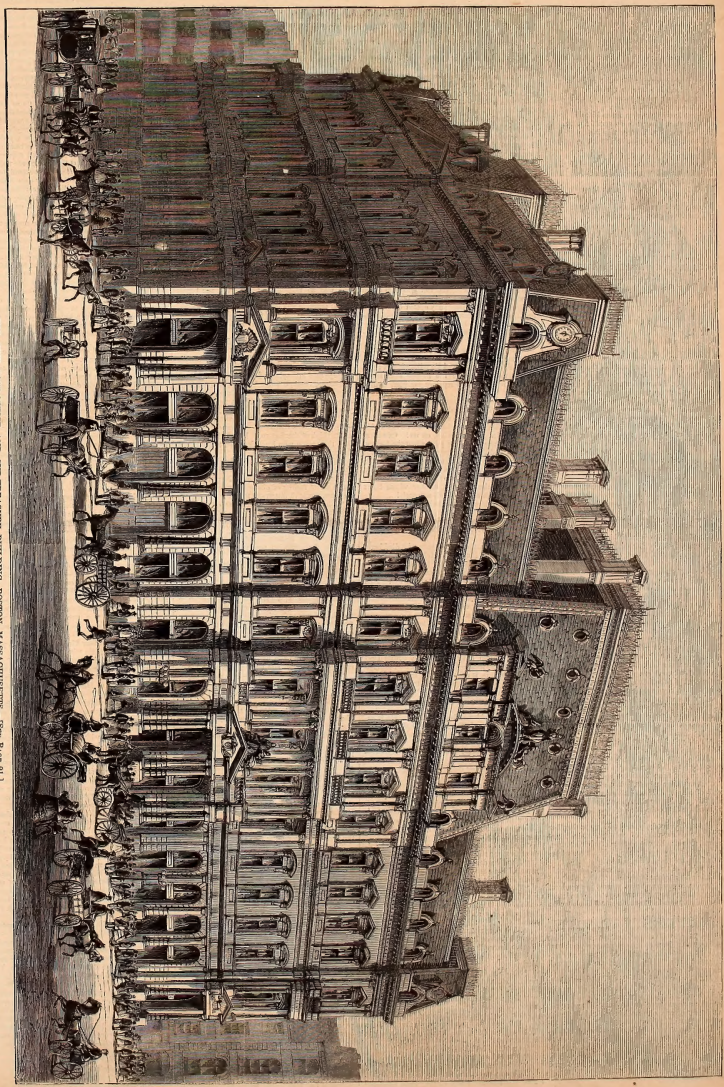
A Down-East paper says that persuasive and bamboozling agents are about in that region selling lightning-rods. They are said to be very much afraid of lightning, but the lad always been afraid of thunder. "Just so," he replied, "we can meet your case exactly. The square rods are lightning-rods, and the round ones thunder-rods." Of course she is now protected."

A lady has a Sunday-school class in one of the churches in Boston, which visited it alternately. One Sunday the boys asked our lady friend to tell them about the following Sunday. "Oh no," says he, "you tell us about your class, and we'll tell you about ours."

A lady who drew a gent's wrapper at the fair a few evenings since, now wants to draw a man to put in it.



FROZEN IN.—[SEE PAGE 91.]



THE NEW POST-OFFICE AND SUB-TREASURY BUILDING, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—[See Page 91.]

LOVE-CRAFT.

Ow love, to-day we found a way
To be as happy as the hours;
We climbed the hill, to where the still
Gray rocks smile with the flowers.
The soft wind's breath, the sea beneath,
They made for us a pleasant sound:
The happy hours we crowned.

Love is so strange, with vane and change,
His mood is subtle as the air:
Through long vague years of joy and tears
You never looked so fair.
I never knew your eyes more blue,
Your voice flow with so sweet a tone.
Full of my love I drove this in
The happiest day we've known.

To-morrow, then, we'll find again
Those rocks between the sea and sky;
To-morrow will prove happier still!
Nay, love, to-day, good-by.
We'll let love rest and thus at its best,
We will not dare to tempt delight:
I kiss your brow, and we'll part now:
Dear love, good-by, good-night!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

En Plus Books.—Book IV.

CHAPTER I.

TEMPTATION.

By the end of March Veronica arrived in England. The news of Sir John's death and of her marriage had, of course, preceded her thither. Telegrams and letters had been sent to Mr. Lane, the agent, in the name of the self-styled Lady Tallis Gale. But besides these, there had come to Mr. Lane a letter from Tallis. The agent had lost no time in communicating with the inheritor of the late baronet's name and title. This was an elderly bachelor who had made a small competence in trade, and had retired from business, and was living in security as a suburb of the large manufacturing town in which his life had been passed. Sir John had as much as possible ignored his plebeian connections; and, without ever having set eyes on him, desired that his prerogative remain. Mr. Matthew Tallis, or, as he most beseechered he styled, Sir Matthew Tallis Gale, was hastened to London, and had a meeting with Mr. Lane; and Mr. Lane had seen Sir Matthew's lawyer; and they were all things required to meet and discuss matters with Veronica's legal adviser.

Mr. Frost had written to his partner, stating that he should be in England on the twenty-fifth of March. But the fact was, that he arrived three days sooner than that date. And one of his first proceedings was to go to Mr. Lane's wood's house in Gower Street. The yellow window-blinds that had been drawn closely down between the day of Lady Tallis's death and that of her funeral were now again raised; and the house was open to receive as much daylight as ever visited that side of Gower Street on a March afternoon. The little parlor into which Mr. Frost was shown looked neat as ever, but, he thought, very threadbare and poor. The air in it was close, though it was a chilly raw day. And there was a heavy silence in the house.

Mrs. Lockwood entered the room with her polishers, light footfall, and respectful Mr. Frost courtesied hand very coldly with her fingers.

For a few moments neither spoke.

"Well, Zillah, I have got back, you see," said Mr. Frost, with the slightest possible overassumption of being at his ease, and in the superior position.

"Yes, you have got back, and I hope you bring some good news for me."

"I hope you bring some good news for me," repeated Mrs. Lockwood. "I have waited longer than the time you mentioned. You said March; and this is—"

"We are now at the end of March. I have had no news from you directly, all this time. And now that I see you it is natural that I should recall our conversation last summer."

She spoke very dryly, and with more than her ordinary deliberation of manner. Mr. Frost seized on an unimportant twig of her discourse, as to speak, hoping thereby to divert her attention from the root of the matter.

"You had no word from me?" he echoed, knitting his anxious forehead. "Why, I begged Georgian to come and give you my news several times. I was busy, day and night. My wife was the only person to whom I wrote a line save on business."

"Your wife came here once or twice—not specially to see me—and she said some vague word about your kind regards, and that you were all going well. But, of course, neither you nor I can pretend to send other that there was any satisfaction in that! I came by word of mouth, and so regards other people."

Mr. Frost controlled himself with an effort. Even while he repressed the rising temper, he told himself that it was cruelly hard that he should always have to be smooth and civil, while every one else he knew could have the satisfaction of lashing out when they were irritated; he wavered up to the instant when his lips began to form the words of his reply as to whether he should not give way and show his goaded spirit at whatever cost!

"Well, Zillah," he answered, "I have good news for you."

"Thank God!"

"At least, I suppose it will be considered to be good news. At Hugh's age I should have thought so."

"Ah!" exclaimed the widow, with a sharp sigh. "If there can be a question about its goodness, your 'good news' is not good enough."

"Hugh has the offer of a position which may be the stepping-stone to fortune. The directors of the Parthenope Embellishment Company will be happy to employ him, on my recommendation, for a northern certain. And it is a kind of employment which must bring him into notice. The Company is a flourishing one. The residence in such a charming place as Naples will be—"

"It is of no use. Not the least, Sidney," interposed Mrs. Lockwood. She had not called him by his Christian name for years, since the return of the once familiar appellation to her tongue was a proof of unwonted excitement in her.

"No use! No use!"

"It is of no use at all, if what you have to offer Hugh involves exile to a foreign country. I was in hopes that you had something better to tell me about that. I was in hopes that—"

"Exile!" repeated Mr. Frost, impatiently interrupting her. "What nonsense! Exile to Naples! How can a woman of your sense talk in that way? One would think I was proposing to send him to Sierra Leone.

"If you were, it would not be more unlikely that Hugh should accept it. He has made up his mind to do for himself. He has formed new ties, and assumed new responsibilities. Captain Shearsdown has offered to try to help Hugh to raise the necessary sum for the purchase of a business in Deanshire. If Captain Shearsdown had the power, I believe he would do so! And advance it directly. But he is not rich enough."

"Is Hugh married?" asked Mr. Frost, abruptly.

"No: but he has engaged himself to Maud Deanshire."

Mr. Frost felt on the whole relieved. If there existed would advantage in money that Hugh needed, it might be a reprieve for him, Sidney Frost.

And then—then it was possible that the money might never be needed at all! How good that would be! What an excellent way out of it all it would be! What a solution to the question that had been troubling what an admirable postponement (not cancelling, oh no! Of course Hugh's promise should be kept to the former that was building for every one connected with the Parthenope Embellishment Company should be kept to Veronica!) of the debt which he owed so irksomely! What a deserved solace to the anxieties of the past year, in whose heart was heavy with care and self-reproach!

"Engaged himself, has he?"

"Yes."

"Then the family difficulties I once hinted at were the scene of rusk, you know—have been got over?"

"Lady Tallis, the poor woman who died here, was very fond of Hugh. She left him at first she did not quite like the idea of her niece's marrying him, though she liked him well as wise, poor soul, and hadn't a real 'no' in her. And the girl loves him very much."

Mr. Lockwood's voice reflected no discontent in Zillah's voice or words. But Mr. Frost knew her well, and he was sure that her son's engagement did not altogether please her.

"It is not so bad a match for Hugh, after all," said he. "It is true that he will not be rich when you first spoke of this thing as being likely; but—" It might have been worse. Miss Desmond has a little property—pittance—but small as her dowry is, it may be useful to Hugh."

"Maud might have given a shilling to him, to purchase this business with. But—"

"But I suppose her trustees wouldn't hear of that?"

"Hugh would not hear of that! He is resolved that every shilling she has shall be settled tightly on herself."

"That is so like Hugh!"

"Now you understand that I can not—certainly will not—allow my son to commence his career launched on a footing which the debts he incurred to friends who would not press him unduly. I have thought of the matter in all points, for many years, and I have waited nights, and I have come to a fixed resolve on this point."

Mr. Frost was drawing his head on his hand, and with his other hand rapidly and nervously his watch-chain. He did not look at Mrs. Lockwood as he spoke to her.

"Zillah, I am going to risk making you hard or against me than you are already," he began.

"I am harder already than you can against myself," she answered; and then set her mouth tightly, as though to bar out words.

"I am going to risk making you harder against me than you are already, by confessing that my chief object in coming here was to see you immediately after my arrival—was not Hugh's business."

"That does not make me any harder against you. I am not hard in order to please myself. Heaven knows!"

"I have heard any thing from Mr. Lane, lately?"

"Sir John Gale's agent? Not since the first. He undertook to let that man know of his wife's death."

"You do not see the papers, nor hear much news, I suppose?"

"If No; you know I do not."

"But I suppose you have heard that Sir John Tallis Gale is dead, and that Sir Matthew reigns in his stead?"

"Dead! Sir John Gale dead!"

"You did not know it, then?"

"Not a word, not a hint! When did he die?"

"Twelve days ago, on the 10th of March. And you had not heard of it? Miss Desmond had not been informed?" said Mr. Frost, looking half-suspiciously at Zillah.

"Maud has scarcely seen a soul since her aunt's death. The vicar of Shipley came up to attend the funeral, by Lady Tallis's express desire, and he and Maud have been shut up in the house all day, and only go out to take a little walk in the Regent's Park in the evening. Hugh has been away at the Shearsdowns. I expect him home to-morrow or the next day. And that is the sort of routine which a week of his poor will! How strange! Poor Lady Tallis was unfortunate in her choice of a name for life. If she had survived him but a day, she might have had it in her power to make some provision for Maud."

"Ah!" sighed Mr. Frost.

"Well, I suppose that man, bad as he was, would feel himself bound to his wife some part of her fortune. And if he had died intestate, she would have been a rich woman. That would have been the right thing, surely. Men like Sir John Gale often make no will at all."

Mr. Frost did not reply at once. I happen to know that this man did make a will, though."

"You?"

"Yes: I have seen it."

Zillah knew Sidney Frost well enough to be quite sure that in saying this he was not indulging in mere impertinent gossip. Besides, he had said that he had not come to Gower Street on Hugh's business. Was the business to hear some upon in any way connected with Sir John Gale?—with Lady Tallis?—with Maud?

The latter supposition sent a sudden hope through her heart—a hope which seemed almost a pang. For it was a hope of the hopes, that the terse glimpses of good fortune which her imagination might perceive was instantly followed by a movement of repulsion. "If a thing appeared good, then it was unlikely!" That was Zillah's experience of life in her old years.

"You have seen Sir John Gale's will?" she said, folding her small, fair hands quietly on the table by which she sat, and bending over it a little toward Mr. Frost.

"I have, in Naples. I was there at the time. I became, through some business transactions, acquainted with a gentleman who is a great friend—he is a relative of the very beautiful young lady who was called in Naples Lady Gale."

"Ah, I see! He has left all his money to her in—in the Neapolitan? What a fool he was not to think of that before! I might have known that Veronica was clever, and bending over it for the prize?"

Zillah would not have admitted to herself that she had hoped; and not having hoped, she could not be said to be disappointed. Nevertheless it was a source of disappointment to her that gave an extra flavor of bitterness to her words.

"I have always thought you one of the most clear-headed women I ever knew, Zillah," said Mr. Frost, "as well as one of the most discreet and trust-worthy. And I am going to prove the sincerity of my opinion by telling you a strange story on the condition that you keep it strictly to yourself for the present."

"A secret? No, no, no! For Heaven's sake give me no more secrets to carry about with me!"

"This is not a secret long," answered Mr. Frost. Then he told her, with great clearness and accuracy, the story of the intimacy which Barletti, of Veronica's marriage on board the ship of war at Naples, and of the subsequent sudden death of Sir John Gale, and the finding of the will.

Mrs. Lockwood listened with ever deepening attention. When he came to the contents of the will, she removed the hand which had hitherto supported her head, and let it fall on the table.

"Was the will witnessed—duly made out—was it a legal document?" she asked.

"It was unimpeachably correct, and unusually clear and brief."

"Then, Maud Desmond is a great heiress!" She sat very still, and spoke very quietly, but an unusual flush of color rose pale face, and blue veins in the little worn hand that lay on the table swelled, revealing the force with which she was pressing it down.

"I can not tell you whether she is, or not. But you can tell me."

"I? I can tell you?"

"A true marriage invalidates a will; a false one does not. If there were not any breath in the body of Hilda, Lady Tallis Gale, at a quarter past ten o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, the fourth of March, the will is good, the second marriage is void, and your son's wife is one of the wealthiest women in this kingdom."

Zillah gave a great sigh. Her hands dropped nervelessly into her lap, and she sank back in her chair staring at Mr. Frost in silence.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. LOCKWOOD'S MEMORY.

Hugh returned from Lowater House on the day after Mr. Frost's interview with his mother. Mr. Levincourt was still in London, but intended to return home by the end of the week. The vicar's courtship of his ward's engagement had been given before Lady Tallis's illness had begun its dangerous course for immediate alarm. The visit he had been about to London since the terrible journey when he had taken Maud to her aunt's having been postponed by that Lady Tallis's urgent request that she might have an opportunity of speaking to him about Maud.

"I can not put all that I want to say upon paper," she wrote. And indeed the poor lady's epistolary style did not improve with years.

When the vicar arrived, in compliance with Lady Tallis's entreaty, she urged him not to oppose the wishes of the young people.

"If you do not object, Lady Tallis," said Mr. Levincourt, "I suppose I can not do so, either."

"It is not what Maud might have expected, if things had been different with us," the poor lady observed. "But what has the child to look to? Sir Thomas Delaney has eight children, six of 'em daughters! So it isn't very likely he'll do any thing for Maudie. And you know, my dear friend, birth and riches don't always make marriages happy. Goodness knows I had the first. At least poor papa always would be telling us that his was some of the best blood in Ireland—not literally, of course, ye understand; for the fact is, he suffered a martyrdom from gout all his life. But what did my birth do for me? And as to money—why, I'm sure, I'd like to have a little more of that to do as I like with! But still money won't buy the best things. And now that I had more than I knew what to do with—in the early days, ye know—but I'd a thousand times rather have seen my dear girl to be kind to me and to pet, than to be as rich as a Begum without a soul that cared a quarter for me, comparatively. And what brings me round to what I was saying to ye, that it would be a pity to lose a good husband for our dear Maud, just for a bit of family pride. I've reflected a good deal about it lately, my dear friend. And ye know good husbands don't grow on every bush!"

The vicar had no personal wish to oppose the engagement. He liked Hugh, and thought well of him. And, besides, there was another feeling in his mind which tended to make him favorable to the engagement. He had never lost the conviction that Maud's mother would have been happier married to a man in the vale of a certain poor clergyman whom she loved, than it was possible for her to have been under any circumstances of loveless prosperity. And he had a vague notion that in forbearing to oppose Maud's love-affair he was making a kind of amends for the share he had had in destroying her mother's young romance of long years before. He therefore said wandered with him under the old trees in her Irish home, and dreamed her girlish dream of unspeakable happiness.

Lady Tallis's interview with the vicar had taken place on the 3d of December, and the engagement had been formally sanctioned before Christmas.

"We needn't proclaim it just yet," said Lady Tallis, "until Hugh sees his way a little more clearly. And Maudie is quite young enough to wait."

"Dear Aunt Hilda, there is no one I know of to proclaim it to but Hugh and myself—simply and sadly. And Lady Tallis had acquiesced; not without a sigh that the alliance of a daughter of the ancient house of Deanshire of Deanmond should be, perforce, thus mutely inglorious.

Hugh had, however, compounded for permission to tell his happy news to his old friends, the Shearsdowns. And Captain Shearsdown had been moved to the offer of trying to assist Hugh in his project of raising the money for the purchase of the architect's and surveyor's business in Deanshire, by the announcement that Hugh was to marry Maud Deanshire.

"Did your ears burn, dearest—what pretty little white ears they are!—while I was away?" Hugh said when, on the first evening of his return, holding Maud's hands in his, and looking down into her face, he said, "They must have been of the fieriest crimson, if the old saw were true; for we talked of you, you, you—scarcely any thing but you—all the time, my love, at Lowater."

"We talked! Dear Hugh, I am afraid you must have teased them with my name."

"No, darling; Mrs. Shearsdown spoke of you constantly. What a beautiful creature she is!" added Hugh, with a naive earnestness that brought a smile to Maud's lips, and a blush to her pale cheek.

Maud is not much changed in outward aspect since she last presented herself to the reader. She is perhaps a trifle paler and thinner, but that has come within the last month. She had grieved for her aunt's death, but without pain of mind. She had the peace-bestowing assurance that her presence had been a solace and a joy to poor Aunt Hilda: and had made the forsaken woman some amends for years of hard usage and neglect. She had not the slightest sense of blame of that unpeasable sorrow which comes from remorse-ful remembrance of deeds undone, or done grudgingly without heart-felt kindness.

Lady Tallis's death had been almost painless. She had not known that her end was near until within three days of her decease, and then she spoke of it as a welcome relief. Maud had uttered many a solemn injunction to Hugh to be true and tender to the orphan girl who loved him. "I'll be as true in the world as I find I can do nothing for the sweet child," she had said.

"If she had been my daughter instead of my niece, she would have inherited my fortune pretty under my marriage-settlement. But, as it is, it will come back to me, perhaps in all for the best."

After a pause, she had added: "I can't speak of Sir Thomas, my dear Hugh. But—if—if ever any chance—God only knows how strongly I feel the necessity of repairing the wrong I have done—you will do it. And—I did him to know that I prayed for him, Hugh, and asked his pardon if I erred but in the way I had been taught to err."

"Dearest Lady Tallis, I am sure you have nothing to reproach yourself with!"

"Ah, Hugh, Hugh, looking death in the face gives the foolishest of us wisdom enough to see our own shortcomings. And I'd like him to forgive me my trespasses as I forgive his—and as I hope to be forgiven."

Again she paused; this time for so long that Hugh thought she had fallen asleep. But as he began softly to move away she stopped him and motioned him to bend down his head over the couch where she was lying. And then she said, "And, Hugh, when I am gone, be may do justice to that—that young woman. I have felt very bitter toward her, that's the truth. And I don't mean to tell you that I feel quite as a Christian ought to feel at this minute. But I have forgiven her, my dear, though it is hard. I dare say she is to be pitied, poor creature! And I won't distress our darling just now with speaking of it, but afterward, Hugh, when I am calm, and can think of me without pain, ye may tell her what I said. She loved the other girl, and 'twill comfort her."

And so the poor, gentle, kindly spirit had left the world, in charity with all men.

Hugh had much to say to Maud on that first day of his return. They walked out together at dusk, and he spoke of his plans. Maud had not yet been definitively arranged, but Captain Shoreham and good hopes that Mr. Stowe would advance the money required. Herbert Snowe was now a partner in his father's bank, and was a good-natured desire to help helping Hugh. The old gentleman was slow and cautious and difficult to satisfy. But Hugh had good hopes that he would consent to advance the money after a decent delay.

"And then, my own darling, we will be married directly, will we not? There is nothing to wait for, is there?"

"N—no, dear Hugh. If you will take me in my black gown, I will come to you when you are ready. Aunt Hilda would not have wished us to delay our marriage."

"Far from that! You know what she said, the good kind soul. And as to the gown, you'll be as a white one, for that day at all events."

When they got home again, Hugh found some papers and plans to look over for his employers, Digby and West. He had not left their office, but was continuing at a weekly salary, on the understanding that he should be allowed to quit them at a fortnight's notice. They all sat in Mrs. Lockwood's little parlor. The ladies down up stairs had not been used since Lady Lillis's death. Maud had a book, but it lay for the most part idly in her lap, while her eyes dreamily wandered toward Hugh as he bent over his papers, now and then raising his head with a blunt pencil between his teeth to hold it, and knit his brows passionately over the consideration of some difficult point. The vicar, too, had a book which he read, or seemed to read. And Mrs. Lockwood's nimble fingers were busy with a basketful of soft grey woolen stockings—Hugh's stockings—which she was mending on an invisible principle that almost appeared to make a darned stocking superior to an undarned one; so faithfully darning was the crossing of the threads!

Usually the widow sat out by evenings in precious. To-night, however, her tongue moved, if not as rapidly, almost as unrestingly, as her fingers. She had spoken on the topic of Lady Lillis's death, returning to it again and again, until the vicar at length shut his book with a look of resignation.

"You remember what day it was she died, Maud?" said Mrs. Lockwood.

"Remember it!"

"I mean you remember the date and all. Of course you do. Sunday, the fourth of March, it was; yes, that was the date."

"Yes."

"And—and when I came up stairs again after preparing the beef tea that she had asked for, she had fallen asleep."

"Yes," said Maud, again. She did not understand why these details were recapitulated, but she answered evenly and patiently.

"We have never spoken of the particulars to Mr. Levincourt, have we?" pursued Mrs. Lockwood. The vicar was not specially desirous of hearing these particulars than he was of hearing respecting Lady Lillis's death; and Zillah perceived this perfectly. But with an unconsciousness of her usual fine tact, she continued to harp on the subject.

"She seemed a little better, and very cheerful that morning, did she not, Maud?"

"Yes; she was free from suffering at the last, thank God."

"Oh, quite; quite. When I first came into her room, dear, I feel much encouraged to say did yesterday.' Who would have thought that by noon that day she would be dead!"

The vicar, feeling himself called on to say something, gave a little sigh, and murmured, "Ah, it is often the case that disorder that the patient feels unaccountably better just before the end comes."

"I was with her a long time after Maud went away that morning, Mr. Levincourt. Maud had been sitting up all night, and was worn out. I sent her to bed. Was I not right?"

"Very right, and considerate."

"And so Maud was not with her aunt at the last. But Lady Lillis passed away in a kind of gentle slumber. She had a long and painful past ten, I should say. Indeed I am pretty sure. And Jane says so too. I was talking to Jane about it this morning. I could swear Lady Lillis was alive until past ten o'clock! And Jane is sure of it too."

"You had better not swear it, either of you," said Hugh, looking up from his papers, "for you would be mistaken."

"Mistaken! Why, Hugh, the—the more I think of it, the surer I feel that—"

"Darling mother, we need not pursue the discussion. It is not likely that you will have to make oath about it."

"Not at all likely. Most unlikely, as far as—as far as we know. But still, Hugh, as far as the matter of fact is concerned, I feel convinced that she must have been still alive after ten o'clock. She must! I am sure of it."

Mrs. Lockwood's tone was so petulant and sharp, and so unlike her usual tone of resolute composure, that Hugh looked at her with some uneasiness.

"She has been overworn and harassed, the poor little mother," he thought. Then he glanced at Maud, whose eyes were brimming with tears; and pushing his papers aside, to be finished when the others should have gone to bed, he set himself to speak cheerfully of his prospects and of his plans; but they would let the matter rest over Street; and how he had seen a tiny cottage near the spot he and his heart set upon for their own. The vicar was present, but not his mother; and how he had already projected sundry inexpensive alterations that would make the tiny cottage a delightful residence. And so no more was said that night about Lady Lillis.

STATE TELEGRAPHS IN ENGLAND.

AT the present time every thing relating to the transfer of the telegraphs to the government in England is in a transition state, very many of the arrangements not having yet been completed. It was intended, if possible, to effect the transfer on the 1st of January, 1870; but so much delay has been occasioned to be done that it is doubtful whether all would be ready by that date. A large room has been fitted up in the London Post-office with telegraphic instruments, in order that the clerks on the premises may learn to work them. Many of the instruments that are to be used in the country have been sent to the post-offices in the provinces. The apparatus is of the same character with the Morse printing telegraph and the single needle instrument; a wise selection, for long experience has shown that they are the best in place in the hands of unscientific clerks. They are not very liable to get out of order, and are very certain in their indications.

The following are among the changes that will be gradually introduced. Some of them, for the present a date that even the preliminaries have not been arranged as yet. "The nine large district offices will be closed, and the local telegraphic stations, and each one will be connected by wire with the subordinate offices in its district. The chief post-office in each of the largest provincial towns will be made a central telegraphic station, and will be in communication by wire with the direct communication with three of the largest central London offices, namely, those in the West Central District, the Western District, and the Eastern District. Subordinate offices in the Metropolitan and suburban districts will be connected with the Central Office in the Central Telegraph Station, and will be in direct communication with three of the largest provincial towns. Messages will be sent from any post-office in the kingdom at the money-order offices, in all places having a population of 2000 persons and upward. Subscribers will pay for the use of the telegraph a transmission by hand in the ordinary way to subscribers in proximity with the telegraph offices; or pillar-boxes will be places of deposit for messages written on stamped paper and, as a rule, all messages must be paid for in advance. The charge for transmission of a message of twenty words from any one part of the United Kingdom to any other part will be one shilling; but when it has to be delivered at a considerable distance from the nominal subscriber, it will be forwarded from that station by post for a penny, or by special messenger at sixpence per mile. Facilities will be given for the transmission of money-orders by telegraph, and as soon as possible the charge for such messages will probably be reduced. Such are the plans which will be carried out, some of which will be in a very forward state in a few weeks' time.

ENGLISH BOY COLONISTS.

A BENEVOLENT society has been established in London, whose head-quarters are known as the "Refuge for Homeless and Destitute Children," which is doing much good, not only in the way of saving many of the youth of both sexes, who would otherwise be in great danger of the most criminal class, but in giving their young charges such a practical education as may fit them to maintain themselves in after life. The industrial branch of the establishment is a training-ship, where such boys as choose a sea-life receive instruction in nautical matters; another is a Farm School; while another, in which we also have interest, is a Boys' Home and Industrial Farm in Kansas. The society has lately purchased a large tract of land on the Missouri Pacific Railway, comprising about 23,000 acres, and here they intend to form a colony of the society's children, the first detachment of little emigrants, twenty boys, having already arrived at the village of Wakefield, the nucleus of the future settlement. Our sketch on page 85 represents the New York Station of the Erie Railroad, with these boys and girls on the way to their new home. They are about instruction in useful crafts, farming, carpentry, shoemaking, tailoring, etc., may anticipate a prosperous future for the colony.

FROZEN IN.

OUR illustration on page 88 represents a pretty scene, with the counterpart of which the frequenters of the Central Park skating grounds must be familiar. We generally associate swans with summer skies, and streams with grassy banks, and lakes with reedy islets where they make their nests, and not with frost and snow and ice, as we see them here depicted. Their beautiful white forms give the finishing touch of poetry to summer streams. All our readers will recall Mr. BROWNING'S ballad of "the Swan's Nest," and many will remember the poem in which KEATS describes a lake

"Which round its margin reflected woven bowers,
And in its middle space a sky that never lowers.

There saw the swan his neck of arched snow,
And oared himself along with stately
Sparkling his ivory eyes: his feet did show
Beneath the waters like Aurora's dawning:
And on his back a lily reclined voluptuously."

And again, in his "Epistle to GEORGE FELTON MATHEW," he speaks of

"A black-eyed swan upon the widening stream."

Our illustration is taken from Duddington Loch, near Edinburgh. In the back ground are seen the old church, and some of the houses of the little village from which the lake takes its name. The Scotch winter has set in, the water has frozen over, and the stately swans are reduced to the humiliating condition of receiving relief from the charitable; but while the summer returns, and they are once more at liberty to our themselves on the lake in their own majestic way, the degradation of their present state will be forgotten, and all ideas of outdoor relief banished from their minds.

THE NEW BOSTON POST-OFFICE.

On page 89 will be found a sketch of the new Post-Office and Sub-Treasury Building in Boston, Massachusetts, erected under the able direction of A. B. MULLETT, Esq., the architect of the new Post-Office Building in this city. The Boston edifice, it will be seen from our illustration, is built in the French style, now so popular in this country. It is to be 200 feet in length of front, 237 feet; height to top of cornice, 90 feet; height of centre pavilion, 127 feet. The internal arrangements of the building are admirably adapted to the purpose for which they are designed; and the whole reflects great credit upon the supervising architect, Mr. MULLETT, and the superintendent, Mr. GRIDLEY J. F. BRYANT, who superintended the work of construction.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"RAISIN," or "China grass," has excited a good deal of interest in our country during the past four or five years. Many speculators and producers have thought they could easily make a fortune by its cultivation, and that it would especially rupture cotton, and almost every other fibrous material in value. We published in the last monthly report of the Department of Agriculture that it was found to be a valuable plant in Utah, according to the manner of preparing the fiber. The most important point is that of decortication, and as it contains, which must be done so as to retain its strength, about 75 per cent. of gum, the facts and statements have been made touching the practical value of the Ramie plant, yet the demand for it is so very low that the fibre can be easily and perfectly separated from the wood and its own bast at short regards. The question of practical success has been very lucrative, but no one is known to have made a fortune by cultivation of the plant. In this case be reported until inventive genius and mechanical or chemical skill has perfected its proper and proper preparation. The Department of Agriculture has investigated the subject carefully, and encouraged other inventors in culture, and given liberal rate invention and effort to a successful issue, and at the same time saved the unsuspecting from losses through the greed of gain.

Dr. John M. Carnochan, the new Health-Officer of the Port of New York, is a native of Savannah, Georgia, and a lineal descendant of General Israel Putnam. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and graduated with honors under the teaching of Dr. Valentine Mott of the city. After obtaining his degree he spent two years in attending the clinics of the principal hospitals of Europe. In 1847, being then thirty years of age, he commenced practice in New York, and rapidly rose to high distinction. He was soon appointed Surgeon-in-Chief of the New York State Emigrant Refuge, and Professor of the Principles and Operations of Surgery in the New York Medical College. His success in performing dangerous operations has been wonderful, and rendered him famous both at home and abroad; while his unyielding nerve and kindness of heart have won the esteem and love of all who know him.

The large wood-cut portrait of Rev. Noah Hunt Schenck, D.D., of Brooklyn, is an admirable specimen of American workmanship, from the Aldine Press of Messrs. Sutton, Bowne, & Co.

An alarming report was recently circulated in a certain quarter of Paris, to the effect that a large crack in one of the public schools had resigned his position on account of the necessity of a small-pox among his pupils. Investigation proved that the trouble was small pay—but small-pox!

Two English "misses" made themselves somewhat conspicuous in the Cathedral of Cologne, by kneeling on the benches above the kneeling multitude, and keeping up a constant gossip across the floor in the unconcerned manner in the Council. The Pope, with a mild smile, pointed out the two culprits to the cardinals, but no alarming consequences have overtaken them. Probably the Pope patiently considers them, like himself, infallible.

The well recently completed in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, is said to be the largest in the world, and to open out the most important source of water. The outer wall is fifty feet in diameter, two feet thick, and sixty-three feet deep. The inner curb or wall is thirty-five feet in diameter and two feet thick, having a depth of ten feet. The masonry, as seen from the top of the structure, is a marvel of neatness and solidity. The water surface is the well is thirteen feet above high-water level, and the depth of water in the well is fourteen feet. The pump is the Worthington steam duplex, and is capable of forty gallons. The capacity of raising one million gallons of water every twenty-four hours. Connected with the well is a massy accident to the Brooklyn Water-works, this well has more than the necessary capacity to supply the Park abundantly with water. The special work of the well will be to supply the pools at an elevation of 135 feet, and from the pools the water is conducted to the lake.

A Valparaiso merchant having received a challenge from an officer, sent him this sensible answer: "I have no desire whatsoever to kill you, still less do I desire to be killed myself. Here is what I propose. Go to the nearest wood, choose a tree, and shoot at myself; place yourself fifty, thirty, or even fifteen steps from it—just as you like—and then fire bravely at me in turn. If you hit it, I will admit that I was in the wrong, and will offer you an apology. In the contrary case, I shall be sorry to have missed you."

The "Oculum" is the name of a new machine, which the inventor claims to be possessed of such wonderful magnifying power that by means of it mouse one can actually look through the walls of a human body, and study the delicate mechanism therein. When the machine is perfected, and brought to electricity, by means of a battery connected with the machine. Herewith the internal apparatus, no less than pales and tongue, will be subjected to the wise inspection of the human eye.

The plan of planting sunflowers on an extensive scale, for the purpose of neutralizing the pernicious effects of exhalations from marshes, has been tried with great success in the vicinity of Rochefort, France; and the authorities of Holland assert that intermittent fever has wholly disappeared in districts where the sunflowers have been planted. It is not yet determined what is the exact dependence on the atmosphere; whether it generates oxygen, like other plants of rapid growth, or whether, like the cypress, it exists, and thrives, on the mercury the organic germs of miasms that produce fever.

The efficacious power of carbolic acid is shown by the testimony of Dr. Jourdanet, a French physician who writes from Valle Mexico, Nicaragua, that after the severe epidemic of malignant cholera, which extended through fifteen months, he overcame it by the use of carbolic acid, causing all the rooms and passages of houses occupied by the sick to be sprinkled, as well as sprinkled with water containing a small quantity of carbolic acid. The result was, that cholera ceased to fever and ague, which had long centred in that locality, had since made their appearance.

Chicago papers announce that five thousand marriage licenses were granted in that city last year; but they refuse to publish the divorce record for "lack of room!"

From a late number of the Straits Weekly Advertiser—a little journal published in Bangkok—we condense a description of the Jungle, of which it is difficult for a non-accustomed mind to form any of the impressions none to form any adequate idea. In Singapore, the jungle consists of a dense growth of trees, all standing close together like stalks in a wheat-field, their trunks varying in diameter from a foot to a yard. They are branchless until near the top, when they spread out into compact foliage of about a mile in depth. The tops of these giants join together, and underneath grow shorter and more arrborescuous trees; and again beneath these latter grow the various species of palm, few of which have received even Malay names. But the peculiar characteristic of the jungle is the extraordinary manner in which the whole mass is woven together by a net-work of creepers and vines, which bind as man's body, twining spirally round the trunks of the larger trees, and from the top of one tree and after seven or eight trees reaching to the top, from which they descend in large drop down again in endless curves of uniform girth to the ground, where they become as fixed, and look much like the trees they embrace.

Another peculiar and beautiful feature of these jungles consists of the numerous orchidaceous plants that hang from the trees in the most luxuriant way. In themselves on the creeper net-work that grows around them. Conspicuous among the number of these floral-plants, to be found probably in greater luxuriance in the jungles of Singapore than in any other part of the world. It is extraordinary where these singular plants place themselves. Some can be seen on the very tops of the highest trees, while others, as if destined for man, cluster within an easy distance of the ground. They have a curious pod-shaped fruit, which, on close water, perhaps about a quarter of a pint to each cup. On complete dissection of the fruit, it is found, fully trees of ivy-gone ages are piled upon each other, giving birth, in their decay, to innumerable forms of vegetation.

There is a probability that Rethold Auerbach, the German novelist, will soon visit the United States, for the purpose of giving a series of readings from his own works.

An extensive conspiracy against the life of the Czar of Russia has just been discovered. The plot, of large dimensions, was the work of the conspirators, and the pupils of the University of Pupich and Yarmwlow are chiefly implicated. The plan was to blow up the pals on the railroad line by which the Czar was to journey; but the conspiracy was discovered. A conspiracy of less extent has also been discovered in St. Petersburg. Many are also known to be arrested on Russian nationality—a fact which surprises the Russians in general, who suspected the Poles.

New wonders are becoming known. A pupil of Baron Liebig's, Dr. Hoffman—has discovered certain others which, when poured upon certain chemical compounds, instantaneously produce precious stones of all kinds.

Although Trapmann, the "Panama murderer," had assured his fellow-prisoners that he should not be executed, he took the most impressive method of saying suicide, which no one could prevent him from employing. he has suffered the extreme penalty of the law. His photograph represents him as exceedingly youthful in appearance, and his countenance by no means ferocious. Phrenology shows him to have possessed intellect enough, but as deficient in moral powers. His head is large, and the region of vanity, spiritual manifestations, and his hands and feet long and sinewy, with rounded joints. Dr. Hoffman's theory is known as a general law that the ear is an index to the equilibrium of the body, and that the semi-circular canals—a symmetrical ear indicating proper equilibrium.

FOOT-BALL AT RUGBY.—[SEE PAGE 93.]

WINNING A PAIR OF GLOVES.

GEESE.

GEESE.

Here much love, and there but little,
Here a flame, and there a flicker;
Maiden, lovers' vows are brittle.
How old folks our feet and bicker.
Warning you to think of this,
Hark! the foolish geslings hiss!

Love stays not at fever heat;
Summer turns to winter snows,
April blossoms, under foot,
Are all trodden ere June glows;
Warning you to think of this,
Hear the mocking ganders hiss.

Hear that couple jar and jangle.
They were once as fond as you.
Love-knots are too apt to tangle.
One day you may learn to rue.
Ganies warning you of this,
Hark the wise geese, how they hiss!

Never heed the gabbling creatures;
Press the lip and clasp the hand,
Gaze upon each other's features,
Wander in your Fairy Land.
Never doubt you're right in this,
Though the silly geslings hiss.

FOOT-BALL AT RUGBY.

FOOT-BALL is essentially an English school-game, and is nowhere else in the world played with so much pluck and zest. The DUKE OF WELLINGTON, while surveying a game at Eton, said it was there the field of Waterloo was won. The finest game is said to be played at Rugby—our readers will remember how enthusiastically it is described in that charming book, "School-days at Rugby"—and our illustration on page 92 gives a vivid idea of the sport. The sixth match, the greatest event in the school year, usually commences about the first week of October, when the immemorial elms which surround and intersect the school-close or playing-fields are rich in the full glory of their autumnal tints. Nothing can exceed the picturesque effect of the grouping of the various bands of combatants, as, trailing out after roll-call in the Big School, they proceed to strip for business under the grand old trees.

The sixth form boys wear striped, the school plain, white jerseys, and both spotless white trowsers, and for head-gear velvet caps of various tints, and ornamented with gold or silver embroidery and tassels, the distinguishing insignia of different boarding-houses. The players are drawn up in two lines—the sixth fellows, a compact band, some forty strong; for the whole form plays pitted against double that number of champions selected from the rest of the school. The ball is placed on the ground between them. In the rear of either rent are ranged the so-called "back players," who are selected for their prowess in "dropping," or kicking the ball the greatest distance on the drop-kick. Presently a player steps forth from the side which has won the toss, calls out "Are you ready?" and, without waiting for an answer, sends the ball spinning far over the heads of the opposite side. It is caught, or taken on the bound by one of their back players, who, running with it as far as he can without interruption, "drops it" back again. If the "dropping" is too good, the game becomes monotonous, for the ball keeps flying through the air, backward and forward over the heads of the forward players of either side, who have nothing to do but stare at it. Not till one of the back players misses his "drop," i. e., kicks the ball along the ground, or is collared at his running, does the best work begin. With the back-players it is a sort of artillery practice from the distance. When the ball gets in among the forward players, the bayonet charges and hand-to-hand business commences.

We know of no more cruel moment in a Rugby boy's school life than that never-to-be-forgotten one when, having rushed at and kicked the ball for the first time in a "big-side" match, and endeavored to run with it, he finds himself collared, surrounded, and thrown down, and, on rising, half-crushed to death, from the bottom of a huge pile of human bodies, he stands face to face with his first "scrimmage"—a word awful in its significance to the experienced. Upon the manner in which he acquits himself in that crisis will depend the opinion his school-fellows will have of his pluck ever after. Should he flinch, he has bagged like grim death—it being a point of honor not to suffer it to be wrenched from him —will have been pressed to the ground sooner or later, which is the signal for the "maul" to cease and the "scrimmage" to begin. The boy-novice, boy, whose hand is never removed from the ball, even when it has touched the ground, has the old recklessness of the wherehood of his nature displayed; the theory being, that in the thick of the scrimmage, where you are not possibly see it, it must be supposed to lie close to the shins of your immediate antagonist. When the blood is at boiling point—as it always should be in a scrimmage, which might else be thought to verge on the brutal—is for ever the case, whether any pain from being "hacked," that for the time you feel almost in the seventh heaven. In the morning you are occasionally conscious of possessing shins.

THE WAGER.

"NONSENSE!"

"Oh very well. It's very easy to say nonsense."

"Do you mean to say that you believe all this stuff?"

"I mean to say that every night, at exactly hour, those three murderers return there and hold converse under that gibbet."

"I can imagine how a sensible man like you can seriously talk so."

"I tell you I've heard them. It's no more unreasy with me; I've heard them. I once laughed at the idea, just as you do now. Not I heard, and I laughed no more. Do you mean at any time this night, if you dare, and I bet any thing you'll come back suffering."

"Done; what'll you bet?"

"I'll bet my horse against your pony."

"Done. I'll take it."

"Done it is. Here, Brown, you'd do to hold the stakes."

The above conversation took place in the "Red Lion Inn" at Camden, a little village on the coast of Sussex. The first speaker was a fine, fresh-faced, broad-shouldered, honest-looking fellow, who under rough clothing bore unmistakable signs of a gentleman. The other had the air of a sea-faring man, though his dress was that of a farmer. Two others were with him, both of whom had very much the same appearance. Five or six others were present, all of whom took a deep interest in the conversation, and gave a hearty assent to the bet.

As the bet was made the man in brown arose and proceeded to take charge of the stakes. The two men who had made the bet also rose. By the air of the rest of the company it was evident that they considered that the bet was already lost by the stranger. They were all fishermen of the village. The one who had made the bet was a stranger; and broad pride was aroused, even if there were no other, in the native breast.

The man who had accepted the wager began to prepare for his departure. He took a flask of brandy only to encounter the supernatural horrors before him was supposed to encounter, and laughingly deported.

"Well," said one of the spectators, after he had departed, "he's gone: the young fellow's gone. He'll get enough of it."

"That he will," said another.

"He'll be back as soon as he gets there."

"They've driven off better men than him."

"The clanking of the chains is enough."

"Yes—let alone the voices."

"The first time I heard it I was struck dumb."

"And I should have fallen dead if I'd ever a been another man with me."

"It's a nice pony the young feller will have to give up, any way."

"Well, he ought to know better than to be so free with his bets."

"He's never been much in these parts before."

"No, of course not, or he wouldn't have been so free with his bets."

While these men were speaking the one who had made the bet, with his two companions, had quietly departed. Scarcely had they left, when a fierce gust of wind, coming up the village street, set all the signs and shutters creaking, and added to the superstitious terror of the company at the inn.

While they were engaged in various speculations as to the result of this experiment, the young adventurer was going on toward the place.

It was on the summit of a wide, bleak, and desolate ridge, terminated by a cliff, at the base of which the ocean surf beat. Here, some years before, a murder had been committed by a gang of ruffians. They had been captured, and three of the ring-leaders had been hanged in chains upon a lofty gibbet on the very spot where the crime had been committed.

As the adventurer neared the spot the wind blew in gusts over the ridge. The moon occasionally shining out from behind a cloud revealed the scene. It was a lonely place, where a bold swell have appalled a man even of strong nerves. The gloom of the night itself, the howling wind, and the fearful ground rose a lofty three-armed gibbet, from each arm of which there hung suspended the chains of a man in chains. The rushing wind gave to the scene additional elements of terror. As it drove past it seemed to reverberate, sweeping slowly to and fro, with all their load of chains and fetters, so that they creaked and rattled, and made a thousand weird and ghastly sounds in the lonely darkness.

From the distance there came up a deep, low, sullen roar, at regular intervals dying and rising again, to die away in long, low reverberations. It was the ocean surf, which beat upon the shore not far away; for Camden was a fishing village, and the gibbet stood upon a high cliff which overhung the beach. The sound of the wind, the low, sullen roar of the surf, and the clank of the chains, were sufficient to inspire dread in the boldest heart.

The young man, however, seemed quite unaffected by the circumstances. Before him he undismounted, flung the horse's bridle over his arm, gave his cloak about him, and waited.

For about half an hour he waited patiently, keeping a wary look about him, so as not to be surprised in that direction. The result was at last sufficient to prevent any one from coming near unobserved, and the watcher felt satisfied so long as he kept his eyes fixed on his post.

At length he felt conscious of a low moan, which was entirely different from any of the sounds which he had hitherto heard.

It seemed to arise from the ground behind him. It was a strange moan, and a very mournful one.

The watcher grasped his pistols and turned toward the direction from which the sound came.

Then followed a heavy sigh. He waited. Then a heavy groan. And after that a moan passed over the watcher's face.

"Very dreary trickery," he thought. "If I had the management of it, I would act differently."

Suddenly there was a grating overhead. He looked. The chains of the middle corpse. Ascending. They were moving down slowly. As they descended they swung in the wind, and were tossed together, and then they ceased to rise, but rose-tree. Still they were suspended, and were not coming down. Again they began to rise.

The watcher stepped back and coolly waited with a grim smile on his face. The skeletons rose slowly, and then began to descend to the ground. The watcher coolly took one of them and gave a sudden jerk. It broke off, and dropped a hundred feet in length. Meantime the other two ascended, and then descended. The caught one of them with the same peculiar jerk, and pulled the rope in the same way. Suddenly the second arm began to descend.

"No, no, my fine fellow," muttered the watcher, coolly watching the rope. "Once it is got out of reach, and pulling with all his force. It was a sudden and violent pull, and the skeleton yielded. It broke along with the cliff, and tumbled in a crevice. In the midst of the light three figures appeared, each wrapped in a long white sheet.

They were muscle, bones of a man in chains. For in the watcher, who held his pistols in his hands and waited.

The three figures, with low groans, marched slowly up toward the gibbet. The watcher moved to meet them. Suddenly, as they came near, he made a rush at him. He fired. One of them dropped.

Instantly he sprang toward the opening from which they had emerged, and pulling out a boatsman's whistle, gave three long, shrill, penetrating blast. It was quickly done, and then he waited with his pistols extended.

Two out of the three figures stood motionless, close by the one who had fallen. Groans of pain were heard from the latter.

But now other figures appeared upon the scene. At the sound of the shrill whistle, six or eight men, all armed, appeared from the cliff below, where they had lain in concealment, and rushed up to the two figures. In a moment they surrounded them and seized them. The watcher then advanced toward them.

"Here's this fellow" said he, stooping over the wounded man, and tearing away the sheet with which he was enveloped. "Ah, ha! my fine fellow," said he; "it's you, is it? So you've lost your bet."

It was the man with whom he had made the bet. He gave a deep groan.

The watcher then tore away the sheets from the others. One was Brown—the man that held the stakes; the other was one of the company who had been at the inn.

"I'm going down there into your place. So look out," said he.

"Who are you," cried Brown, savagely, "seizing and shooting innocent persons like a highwayman?"

"I want you to know, I'm Captain Sinclair, a United States Custom-house officer. You were playful enough to bet with me, and I think I've won it. But come" he continued, sternly, "I've suspected that you were up to mischief here. I only came here yesterday. My predecessor could never trace the extensive smuggling operations that went on just about here; but I thought that perhaps the gibbet had something to do with it. You see I've caught you."

Brown uttered something between a curse and an entreaty.

"Tie his hands, lads. Tie up both of them."

The men did it.

"Now two of you fellows stay here. Has anybody seen Tom?"

One of the men handed one to him.

He lighted it, and then descended by the orifice through which the three figures had emerged.

After a short distance, he found himself in a passage-way which went down on the side of a cliff that had been severed in twain. The path sloped steeply for a hundred yards or so, and ended in a cavern. Here there were barrels and boxes in great numbers, all filled with contraband articles. The cavern itself was just underneath the gibbet. It was evident that these smugglers had made use of the gibbet to frighten away people from their haunt.

An examination afterward showed that these three men alone had conducted a vast smuggling operation, of which the three figures had constituted They had been completely entrapped by Captain Sinclair. As he had suspected, suspected upon trickery about the gibbet. He had made the bet, and caused some of his men to follow him privately to the place. The result was as has been described. The three smugglers found themselves suddenly cut off from their place of concealment, and on their way to the State Prison. As for Captain Sinclair, his brilliant exploit was rewarded with promotion.

Now that Virginia is on the point of getting back into the Union, the next step should be to develop her great internal resources, and fit her to assume the rank which, by her natural position, she formerly held, and which, but for slavery, she would have held still. Virginia was the largest of the original States, with an unbounded western area, and stretching to the Ohio River on the west. Her territory contained, besides a variety of soil and climate, inexhaustible beds of coal and iron, which for long years have been left almost untouched. It contained, moreover, by far the most convenient passages across the Alleghany range of mountains between the Ohio valley and the Atlantic, which, under a free system, would long ago have been the opened by canal or railroad, or both. One of Virginia's most pressing needs at this time is increased facilities of communication whereby to get up her pastures, wheat-lands, coal-fields, and orchards to the nearest point of the interior of the immense of our eminent New York merchants and Pennsylvania capitalists, who have been in the completion of the great Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad (formerly the Virginia Central), extending from Richmond to the Ohio River, opposite to it Virginia and West Virginia, to the Kentucky boundary. The length of the road is 427 miles, of which only about 200 miles, on the Ohio slope of the chain, are uncompleted.

The Ohio slope, which must become one of the main arteries of communication to and from the western states, previous to the war, an object of State care, no less than $5,300,000 having been expended in construction on the western portion of the line. This expenditure, together with other legislative privileges, has been transferred to the new corporation, which is pushing forward the line to the Ohio River among the most important features of this line will be the union of the celebrated coal-fields of the Kanawha with the ores of Virginia, and also the addition of a new, short, and cheap line of traffic for the branch of the shop Virginia to the Atlantic. The road still no doubt be the cause of drawing thousands of tons of shop Virginia to the sea-board, and it also affords a short route from Washington to the Southwest, and must become a grand central thoroughfare between the Atlantic and the Mississippi valley.

CHAPTED HANDS and FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hegeman's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. Try it. Sold by druggists. Ask for Camphor Ice. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price, 25 cents. Sent free by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL—the world's great remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all affections of the Lungs and Throat.—(ADV.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at 1172 Broadway, cor. 29th Street.
Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Old household articles replated. Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Hanging. Call and see them.

PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL—1870. Vol. 50. New Series. $2 a year; 20 cts. a No. Specimens, 15 cts. See list of premiums. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.
Jan. and Feb. Nos. now ready.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Send by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.
TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

2.
ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By WILLIAM GODWIN, ESQ., Author of "St. Leon," "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 16mo, Paper, 37 cents.

3.
PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maccii Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens. With Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By C. S. HARRINGTON, M.A., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

4.
MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introduction, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron. By a Lady. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.
MISS MITFORD'S LIFTED AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village," &c. Edited from her Letters by HENRY FOTHERGILL CHORLEY. With Anecdotes and Sketches, and Letters of Contemporaries. Edited by her Friend A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

6.
ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "False Colors," "Denis Donne," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Views of Religious Truth," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $2. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by DORÉ. Delia Bacher, Designer, and Bonnard. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

8.
KITTY. A Novel. By M. BETHAM EDWARDS, Author of "Doctor Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.
FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 210 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $6 00.

10.
THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By CHARLES E. PASCOE. With Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Dillenburger. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

11.
COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies, and for Private Instruction. Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

12.
WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD; a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By FREDERICK BOYLE. With Illustrations Drawn by Harden Sidney. "The True Heroism of Field Sports." "The Secret of Success." 8vo, Cloth, With 141 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

13.
BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Alaalegh. With 13 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

14.
HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENSON J. LOSSING, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and Author of "Outlines of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

15.
MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

16.
THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Polar Regions and Adjacent Seas of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With numerous Engravings on Wood and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

17.
WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Broken to Harness," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

18.
LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Explorations in Equatorial Africa," "Wild Life under the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," &c. With numerous Engravings on Wood. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

19.
THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

20.
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," &c. In Two Volumes. Profusely graved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Half Calf, $10 00; $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

21.
UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: Embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes. Vol. I.: Intellect. Vol. II.: The Sensibilities, and Will. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per volume.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. Comprising Seven Volumes, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume. The Seven volumes, in a neat case, $5 25.

ADAM BEDE.—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.—FELIX HOLT. —SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER.—ROMOLA.

23.
THACKERAY'S NOVELS.
VANITY FAIR. 19 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. —PENDENNIS. 178 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts. —THE VIRGINIANS. 196 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—THE NEWCOMES. 168 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. 64 Illustrations and Portrait of Author. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—ESMOND IN THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE THE WIDOWERS. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS,
SELF-ADJUSTING. Send for pamphlet. Also for best, and now better than ever. Send for pamphlet to
WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, 864 Broadway, N. Y.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable Sixty days February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, equable in New York or Gold. Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $13,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. This line, connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, will make a short and direct route to California. The Company have a Capital Stock of.....$10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 1,600,000 acres, equal, at the lowest estimate, at.....1,500,000

First Mortgage Bonds.....

Total.....$15,500,000

Length of Road, 271 miles. Priority and general interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information offered. Offer these bonds, being so well secured, and yielding a large income, are desirable for seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. F. EVERETT & CO. Financial Agents,

No. 25 Wall Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,

No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED—FEBRUARY NUMBER.

HITCHCOCK'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

CLARA FISHER. Portrait and Biography.
LORENZO DA PONTE. Portrait and Biography.
AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY. Its history and objects.
DIARY OF A VOCALIST.
HE MARRIED AND OLD CORINTH.
THE CORRUPT AGE.
BORDIGHERA. A MUSIC STORE.
A STREET SCENE.
YOUNG LADIES AND WOMEN.
A MURDEROUS SEA FLOWER.
RECOLLECTIONS AND POETS.
PORTICAL, DRAMATIC, AND MUSICAL NOTES.

MUSIC, Songs for Piano:

THE WOLF AT THE DOOR. By H. MILLARD.
SO LONG BUT NOT THERE. By C. E. PRATT.
PLEASANT DREAMS (Instrumental). By SAXBY.
GLENWOOD POLKA. By H. BISHOP.

Sold by dealers generally, and mailed on receipt of subscription, $2 per Annum. Enclose 25 cents for specimen. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.

HOVEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN

Vegetable, Flower, and Agricultural Seeds, Fruit and Ornamental Trees, Plants, &c.

53 North Market Street, Boston, Mass.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED GUIDE

To the Flower and Vegetable Garden, and Catalogue of Seeds for 1870.

The 87th Edition, revised, enlarged, and improved, containing 148 pages, illustrated with more than 100 fine engravings.

A BEAUTIFUL COLORED PLATE,

and a descriptive list of the most desirable Annual Flower and Vegetable Seeds, embracing every novelty introduced in 1869, with full and plain practical directions for the culture of flowers and plants, the arrangement of the garden, &c. A descriptive list of the varieties of the best French Gladiolus, including the superb new varieties of 1869, now for the first time in the summer-flowering bulbs, such as Lilies, Tuberoses, Tigridias, &c., together with a general guide for the garden. A copy mailed to every applicant on the receipt of 25 cts. Our customers supplied for less. Address HOVEY & CO., 53 North Market St., Boston.

No Choir should be without it!

THE American Tune-Book.

THIRD EDITION READY.

A Collection of all the widely popular Church Tunes, Anthems, and Set Pieces which have been in the introduction of our American Church Music for the past fifty years. Also, a complete Voice-Book practical Exercises and Choir Leaders.

Price, $1.38; $13.50 per dozen. A specimen copy will be sent by mail to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

$20 00 SAVED.—"Your January Bonnet saved me $20 that was already raised up to cost me $40," says Mrs. ——. "It is the best one of the 20,000 who saw their CASH by reading the $20 SAVED MAGAZINE." Subscription price, $1 a year; six families in our town who take your paper, at $20 $20 has been saved to each one this year under-$100." Remember that the "Star-Spangled Banner" exposes nasality. It exposes every humbug and quackery. Every thief and swindler in New York is "in print" on its fearless pages. Every DOLLAR YOU MONEY.—It is a large 40-column paper, 8 pages, Tailor Made. It gave 40 columns of exposure of Quacks last year. Here is our standing offer: We will send you the STAR-SPANGLED BANNER one year, and a $5 GRATIS (that alone is worth $10), for $1. Now, And MIND THIS, we will also send back your money, if you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED. Subscribe NOW and secure all the papers for 1870. Only 13 cents; specimens 6 cents. Send NOW to

"STAR-SPANGLED BANNER,"
Hartford, Conn.

BRILLIANT and POWERFUL Day and Night DOUBLE GLASSES for the Field, Opera, and general out-door use.

Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

C. SEMMONS, Optician,
681 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED!—AGENTS to sell the "Life of Gen. Geo. Peabody." Illustrated. Sold only at a price fixed to the times. Now is your time to make money. S. B. RUSSELL, Publisher, Boston, Mass.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

Of MARION, N.J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have remaining from their

FALL IMPORTATIONS:

1 Elegant White Satin Wedding Dress,
1 Pink Crepe de Chine Evening Dress, latest style,
1 Blue do., trimmed with choice Flowers;
2 Swiss Muslin do., richly trimmed;
3 Extra Rich Brown Walking Suits, trimmed with Velvet, Lace, &c., (made by Worth & Pingat, of Paris);
1 Case Real Indian Camel's-Hair Shawls, plain Centre.

The above will be offered at

LESS THAN GOLD COST.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

56th edition of this popular work, which has met with so much favor, is now ready. It is in the best of type—is tasteful and improved, printed with new type, and on fine paper, illustrated with the finest engravings, many of them fine engravings from nature. It contains full description and the culture of over 1300 leading varieties of Flowers and Vegetables; also descriptions list of the novelties of the previous season, with prices. It is a complete guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden. The work will be sent (which will compare favorably with any similar one

Sent for Twenty-five Cents.

"I have received a copy of your superbly gotten up Amateur Cultivator's Guide. I think it far excels any work of the kind ever before issued from the American press."

Send to our agents in your town, or to us direct for paper cover, and you will receive it by return mail.

WASHBURN & CO., Boston, Mass.

Best Years' Sort Story & Sketch Paper in Great Britain. Illustr. Agents Wanted. Sample Copy, 10 cts.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
MRS. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N.J.

BRUNCH UNGUENT forces a heavy Beard or Mustache on a smooth face in six weeks. Price 50 cts. Prof. MILLER, Adams, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Ready:

Life and Letters

OF

MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

THE LIFE OF MARY RUSSELL MITFORD, Authoress of "Our Village, &c." Told by Herself in Letters to her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange. 2 Vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

The interest of these volumes is twofold—personal and literary. Miss Mitford's life as mournful as it was beautiful, is most detailed in the correspondence of her invalid mother, exhibits a rare devotion to a selfish, ill, dfital decrilon—and shall we add, of filial devotion? which must be read to be fully understanding. The letters, which commence with the nursery and conclude with the sick-room, delineate literary gossip and personal reminiscences. The style is admirable; simple, and natural. Glimpses of the life of rural description remind us of "Our Village," and such comparisons as these volumes suggest are not disparagating. Such a book allures us on from page to page with a curious fascination; every character the eye is attracted by a familiar name, or by a criticism which compels us to refer to our own memory or to musing sketches; and it may be safely said that there is no reader who will not be interested in every chapter.

Very interesting and entertaining volumes. Nothing is more attractive in these times than glimpses of men and cheerfulness. They show a life full of energy, sympathy, kindness, observation; a mind of extraordinary versatility, in harmony with its times, and keeping its powers and its interest in books and men vigorous to the last. These letters illustrate art and literature of the day for fifty years, and one chief interest of them is the portraits, characters, and traits of distinguished persons who came in their author's way.—Saturday Review.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $3 00.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Our Artists are always ready to topics of especial and local interest. The best artists in the country are employed upon it, and the literary matter is from the pens of writers who are largely salaried to photographers in all the leading cities of the world, and the Sun for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the leading illustrated newspaper that has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features; it includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Social topics.

In No. 89, for November 13, 1869, was commenced the story of "MAY AND WIFE," by Mrs. Edmund Kirke, author of "Among the Pines" and "Down South." In No. 92, for December 4, "Peregrine Schuyler" is getting his fit out for a voyage, and subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of the story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will want the next for its title.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid in the history of periodical literature in this or any country, and is recognized as the best and most attractive Fashion Journal published in the world, and has a circulation of double that of any contemporary in this country. By a special arrangement with the Messrs. Harper, the publishers of the British Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published simultaneously with the appearance of the same issue in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, Travels, &c. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every subject of interest to the day. Each issue of the paper will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the position which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in the country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Fortieth Volume. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other monthly publication in the English language—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, and the enterprise which has been unsparing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary and artistic talent, English and American. Access to its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration, Fiction, Biography, History, Humor, Satire, Essays, Criticisms, and Discussions of Questions of the day, and the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon the Literature, Science, and Art of the world, the Editor's special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, entitled THE HISTORICAL RECORD. The elements upon which the past success of the Magazine has been based will be adhered to by its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that the future issues of the work in the volume of the reading public they will be able to enhance even the present circulation.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains fifty to one hundred pages more matter than any other monthly publication issued in the English language. Thus the subscription price—Three Dollars per annum—is less than one cent full per page for the topics contained in it.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking and continuance of the liberal patronage of a favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

The Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE a trifle less than 2 cents a number; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber desires to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number after receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, he should give us early notice thereof, and the name necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Remittances should be made by Postage or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS. Letters liable to Bank Notes, unless drawn to the order or Draft be torn or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $150; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less period, $1 50 a line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, double price.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARKLEY'S KNITTING MACHINE

For Family use—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. Adapted to the Trade. Liberal terms to knitting. FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents! Read this!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

VINEGAR. WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, with Chemicals. Sample 10 cts. Circulars free. F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

EMPLOYMENT.—$100 a month with Stencil Dies. 6 Samples Free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

JOHN BULL. "Confound that Fellow, here he is again with that Old Tune!"

Waltham Watches.

Mr. Beecher on the Waltham Watch.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 31, 1869.

GENTLEMEN,—I am happy to make you a good report of the Waltham Watch that I procured of you. It has far exceeded my expectations, and leaves me nothing to be desired. I have had it about five months, and during that time it has been running by the side of a superlative English watch (which one of the first chronologers pronounces "the finest watch that ever came to New York"), and the Waltham Watch has run more steadily, evenly, and accurately than the English competitor.

It is my full conviction that a better watch can be made, and I am proud of it as a specimen of American skill and industry.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

The Most Recherché Novelty in Perfumery.

These Perfumes are of choice quality, and may be confidently recommended on their own merits: while the Labels especially commend them to all lovers of Fine Arts, as they exhibit various devices in Heraldry, bearing Floral Decorations, and thus convey to the poetic mind the mutual connection between each design, in strict conformity with the recognized Language of Flowers.

R. LETCHFORD & CO., Manufacturing Perfumers, 75 Cornhill, London. ☞ For sale to the Trade only by the Agents, SARGENT, JOYCE, & HOLTON, 34 Vesey Street, New York.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties just received. Also, Fancy Goods, Fancy Goods, Jewelry of all Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Genuine Meerschaum Goods. Stores: 519 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 57 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 5046. Repairing and Boiling done.

EDWARD SEARS' ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT, 48 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

BISHOP & RHIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel, NEW YORK.

WILBOR'S COMPOUND OF

PURE COD LIVER OIL AND LIME.

The friends of persons who have been restored from consumptive consumption by the use of this original preparation, are very grateful to parties desirous of further information, as it is the only preparation of the kind in the world. The article a vast popularity in New England. The Cod Liver Oil is in this combination robbed of its unpleasant taste, and is rendered doubly effective in being coupled with the lime, which is itself a restorative principle, supplying nature with the principle of which the lungs are chiefly composed, to form the diseased lungs. A. B. WILBOR, No. 144 Court Street, Boston, is the proprietor. Sold by all druggists.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

(Patented June 1, 1869.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY, DURABILITY, and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO., SOLE MANUFACTURERS,

Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N.Y.

THE MAGIC WATCH-KEY.

Will wind any watch, and last a lifetime. Price 50 cents. Sent by mail. H. BIRCH, 14 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Buckeye Pars. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To obtain every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

A New Discovery!! Phalon's "VITALIA;" or, Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or filamentous matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box, CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

OPALINE for the Teeth, Gums & Breath. OPALINE is reliable, efficient, and convenient. OPALINE is sold by Druggists and dealers throughout the United States and Europe. OPALINE is recommended by the Medical Profession & Scientists. Use no other dentifrice. Invented and prepared by CHAS. R. PEVEY, Dentist, Worcester, Mass.

FISHERMEN! TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List. Baltimore, Md.

Stammering.

Cured by Bates' Patent Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address SIMPSON & CO., Box 3076, New York.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS SOAP AND SAPOLIO 211 WASHINGTON ST. N.Y.

GREENWOOD'S

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 50.

HELMBOLD.

HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.

HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU is pleasant to taste and odor, free from all injurious properties, and immediate in its action.

BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU gives health and vigor to the frame and bloom to the pallid cheek. Debility is accompanied by many alarming symptoms, and, if no treatment is submitted to, consumption, insanity, or epileptic fits ensue.

HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU and IMPROVED ROSE WASH cures diseases arising from excesses. It is pleasant in taste and odor, immediate in its action, and free from all injurious properties.

BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.

FOR NON-RETENTION or INCONTINENCE of Urine, irritation, inflammation, or ulceration of the bladder or kidneys, diseases of the prostate glands, stone in the bladder, calculus, gravel or brick-dust deposits, and all diseases of the bladder, kidneys, and dropsical swellings, USE HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU.

HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.

DELICATE CONSTITUTIONS, of both sexes, use HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU. It will enable you to sleep well.

BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.
BUCHU.

THE GLORY OF MAN IS STRENGTH. Therefore the nervous and debilitated should immediately use HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU.

HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.
HELMBOLD.

Helmbold's Fluid Extract Buchu is a certain cure for diseases of the

BLADDER, KIDNEYS, GRAVEL, DROPSY, ORGANIC WEAKNESS, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, GENERAL DEBILITY, and all diseases of the

URINARY ORGANS,

whether existing in

MALE or FEMALE.

Diseases of these organs require the use of a diuretic.

If no treatment is submitted to, Consumption or Insanity may ensue.

Our Flesh and Blood are supported from these sources, and not

HEALTH AND HAPPINESS, and that of posterity, depend upon the prompt use of a reliable remedy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU.

Established upward of Nineteen Years. Prepared at

H. T. Helmbold's

Drug and Chemical Warehouse,

594 Broadway, N.Y., and

104 South Tenth Street, PHILADELPHIA.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERY WHERE.

Price, $1 50 per SIX BOTTLES, or $1 75 PER BOTTLE, delivered to any address.

NONE ARE GENUINE

unless done up in steel-engraved wrapper, with fac-simile of my Chemical Warehouse, and signed

H. T. HELMBOLD.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

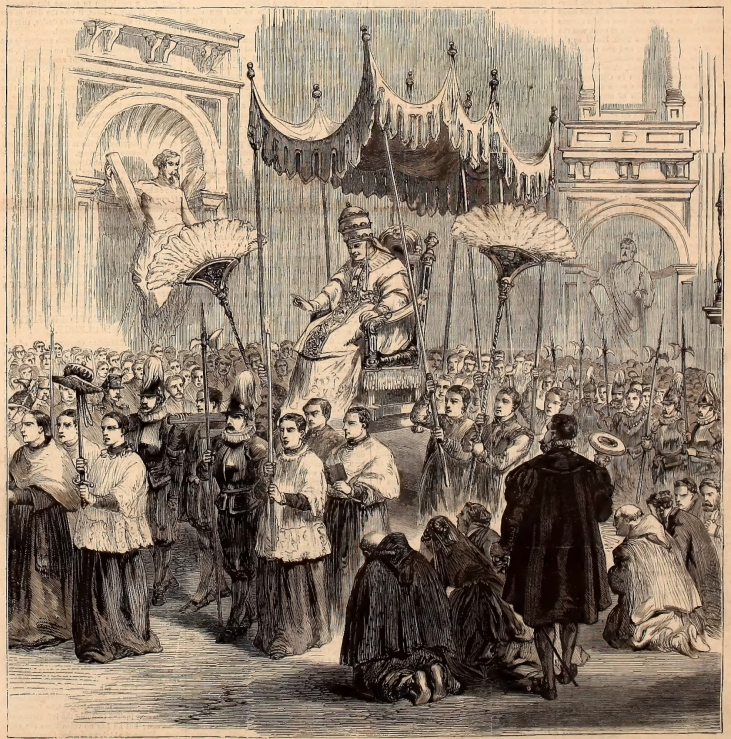
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 685.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

CHRISTMAS-DAY IN ST. PETER'S.

THE ceremonies of the last Christmas festival in St. Peter's Cathedral at Rome were attended with more than usual interest, on account of the gathering of so many dignitaries of the Romish Church in that city to attend the opening of the Œcumenical Council. The Pope, accompanied by the Cardinals and many of the Bishops, was present on Christmas-eve at the grand vespers; and afterward performed, in the sacristy of the Sistine Chapel, the ceremony of blessing the two-handed sword and crimson velvet cap, which were to be displayed in procession next morning. The Christmas-day services in the cathedral began with matins and lauds, at 3 o'clock in the morning. At 9 o'clock, when a large congregation of spectators filled the nave, the grand pontifical procession entered St. Peter's, the Pope wearing the tiara presented to him by the Queen of Spain; the Cardinals and the long array of prelates vested and mitred as for the altar. Nothing in this procession excited so much attention as the splendid attire of the Oriental Bishops, who wore copes of gold tissue or many-hued silk. All had jewelled mitres—that ornament, as worn by several, being in the form of a regal crown; and the grave and noble aspect of these aged fathers, with their long beards, were strikingly picturesque with such accessories of pomp. PIUS IX. went through the rites with his accustomed dignity, chanting in a voice whose fine tones age has not enfeebled, and looking very well, though somewhat pale from fatigue, as he passed on his lofty throne under the silver-tissue canopy and between the waving, feathery fans. The procession on this occasion is similar to that which accompanies the Pope to the cathedral on Palm-Sunday, with the omission, of course, of the palms. The latter ceremony includes the scene in the grand vestibule of the cathedral, where the procession halts for a moment at the closed doors, and the chorus at its head chant the words: "Open the gates and let the King of Glory in!" To which the chorus within reply: "Who is this King of Glory?" The doors are then thrown open, and the representative of the King of Glory is borne into the cathedral. This part of the ceremony is not used at the Christmas festival; but the spirit of the two pageants is the same, and the words are applicable to both.



CHRISTMAS-DAY IN ST. PETER'S—"OPEN THE GATES AND LET THE KING OF GLORY IN."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1870.

THE RESTORED UNION.

THE admission of Virginia will be followed by that of Mississippi, Texas, and Georgia, and the formal reconstruction of the Union will then be completed. The principle thus established by the people of the United States is that a State which wages war against the government, in order to dissolve the Union, shall return to the exercise of its privileges as a member of the Union only upon such conditions as the people, in Congress, may prescribe. The source of this policy is the profound conviction of those people that the United States are not a partnership, a league, a confederacy, but substantially a nation. The theory of State sovereignty, maintained by the Democratic party, was found, when practically tested, to involve the idea of secession, and all that secession meant. And whatever may have been the real feeling of the framers of the Constitution—a feeling which was not plainly revealed in the instrument—the opinion and determination of the people of to-day have been demonstrated. The war and the consequent reconstruction of the Union are the final interpretation of the Constitution by the nation upon the subject of State sovereignty; and nothing but a war of similar scope to that of the rebellion can reverse that decision.

There is no doubt that the Republican policy of reconstruction is agreeable to the principles of the government and to the situation. The theory of ANDREW JOHNSON and of Mr. STEPHENS and the States, having failed in the effort to secede, were States still, and might resume their old position in the Union at once. But the theory urged by the New York World at the time of LEE's surrender, and was merely the corollary of the old State sovereignty doctrine which the war had destroyed. The Democratic objections to reconstruction in Congress have all been founded upon the same fallacy. The consequences, as the basis of reconstruction, were evident. If the State, upon ceasing active hostilities, resumed all its relations to the Union, slavery, the cause of the war, being a State institution, could be at once restored by State ordinance. If that were consummated, the State undesirable, the most inhuman disabilities could be imposed upon the colored population. The State might send such Senators and Representatives as it chose to Congress. In fact, the result would have been, that the rebellious States, having failed in the field, could instantly return to Congress in the hope of a union with their old lackey, the Democracy of the North, which would achieve by their arms exactly what it had failed to do by votes.

The practical folly of such a theory was not apparent to a doctrinaire like Mr. SEWARD, nor to a mind so dull as Mr. JOHNSON'. The instinct of the latter was indeed correct. His favorite phrase that the rebels must take back seats in reconstruction was the common-sense view of the situation. But he could not reason upon the subject; and the moment he began he became the victim of the narrow logic of his traditional Democratic dogmas, which presently seemed to him serviceable to his personal ambition, and therefore became infallible. He repeated them like a parrot. Facts, human nature, the necessity of the case, the welfare of the country, were unavailing against the blind repetition of the assertion that, if a State couldn't get out of the Union, of course it staid in the Union; and if it staid in, of course it had all the rights with all other States. If the country had faltered in the greater logic of facts and the situation, of the war, its enormous sacrifices, the victory over the rebellion would have been half useless. The Administration and Mr. SEWARD strained every nerve to avert the defeat. They had a powerful ally in the reaction that followed the war, and the essential good-nature of the country. They were also supported by the Democratic party, and a large number of doubters among the Republicans. Except for the events of 1861 and 1862, and the late rebel States, the result might have been uncertain. But those events were fully interpreted the situation, and indicated the necessity of policy, the policy that could alone secure the results of the war, the policy that was adopted.

The rebellion struck at the government to save slavery; the government abolished slavery to save the Union. From that moment, if it were victorious, it was pledged to take care that every consequence and circumstance of slavery ended with the system. This was done. Upon the rock of the equal rights of all citizens of the United States the Union has been reconstructed. For the first time in its history the United States deserve the honor that belongs to a free, popular government. For the first time an American citizen may where in the world may point to the flag of his country and say that it is the flag of freedom. For the first time the principles of the Declaration of Independence have become those of the country that published it. And he is of little faith who does not see, in the reunion of the States upon those principles, the promise of their widest and wisest application.

AT LAST!

THE following resolution will shortly be introduced in the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire whether any citizens of the United States has been deprived of his rights or liberties under the Constitution by the arbitrary and illegal issue of injunctions by judges of State courts in the State of New York, and that said Committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Governor HOFFMAN, in his message of last January, had strongly denounced these usurpations of conflicts of jurisdiction which had grown out of the reckless abuse of injunctions, and had suggested to the Legislature that it would be for the public good if the discretion of the judges in the matter of granting injunctions and appointing receivers ex parte applications were substantially abridged.

And the bar, which is by a large section of the people best responsible for the discriminations of the bench, has organized itself into a society, under the lead of its most distinguished members, and proposes, as we understand, to endeavor, by concert of action among themselves, to eradicate at least some of the abuses which have hitherto brought the administration of justice into disrepute in this city. 'Tis said that the rolls of the society already contain the name of almost every leading and respectable lawyer, of both parties, at the New York bar. Such a body, acting in the public interest, and unrelated by the usual jealousy of one professional man in the community, ought to be quite able to cope with corrupt judges, however cunning, and to restore confidence in the old respect people used to feel for courts of law.

It is time. Rightly or wrongly, the general distrust of the judiciary in this city has reached a point which endangered the first conditions of orderly society. Rightly or wrongly, a certain number of judges were believed to be capable of receiving bribes from litigants. Rightly or wrongly, the judges of at least two of the courts of original jurisdiction in this city have been classified by the bar and the public into two classes: first, judges who were honest, and whose whims it was safe to yield to; and, second, judges who were dishonest, and before whom it was unsafe to try a case in which the Tammany Ring could be in any way affected, any person of wealth was concerned. We say—rightly or wrongly—for though the public belief in this subject is a matter of as much importance as "public notoriety," yet still it is due to the judges to say that nothing has yet been proved against any of them, and that their names ought to must be presumed to be innocent until their guilt has been duly established by regular process of law.

Senator MURPHY, acting on the Governor's suggestions, has introduced a bill into the State Legislature forbidding the granting of writs of injunctions in cases where corporations are concerned, or from appointing receivers for corporations without at least six days' notice to the corporation affected by the proceeding. This is well, as far as it goes. A vast amount of mischief has been done by the appointment of receivers and the issue of injunctions against corporations on ex parte applications, made very often with fraudulent motives. It has always been claimed, for instance, that the debt on which the Gold Exchange Bank was thrown into the hands of a receiver by a judicial order had actually been paid by the bank at the time the receiver was appointed. The receiver nevertheless entered into possession, and a claim for bank $75,000 to get rid of him. A still more flagrant case has been reported in which a foreign insurance company was wrested from the hands of a receiver, and held for ransom, like a prisoner in the hands of brigands, though the representatives of the company declared they took the trouble to certify to the court that there were no grounds for the proceeding. The company, it is said, refused to submit to the black-mailers, found it cheaper at last to pay the ransom demanded. Senator MURPHY'S bill would give corporations the power to was sought to plunder a week's notice of the attempt, during which they might remove their assets out of the reach of courts in collusion with the plunderers.

But it would not touch the root of the evil, nor would it prevent the most flagrant of the wrongs which are being daily perpetrated in the shape of injunctions. It is a common practice now for a defendant in any suit to begin his case to obtain from a friendly judge an injunction forbidding the plaintiff to proceed with his suit. The injunction is granted ex parte. The party enjoined is compelled to employ a lawyer to appear for him in the injunction case, and to move to dissolve the injunction. Very often weeks, elapse before he can be heard on the application. After the hearing, the judge "reserves his decision." There is no limit of time to this "reservation." In a very important injunction case, which was argued only in October last before a Supreme Court judge, no decision has yet been rendered. In the mean time the defendant may be secreting or squandering his property; and by the time the injunction has been dissolved, the proceedings in the original suit may end, and judgment obtained, the plaintiff may discover that his debtor, who was abundantly responsible when his suit was commenced, has now no property upon which execution can be levied.

We have before us two injunctions issued by judges of the Supreme Court, the first on the 20th December last, the other on the 24th January. Both were issued to prevent a creditor from prosecuting his claims against his debtors. In the first the defendants (that is to say, the creditors) are ordered to "refrain from taking any proceedings on or in relation to their pretended claims or either of them in this action, until the further order of this court; and in case of disobedience to this order you (i. e., the creditors) will be liable to the punishment prescribed by law."

The effect of the injunctions in these cases is to tie the parties' hands and feet. Under it they may have undoubted claims, which no jury could deny and no court fail to enforce; they can not prosecute until the injunctions are dissolved. They may see their debtor secreting or squandering the property in dispute; they can not help themselves. Under color of the injunction the debtor is master of the situation. He can rely upon several weeks' or months' delay for a motion friendly as to issue such injunction might be relied upon to "pocket the papers" for a term or two, even if he proposes to dissolve the injunction afterward. The party enjoined is as absolutely without a remedy as a poor traveler in the Abruzzi who falls into the hands of Italian brigands.

No such state of things as this can exist without very grave consequences. It is of the essence of civilized society that the avenues of justice should ever stand open to the citizen. From the hour they are closed decay and dissolution begin. Capital is timid, as the Secretary of Commerce was told the other day by the agents of the Atlantic and Great Western bondholders, is quick to take wing, withdraws from enterprises which are within the control of certain of our courts. Negotiations are already on foot for the removal of important corporations from New York to New Jersey, in which State the judiciary enjoys a high reputation for integrity. Labor is not the sphere in which some talk, more or less serious, about Virginia Louisiana—talk which, after the experience of the last few years at the West, it will not do to pronounce utterly idle. If scenes of anarchy are to be avoided, if New York is to remain the commercial and consequently metropolis of the country, if foreign capital is to be retained here, something must be done to prevent, in the future, the unseemly misuse of power into which certain of our State judges have been betrayed in the past.

MR. DAWES AND GENERAL BUTLER.

COULD not honorable gentlemen in Congress conduct their arguments upon public questions without assuming the motives of their colleagues and opponents? The other day Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee upon Appropriations, made a speech in which he deprecated what he considered the extravagant estimates of the Departments. He reminded his party that when they had come into power under promises of economy; but that they were in danger of exceeding the extravagance of Andrew Johnson's Administration. Certainly, if it be true, it is very necessary that the party should understand it, and it is very desirable for the country that the extravagance should be checked by its own action, instead of being left as a weapon for the enemy. And undoubtedly Mr. DAWES, who is a sagacious statesman, had satisfied himself that no private remonstrance would avail, and that the only method of saving the danger was by a public exposure and protest.

This may have been a mistake. But those who thought so would not have made so great a mistake as a correction of that of Mr. DAWES. If he had failed in not remonstrating with the Departments openly, did his opponents excuse his remonstrating with him publicly? The proper course seems to have been plain. From a party point of view nothing could be more damaging. But a totally different course was adopted. Mr. SCOFIELD, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who reported the bill for the removal of the Philadelphia Navy-Yard to League Island, began by saying that Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Wisconsin, seemed especially interested in the retrenchment speech of Mr. DAWES. Yet Mr. GARFIELD had obtained $5000 to entertain some festive bankers of New York, and Mr. WASHBURNE had obtained an appropriation of $200,000 for the Rock Island rapids. As for Mr. DAWES, that gentleman had a grudge against the Pennsylvania members because they did not vote for his bill to build iron ships. Now, of course, instantly asked whether Mr. SCOFIELD thought that he had been influenced by that consideration in what he had said or done in the House. To which, after some hesitation, Mr. SCOFIELD answered that, considering every thing, "the conviction was almost forced upon my mind that perhaps the insinuation might have some foundation."

But it was reserved for General BUTLER to make the chief assault upon Mr. DAWES. He disputed the accuracy of his statements, and appealed to proofs. This was legitimate. But he then proceeded to charge Mr. DAWES with recreancy to the Republican party, and with attempting to destroy it. The General learned immediately, however, that the wild-fire-and-brimstone style of denunciation was a weapon which crack was so contemptuously disregarded two years ago by Mr. FESSENDEN had no terrors for Mr. DAWES. He is one of the Republicans whose consecutive and terrible retort in Congress than the quiet observation of Mr. DAWES: "The people of Massachusetts know my colleague, and they know me." The comedy of General BUTLER disciplining HENRY L. DAWES as a Republican is rapidly ending. As a leader of the party, General BUTLER will doubtless acknowledge his own failure. He aspires to succeed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS in the leadership of the House, and Mr. HENRY WILSON as a Senator. But he ought to remember that Mr. STEVENS and Mr. WILSON are Republicans because the profoundest conviction, and that they had always the sympathy of the great mass of their party. Because Mr. DAWES said, President GRANT is "a man whose polar star in the administration of affairs is economy." When, therefore, General BUTLER and his friends undertook to answer Mr. DAWES, it was plainly his part to show that the estimates showed as do not a saving in the aggregate of the appropriations. If they did not, it was the duty of the party, as it was the President's desire, that the extravagance should be arrested.

The mere allegation of selfish motives is not only not an argument against an opponent, but it is a very dangerous weapon in the cause of the person who makes the charge. The public asks, Were the facts stated by Mr. DAWES incorrect? If not, Mr. DAWES's assertion that Mr. DAWES is opposed to spending money in Pennsylvania, because the Pennsylvania members did not vote for his iron-clad bill, and General BUTLER says that Mr. DAWES is trying to destroy the Republican party. If these are the answers, the public opinion is that the statement of Mr. DAWES is correct. Meanwhile it is pleasant to know that General GRANT had assented Mr. DAWES, before he made that. His influence should be directed to a reduction of the estimates. Nobody would have doubted it, if some of the Republicans had not intruded that to point out a tendency to extravagance in the estimates was to accuse the President. And we ask again, whether the true policy for a party that finds itself drifting into great expenditures—to stop them, or to allow them to go on until overthrow the party? If the Democratic approval be the test of bad Republican management, there is no doubt that the Democratic party would hail the adoption of the latter course by their opponents.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC UNITY AND CLERGY.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC correspondent of the Tribune in Louisiana writes that more than four-fifths of the members of his Church are in favor of the public schools, and will gladly support them if they are made unobjectionable by the removal of the Protestant version of the Bible as a text-book. He adds that the sectarian schools of his Church would not be as good for secular education as the present common schools, and that there is no precept of his faith which requires him to give up the clergy the control of the secular education of his children. Indeed, he declares warmly that "the Catholic clergy are the masters of Catholics in America."

How will this correspondent dispose of the fact that the Pope in his Syllabus strongly insists that the clergy must control the schools, and that the clergy, as we showed last week from the speech of the Rev. Mr. PRESTON, habitually agree with the Pope? That the clergy every where endeavor to obtain that control the correspondent does not deny. Indeed, in letter he says, "the Catholic clergy give very little countenance and encouragement to lay Catholic teachers." They strive to monopolize the care of the child from his birth, and to mould it into the obedient Catholic. And they would declare, that, as all education ought to be what they call religious—meaning Roman Catholic—no member of the Church can conscientiously allow his children to frequent schools which are not controlled by the clergy.

Here is a direct issue between the Louisiana layman and the final authorities of his Church; and nobody can doubt which will carry the day. It is useless to say that secular education does not belong to the functions of the priesthood. Those functions are not determined by the laity, but by the priests themselves. The Louisiana layman may incline to doubt the infallibility of the Pope; but he has no voice upon the subject. When the highest priesthood has declared the infallibility, the layman must submit, or cease to be a Roman Catholic by denying the fundamental principle of the Church, namely, that it is the depository and expositor of the truth. If the Œcumenical Council proclaims the dogma of infallibility, and confirms the Syllabus in which the authority declared infallible has already announced its opinions upon the subject of education, what will the correspondent do? The infallible Pope condemns all schools which are not controlled by the clergy. The clergy demand that their congregations shall withdraw the children from the public schools. Does the Louisiana correspondent think that his position at the laity refuse?

Of course we have no right upon our own principles to do any thing in the schools of which the majority of any sect or party may complain as sectarian. Our duty is to devote the schools strictly to the purpose for which they are founded and to which in the popular sense. They are state schools; and the church in this country being expressly and absolutely separated from the state, it is a general wrong to tolerate any sectarian taint in the schools. If the correspondent really spoke for the mass of his fellow-believers the question would be very manageable. But it is not he, it is the Pope and the Rev. Mr. Preston who represent the wishes and the policy of the leaders of his Church.

SPRING TRADE.

Winter goods have been for some time removed from the shelves of importers, and those for spring have taken their place; but trade is dull in all departments of business. A few purchasers from the South and from California have appeared in the market; but the temptation of new and attractive styles presents an sufficient inducement for activity.

The foreign manufacturer is subjected to competition in dress goods which bids fair to diminish, from year to year, the volume of the importation. Establishments near Philadelphia and in Massachusetts show great strides in this production. It is to be hoped that they will ultimately supply the wants of the most refined in taste, and relieve the country of the load, in foreign importation, which it must now carry. The advances of our manufactures are positive and important.

In fancy cassimeres, for spring and summer wear, the domestic production is large and superior. Instead of importing many cases of a particular kind, as heretofore, a single case of foreign make is all that the many purchasers is required by one house. The complaint, which used to be quite general, that the oil was not thoroughly cooked from the domestic wool, is seldom made; and it may be said of this manufacture, that we have reached the point which renders foreign competition in the main unavailing to the want of the most appropriate descriptions of woods, we are far behind the French, English, and German manufacturer; but the active competition in the coarser fabrics, which is going on in the United States, will compel those whose means permit on advance in the increased competition with the foreigner in the best products. In a few years we shall unquestionably reach the commercial distinction that soft or wools shall be adjusted to the necessities of the case.

In cotton shirtings our manufacturers are unsurpassed. The cloth known as "New York Mills" is not excelled any where, and if it were not for the fact that the difficulty in using all the kinds of cotton produced in the world—mixing the cheap with the good in their fabrics, to which, notwithstanding the mixture, they communicate a good appearance—this article could be sent to their markets with success. Its high character as a fabric combining at once excellence in the raw material, to the employment of the most skillful spinners and weavers, to the use of the best machinery, and to long experience in its manufacture. The product of many mills is very nearly equal to it, and, at all events, we should need to wait no longer look to foreign supplies. The shirting known as French Percale is still imported in small quantities. Some of it is made here, but what is called square, whereas in American shirtings the weft is frequently lighter than the warp; but this is being constantly remedied.

Our readers would scarcely suppose that very large quantities of shirtings and sheetings, manufactured in the South, are distributed from this point, and even to Southern merchants. This results from the greater abundance of capital in the North, and from the superior energy and tact of Southern manufacturers of availing themselves of this supply. Goods manufactured in Georgia are sent from our warehouses to that State for consumption. The improvement which is rapidly going on in this industry in the South will compel the Northern manufacturer to advance in skill in the finest fabrics. In the coarser articles of wear the South and West will presently be liberated from dependence on the North and East. On the slopes of the great mountain chain water-power is abundant in all the Southern states which are contiguous to it, and as the raw material is convenient, and capital is becoming abundant, it will be easy to furnish the cotton goods they require.

So far as concerns imported goods, they have been obtained from abroad and entered at the Custom-house, with the advantage of a low price for gold—lower probably than will continue through the season; and it would seem, as the crops have been large, that the conditions for an active trade exist. But the West is embarrassed by the inability to sell its grain in prices which remunerate, and it is feared that Western merchants will purchase sparingly. The South, however, is stronger than it has been at any time since the war, and a considerable trade is expected from the Pacific States, due in part to the opening of the road to California.

The embarrassment in trade, which is felt in all quarters, is mainly artificial, and arises from a apprehension connected with the currency. It is probable that legal-tenders have been hoarded largely—particularly in the South—in the expectation that a return to specie payments was at hand, and for the convenient prosecution of business. It is supposed, also, that this description of money, which constitutes at present the base of our monetary system, is intentionally kept from the large money centres, in order to force the action of Congress in relation to creation of banking capital. The argument is widely pressed that the apparent scarcity of greenbacks is owing to the large sums of bonds entered over the Union, as the result of the enlarged business of the country, and that additions to the currency are unnecessary.

It is one of the unfortunate tendencies of a paper system that it never satisfies, and that more and more of it is called for. That its quantity shall be augmented, only temporary relief will be afforded, to be repeated as a larger volume of indebtedness is created, and as new speculations are set on foot. Notwithstanding great improvement in the condition of the country, we are now importing all descriptions of merchandise in excessive quantities, and are running up a debt abroad much beyond our capacity for payment. Buyers on the low returns of fruit, however, have been in a somewhat moderation in placing orders; but they unite in the testimony that this fact will promote consignments to the Eastern markets. The low goods of the latter have been extensively slaughtered since the raid in Wall Street in September; and their new consignments, if large, can scarcely escape the same fate.

What the country wants is a system of finance which shall discourage the tendency to live by speculation and extravagantly, and induce a more general regard for regular industry. We produce more than we consume for foreigner, and produce exports beyond the value of imports. This will be effected not by the creation of new bonds, nor by the idea of forcing off—carefully and by degrees—our paper issues.

The depreciation lately witnessed in the exchangeable value of every product of labor and industry has been borne with forbearance, because it was supposed that our finances were about to be established on a specie basis. The time is therefore propitious for this need ed step, by which the country shall be placed in the only road to true and solid prosperity.

LET US HAVE FAIR PLAY.

The debate upon the recommendations of the Committee of Ways and Means, in regard to the tariff, is one of the most vital that will engage the attention of the country. There is such a sharp conflict of individual interests that the general welfare is almost entirely overlooked. In revising the tariff, the great point that should be held steadily in view is fair play for the various industries now protected by the wisest distribution of the burden of taxation which our debt and the necessary expenses of the government require, the most equitable, and consequently oppressive. We propose to show its operation in one vital department of industry.

The book manufacture is necessarily a complicated one. Every thing that is essential to it is enormously taxed. Indeed, in paper, in its various branches, not less than forty taxes! What is the result? Nothing is more difficult to determine than the market value of a book. The editorial skill and labor, the number of the edition printed, or remaining unsold, may make the greatest difference in value between books which apparently represent exactly the same labor, and which, externally, are precisely alike. Thus the enormous tax of forty per cent—forbearer is very powerful to invoice his books at almost a nominal value, while, from the nature of the case, it is very difficult to prove the undervaluation.

For example, a desirable book may be made in London and invoiced at four shillings sterling. Other charges may advance the expenses to one dollar and twenty-seven cents in gold. The book could be profitably made in this country, and with a bonus to the author, at a selling price of from three and a half to four dollars. The manufacturer, however, puts it upon the market at six dollars and controls the sale, because the domestic manufacturer knows that, should he undersell the book, the importer will drop the price, if necessary, to two dollars. The foreign author is thus deprived of any chance of profit upon the sale, and the American reader, of course, is compelled to pay an enormous price. The circulation of a valuable book is therefore limited to the amount of ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent., and the American publisher prevented from issuing it cheaply for general reading.

As it is impossible that an ad valorem duty can be fairly enforced, the remedy is a specific duty to prevent the evil result to the American reader which we have indicated. And a duty of this kind, determined by actual weight, say twenty-five cents per pound, would be merely fair. This is a simple system, which prevents evasive importation, and in which foul play at the Custom-house is not probable. To weigh books is easy; but to determine their intrinsic value is a task requiring a special cultivation, which can not be presumed in officers of the Customs. Works of science and scholarship will not feel the change, or will feel it favorably in the increased demand; but a careful analysis of figures shows that a duty of twenty-five cents per pound upon popular works for general circulation would operate as high as an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent. fairly administered.

Of the other confusions and injustices of the tariff are so obvious upon a little examination, and as remediable as that which we have described, we may hope, from a reasonable Congress, for measures which will tend to remove the reproach that our system is both cumbrous and wasteful, unfair to American industry and hostile to American education.

ALARMING WASTE OF THE PUBLIC PROPERTY.

Dr. Lord, Chairman of the Committee of the House of Delegates, which has investigated public money to sectarian purposes, has made a report which deserves the most careful attention. The sum of $1849 appropriated an amount equal to twenty per cent, of the excise money received in the city, to be annually distributed for the support of schools educating children who can not be accommodated in the public schools. The truth is that there are no such children, because all can be accommodated in the public schools. The report of the special committee of the Board of Education for 1869 shows that about the average number of vacant seats in the schools is more than 39,000. At the time of this distribution we called attention to the fact that it struck at the free common school system. That was its object. It was to accustom the public mind to the diversion of the public money for sectarian purposes, preparatory to the effort to destroy the whole unsectarian system.

The Committee state that the donations from the public treasury of the city of New York to religious sects amounted, during the year 1869, to more than $600,000, of which sum a single sect received more than $400,000; and that sect of course comprises the smallest number of tax-payers. Of this, for one dollar, the city government gave to the archbishop of this sect a lot of land in the most desirable part of the city, which is worth $200,000. In 1867 it gave the same sect a whole block of ground for $83 33, by changing a lease into a fee; and in 1864 paid one of the heirs for the privilege of opening Madison Avenue through this block, and gave the same sect $8228 84, to pay its share of the expense of opening. The value of the real estate thus given is now at least $1,500,000. In 1846, for one dollar, the same sect was presented with a lot of another block, and in 1857, for an annual rent of one dollar, with the rest of the lot, now worth at least another million and a half of dollars. The city government has thus given $3,200,000 worth of real estate to a single sect for sectarian purposes.

Every sect in the city had an equal right to similar donations, but no other has received such. And the reason why the public property have been made as bribes by a political party. Here, in the city, the facts are understood. The control of the city government is in the hands of the leaders of the Democratic party. The mass of the Roman Catholics of the city are Irish; and to retain the Irish in the Democratic party, and to propitiate the favor of Roman Catholic priesthood, the property of the people is squandered. With the people, of course, lies the remedy. Governor HOFFMAN'S "honest Legislature," with its Tammany managers, is as much their property as the low of last year as it adopt any other measure of economy, or to declare for any other form of equal rights. Indeed, the power that has these things in the city now controls unchallenged the legislation of the State; and those who support it not only support this wanton waste of the public property, but encourage the fatal blow that the same power aims at the free schools, the very citadel of American institutions.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 24.—In the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Morton, of Indiana, re-elected for the late Mr. Pearson's unexpired term, were presented. Mr. Sherman's bill for funding national currency of coin and notes, and to equalize the distribution of notes, was discussed. The bill, which was reported at the last session, the Senate, was then laid over, adopted, after a warm personal discussion, and ordered to be printed. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Surratt, reviewing the whole course of Mr. Bingham and Mr. Farnsworth in regard to reconstruction. Mr. Davis's motion replied very sharply.

January 25.—In the Senate, Mr. Sherman, from the Finance Committee, reported a substitute for the House bill relating to the funding act of 1870, which provides for amending the act of 1864, so that the duties on income, dividends, and salaries imposed by section of the act, 116 to 120 inclusive, shall continue for and during the entire year of 1870, and no longer, and "those taxes not paid, or payable in that year, shall be collected." The bill was made the special order for one hour each day, reviewing the general course of Mr. Bingham and Mr. Farnsworth in regard to reconstruction. Mr. Davis's motion replied very sharply.

January 26.—In the Senate, Mr. Sherman, from the Finance Committee, reported a substitute for the House bill relating to the funding act of 1870, which provides for amending the act of 1864, so that the duties on income, dividends, and salaries imposed by section of the act, 116 to 120 inclusive, shall continue for and during the entire year of 1870, and no longer, and "those taxes not paid, or payable in that year, shall be collected." The bill was made the special order for one hour each day in the Senate.

January 27.—In the Senate, the House joint resolution was passed to pay the Virginia delegation their salaries up to the date of readmission. A resolution of inquiry from Virginia were read, and one of them, Mr. Segar, was sworn in, and took the oath. Mr. Sumner, in the House, several members of the Virginia delegation were sworn in by the Speaker. Mr. Boutwell, from, reported a bill for the total abolition of the franking privilege, to take effect July 1, 1870. The resolution to pay upon its passage, and after an hour's debate was passed by a vote of 131 to 37.

January 28.—In the Senate, Mr. J. W. Johnson was admitted as Senator from Virginia. Mr. Sherman introduced a joint resolution directing the payment of certain moneys received on the bill transferring the Secretary of the Treasury. In the House, a bill was introduced to prohibit the passage of bills relating to New Orleans by Private Bill.

January 29.—In the Senate, by a vote of 32 to 8, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report a bill.

The leader of the Red River insurgents asserts that he is the rightful heir of annexation to the United States, and that it is not too late for the Canadian Government to come to an understanding with him, and thus settle the difficulty.

A report has been made to the State Department by the American Consul at Hamilton, Canada, on the condition and treatment of the Indians in the Canadian authorities, from which it appears that the reservation system has been successful, and that the savages are rapidly progressing in civilization.

On the 19th inst., Mr. Thomas Townsend, a quiet and inoffensive man, was murdered in his own store in Hudson Street, New York city, by "Jack Reynolds," who is well known to the police as a "desperate character." The murderer escaped, but was subsequently arrested. The motive was robbery, the tribute "hanging for murder is played out in New York."

Mr. Coggin, ex-Mayor of San Francisco, the other day committed suicide by reason of bad luck in life, and was challenged. The anticipated duel was avoided by an apology, the only thing being given under "a misapprehension of facts."

FOREIGN NEWS.

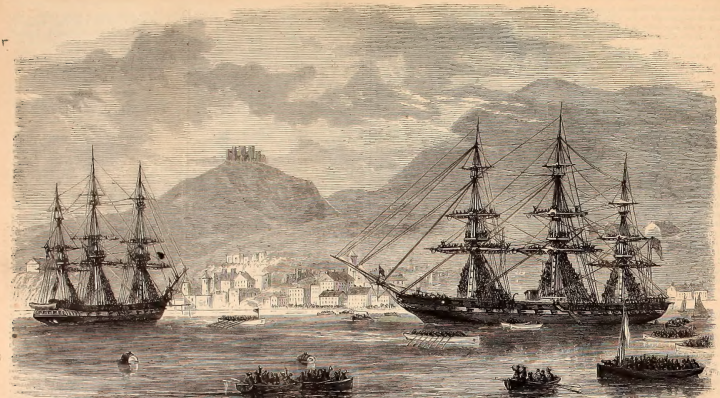
It is reported that the Œcumenical Council may be diverted from Eastern matters to the unfavorable nature of the climate of Rome. The Pope, although opposed to the change, has referred the question of the Council. A report that his Holiness was dead was current in Paris on the 20th inst. Letters from Egypt say that the Khedive has published a firman appointing the Archbishop of Nablus, in which he is appointed Governor of Jerusalem, and commissioned to protect of Cardinal Rauscher against the dogma, which is to be promulgated when the Pope has received the Bavarian newspapers. The Pope has sent the Archbishop of Algiers to Paris to see the Empress Eugenie of the Emperor in regard to the matter.

An earthquake in Greece has taken place in the French Senate on the question of renewing the Anglo-French commercial treaty, which expires in March. M. Rouher denounced the Ministry, and called on the majority to support the Cabinet. A vote of confidence showed that the Government was very strong, being sustained by 200 majority.

A proposition to exclude the House of Bourbon from the throne has been decided in favor of Spain, and after a very animated debate, by a vote of 214 to 55.

The Alabama claims between England and the United States are on a satisfactory basis.

Dispatches from Spain announce that Gen. Gonzalez, the capital of Cuba, has been appointed Governor-General of Cuba, succeeding General Pueblo has defeated the insurgents in the Cuban provinces, and captured their capital. According to Cuban accounts,



BOAT-RACE BETWEEN CREWS FROM THE FRIGATES "FRANKLIN" AND "SABINE," IN THE HARBOR OF VILLA FRANCA.—[SKETCHED BY W. R. MAY.]

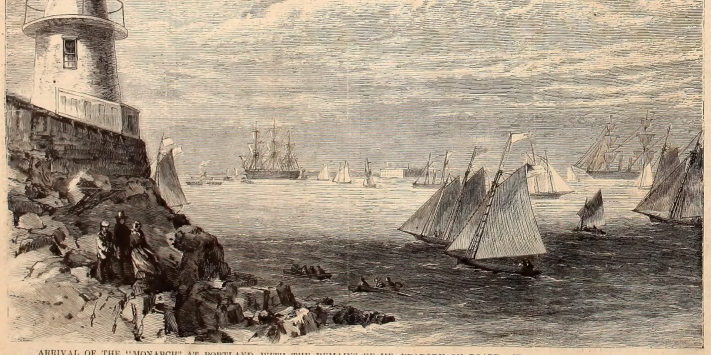
THE "MONARCH" IN PORTLAND HARBOR.

EARLY on the morning of the 26th of January the boom of distant cannon announced to the citizens of Portland the approach of the squadron that bore to this country the remains of GEORGE PEABODY. Soon after daylight the monitors Montonomah and Terror steamed out of the harbor to meet the funeral fleet. As they passed the Monarch, and took their stations in the rear, the Plymouth fired a salute, to which the monitors and Fort Preble replied. According to previous arrangement, the body lay in state on board the Monarch until Saturday noon, when it was landed with appropriate ceremonies. While the procession of boats was moving from the Monarch minute-guns were fired by the monitors and Fort Preble. Upon reaching the wharf the cortège of boats closed up in parallel lines, a sailor at the bow of each holding on to the stern of the boat ahead of him, as shown in our sketch on page 101; and in this position they remained until the casket containing the body had been put upon the wharf, and Admiral FARRAGUT and staff had sailed between the lines and stepped ashore. The casket was then taken under a large shed, where Governor CHAMBERLAIN, surrounded by his council, was in waiting to receive the remains, officially, on behalf of the State of Maine. Captain COMMERELL, of the Monarch, then formally delivered the body to the Governor, who received it in the name of the people.

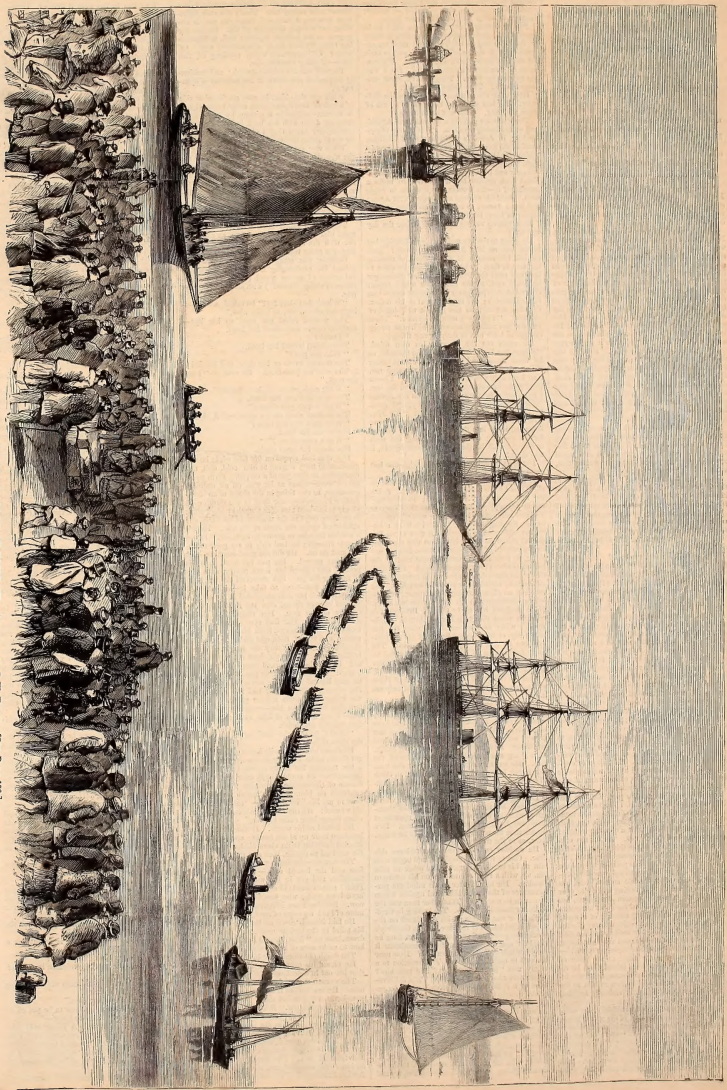
The body was then removed to the City Hall and placed in the chamber which had been especially prepared for its reception. The Hall remained closed until Monday morning, when it was opened till evening. On Tuesday, February 1, the body was removed from the Hall, after an impressive funeral ceremony, and taken to the Boston depôt, escorted by a large procession, composed of several military companies, delegations from various societies and cities, and great numbers of private citizens, who were desirous of showing respect to the memory of the great philanthropist.

BOAT-RACE AT VILLA FRANCA.

We give on this page an illustration of a spirited boat-race that took place on the 16th of last December, in the harbor of Villa Franca, between a crew from the Sabine and one from the Franklin, two frigates belonging to the United States fleet in European waters. The boat of the Sabine had already been victorious in one regatta, and had bluffed off another by the fame of its first exploit; and the crew believed themselves equal to any antagonist that could be brought against them. The Franklin boys were no less sanguine of their own superiority; and the two frigates chancing to lie side by side for some time, in the above-mentioned harbor, they challenged the Sabine crew to row a six-mile race for a purse of one hundred dollars. The challenge was accepted, and the race was rowed with great pluck and spirit on both sides. The result was the defeat of the Sabine crew, the Franklin boat rounding the second stake-boat forty-five seconds ahead. The contestants in this spirited race were pretty evenly matched; for though the Franklin boat pulled fourteen oars, while that of the Sabine pulled but twelve, this advantage was balanced by the larger size and greater weight of the former.



ARRIVAL OF THE "MONARCH" AT PORTLAND, WITH THE REMAINS OF MR. PEABODY ON BOARD.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MISS K. S. BOYD.]



LANDING OF THE REMAINS OF MR. PEABODY AT PORTLAND.—SKETCHED BY J. W. TERRY.—[SEE PAGE 109.]

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIRST.

DONE!

ARNOLD was a little surprised by the curt manner in which Geoffrey answered him.

"Has Sir Patrick said any thing unpleasant?" he asked.

"Sir Patrick has said just what I wanted him to say."

"No difficulty about the marriage?"

"None."

"No fear of Blanche—"

"She won't ask you to go to Craig Fernie. I'll answer for that!" He said the words with a strong emphasis on them, took his cigar-case, after from the table, snatched up his hat, and went out.

His friends, idling on the lawn, hailed him. He passed by them quickly without answering, without so much as a glance at them over his shoulder. Arriving at the rose-garden, he stopped and took out his pipe; then suddenly changed his mind, and turned back again by another path. There was no certainty, at that hour of the day, of his being left alone in the rose-garden. He had a fierce and hungry longing to be by himself; he felt as if he could have been the death of any body who came and spoke to him at that moment. With his head down and his brows knit heavily, he followed the path to see what it ended in. It ended in a wicket-gate which led into a kitchen-garden. Here he was well out of the way of interruption: there was nothing to attract visitors in the kitchen-garden. He went on to a wilderness piece in the middle of the inclosure, with a wooden bench and a broad strip of turf running round it. After first looking about him, he seated himself and lit his pipe.

"I wish it was done!" he said.

He sat, with his elbows on his knees, smoking and thinking. Before long the restlessness that had got possession of him forced him to his feet again. He rose, and paced round and round the strip of green-sward under the walnut-tree, like a wild beast in a cage.

What was the meaning of this disturbance in the inner nature—for that he had committed himself to the betrayal of the friend who had trusted and served him, was too born by remorse?

He was not driven by remorse into the act while your eye is passing over this sentence. He was simply in a raging fever of impatience to get himself safely landed at the end which he had in view.

Why should he feel remorse? All remorse springs, more or less directly, from the action of two antagonistic forces. The one is the result of the product of the respect which we learn to feel for others. In their highest manifestations, these two feelings exalt themselves, until the first becomes the love of God, and the second the love of Man. I have injured you, and I respect it for when it is done. Why should I repent of it if I have gained something by it for my own self, and if you can't make me feel it by injuring Me? I repent of it, because there has been a sense put into me which tells me that I have sinned against Myself, and sinned against You. No such sense as that exists among the instincts of the natural man. And no such feeling as these troubled Geoffrey Delamayn; for Geoffrey Delamayn was the natural man.

When the idea of his scheme had sprung to life in his mind, the novelty of it had startled him—the enormous daring of it, suddenly revealed, had daunted him. The signs of emotion which had presented the first struggle there, in the library were the signs of mere mental perturbation, and of nothing more.

That first vivid impression past, the idea had made itself familiar to him. He had become composed enough to see clearly what it was he had involved, and such consequences as it implied. These had fretted him with a passing trouble; for these he plainly discerned. As for the cruelty and the treachery of the thing he meditated doing—Geoffrey Delamayn never crossed the limits of his mental view. His position toward the man whose life he had preserved was the position of a dog. That "noble animal" had once saved you or me from drowning will fly at your throat or mine, under certain contingencies, in a minutes afterward. Add to the dog's unreasoning instinct the calculating cunning of a man; suppose yourself to be in a position to profit by contributing thing, "Curious! at such and such a time I happened to pick up such and such a piece of cord, and now it turns out to be of some use to me!"—and there you have an index to the state of Geoffrey's feelings toward his friend after he had called the past or when he contemplated the future. When Arnold had spoken to the two theoretical moment, Arnold had violently irritated him; and that was all.

The same impenetrable insensibility, the same primitively natural condition of the moral being, prevented him from being troubled by the slightest sense of pity for Anne. "She's out of my way!" was his first thought. "She's provided for, without any trouble to Me!" was his second. He was not in the least uneasy about her. Not the slightest doubt crossed his mind that, when once she had realized her own situation, when once she had pondered the question of the alternatives of facing her own ruin or of claiming Arnold as a last resource, she would claim Arnold. She would do it as a matter of course; because he would have done it in her place.

But he wanted it over. He was wild, as he paced round and round the walnut-tree, to hurry on the crisis and be done with it. Give me my freedom to go to the other woman, and to train for the foot-race—that's what I want. They injured? Confound them both! It's I who am injured by them. They are the worst enemies I have! They stand in my way.

How to be rid of them? There was the difficulty. He had made up his mind to be rid of them that day.

There was no picking a quarrel with Arnold, and so beginning with him. This course of proceeding, in the position toward Blanche, would lead to a scandal at the outset—a scandal which would stand in the way of his making the right impression on Mrs. Glenney, the woman —lonely and friendless, with her sex and her position both against her if she tried to fight a scandal of it—the woman was the one to begin with. Settle it at once and forever with Anne; and leave Arnold to find out and settle with it, sooner or later, no matter which.

How was he to break it to her before the day was out?

By going to the inn and openly addressing her face to face as Mrs. Geoffrey Delamayn? No. He had had enough, at Windygates, of meeting her face to face. The bullet passed through her, and send the letter, by the first messenger he could find, to the inn. She might appear afterward at the inquest; she might be present at his brother's; she might appeal to his father. It didn't matter; he had got the whip-hand of her now. "I was a married woman." There was the one sufficient answer, which stood strong enough to hold its own against all comers.

He made out the letter in his own mind. "Something like this would do," he thought, as he went round and round the walnut-tree:—"You may be surprised not to have seen me. You have got something belonging to Me. I know what took place between you and him at the inn. I have had a lawyer's advice. You are Arnold Brinkworth's wife. I wish you joy. I am left by forever." Address those lines: "To Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth." Leave the inn directly, and leave the letter late that night, without waiting for an answer; start the first thing the next morning for his own house; and there—he was done!

That even here there was an obstacle—one last exasperating obstacle—still in the way.

If she was known at the inn by any name at all, it was by that of Mrs. Arnold. She was not addressed to "Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth" could probably not be in at the inn when the letter arrived, and if it was actually offered to her, she might decline to receive it, as a letter that addressed her falsely. In the present state of mental resources would have seen that the name on the outside of the letter mattered little or nothing, so long as the contents were known to the person to whom they were addressed. But Geoffrey was conscious in his latest mental movements of a declared her to be Arnold Brinkworth's wife, he must so address her, or she would think it worth's wife; or who could tell what the law might say, or what scrape he might not get himself into? It was a matter of the last nicety. The more he thought of it, the more persuaded he felt of the necessity of writing here, and the hotter and the angrier he grew.

There is a way out of every thing. And there was surely a way out of this, if he could only find it.

He failed to see it. After dealing with all the great difficulties, the small difficulty proved too much for him. It struck him that he might have spent thinking time to better purpose—and that he was not accustomed to thinking long about any thing. Besides, his head was getting giddy, with going round and round the walnut-tree. He threw the irritably turned his back on the tree, and struck down through the kitchen-garden in search of something else, and then to return to his difficulty, once set it with a new eye.

Leaving his thoughts free to wander where they liked, his thoughts naturally busied themselves with the subject which was uppermost in his mind, the subject of the Foot-Race. In a week's time his arrangements ought to be made. Say, as to the training—

He decided on employing two trainers this time. One to look after the diet—and let him see him at his brother's house. The other to take him up, with a fresh eye to him, on his return to London. He could not be sure of any of the performances of the formidable rival against whom he was to be matched, but one man was the swiftest runner of the two. The betting in Geoffrey's favor was betting which calculated on the unparalleled endurance of Geoffrey's frame—the prodigious powers of endurance. How long he would "stay" with the man? Whereabouts it would be safe to "pick the man up?" These were the end to calculate the man's exhaustion to a nicety, and "put on the pace" at the right time. These were nice points to decide. The deliberations of a pedestrian-privy-council would be required to help him under this heavy responsibility. What men could he trust? He could trust A. and B.—both of them authorities: both of them stanch. Query about C.? As an authority, unexceptionable; as a man, doubtful. The problem relating to C. brought him to a standstill—and declined to be solved, even then. Never mind! he would always take the advice of A. and B. In the mean time, devote C. to the inferneal regions; and, thus dismissing him, try and think of something else. What else? Mrs. Glenney—lonely and friendless the women! one of them is the same as another. They swallow the bait they run; and they all fill their stomachs before dinner with sloppy tea. That's the only difference between women and men—the rest is nobody knows what imitation of Us. Devote the women to the inferneal regions; and, so dismissing them, try and think of something else. Of what? Of something worth thinking of, this time—of filling another pipe.

He took out his tobacco-pouch; and suddenly suspended operations at the moment of opening it.

What was the object he saw, on the other side of a row of dwarf pear-trees, away to the right? A woman—evidently a servant by her dress—stooping down with her back to him, gathering something; herbs they looked like, as well as he could make out at that distance.

What was that thing hanging by a string at the woman's waist? A bird's-nest. What audience did she want with a slate at her side? He was in search of something to divert his mind—and here it was! "Any thing will do for me," he thought. "Suppose I 'chaff' her a little about her work?"

He called to the woman across the pear-trees. "Hallo!"

The woman turned herself, and advanced toward him slowly—looking at him, as she came on, with the sunken eyes, the sorrow-stricken face, the inexpressibly sad manner of Hester Dethridge.

Geoffrey was staggered. He had not bargained for exchanging the dullest possible vulgarities of human speech (called in the language of slang "Chaff") with such a woman as this.

"What's that slate for?" he asked, not knowing what else to say, to begin with.

The woman lifted her hand to her lips—touched them—and shook her head.

"Dumb?"

The woman bowed her head.

"Who are you?"

The woman wrote on her slate, and handed it to him over the pear-trees. He read:—"I am the cook."

"Well, cook, were you born dumb?"

The woman shook her head.

"What made you dumb?"

The woman wrote on her slate:—"A blow."

"Who gave you the blow?"

She shook her head.

"Won't you tell me?"

She shook her head again.

Her eyes had rested on his face while he was questioning her, staring at him, cold, dull, and changeless as the eyes of a corpse. Form as his nerves were—dense as he was, on all ordinary occasions, to any thing like the shape of an imaginative impression—the eyes of the dumb cook slowly penetrated him with a steadily inner chill, something crept at the marrow of his back, and shuddered under the roots of his hair. He felt something creep at the roots of his hair. In his simple enough; he had only to say good-morning, and go on. He did say good-morning—but he never moved. He put his hand into his pocket, and offered her some money, as a way of making her go. She stretched out her hand across the pear-trees to take it—and stopped abruptly, with her arm suspended in the air. A monster clapped down over the dumbness, the quility of her face. Her closed lips slowly dropped apart. Her eyes, which had been steadily looked away, sideways, from his eyes; stopped again; and stared, rigid and glittering, over his shoulder—over it so far as to give him a sight of horror behind him. "What the devil are you looking at?" he said—and turned round quickly, with a start. There was nobody behind him. There was no sign of any thing to be seen behind him. He turned back again to the woman. The woman had left him, under the influence of some sudden panic. She was hurrying away from him—running, old as she was—flying for her life, as if the devil in her form was the pestilence.

"Mad!" he thought—and turned his back on the sight of her.

He found himself (hardly knowing how he had got there) under the walnut-tree once more. In a few minutes his hardly nerves had recovered themselves—he could laugh over the remembrance of the strange impression that had been produced on him. "Frightened for the first time in my life," he remembered—"and by a old woman! It's time I went into training again, my nerves have come to this!"

He looked at his watch. It was close on the luncheon hour up at the house; and he had not decided yet what to say to Arnold about Anne. He resolved to decide, then and there.

The woman—the dumb woman, with the stony eyes and the sunken eyes—reappeared in his thoughts, and got in the way of his decision. Could he count on her still secretly, after what had been cook; who was kept out of charity now. Nothing more important than that. No more of her! No more of her!

He laid himself down on the grass, and gave his mind to the arrangement. How to address Anne as "Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth?" and how to make sure of her receiving the letter?

The dumb woman got in the way again. He closed his eyes impatiently, and tried to shut her out in the darkness of his own mind.

The woman showed herself through the darkness. He saw her, as if he had just asked her a question, writing on her slate. What she wrote he failed to make out. It was all over in an instant. He started up, with a feeling of astonishment at himself—and, at the same moment, his brain cleared with the suddenness of a flash of light. He saw his way, without a conscious effort on his own part, through the difficulty that had troubled him. He always takes the course, of course: an inner one, unsealed, and addressed to "Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth;" an outer one, sealed, and addressed to "Mrs. Silvester:" and there was the problem solved! Surely the simplest problem that had ever puzzled a stupid head.

Why had he not seen it before? Impossible to say.

How came he to have seen it now?

The dumb old woman reappeared in his thoughts—as if the answer to the question lay in something connected with her.

He became alarmed about himself, for the first time in his life. Had his persistent impression, produced by looking at a dead man, any thing to do with the broken health which the surgeon had talked about? He had looked on the turn? Or had he smoked too much on an empty stomach, and gone too long (after traveling all night) without the customary drink?

He left the garden to put that latter theory to the test forthwith. The luncheon bell would have gone sound against him if the public had seen him at that moment. He looked haggard and anxious and wild—in short, unlike Man. The natural system had suddenly forced itself on his notice, without the slightest previous introduction, and was saying (in an unknown tongue), Here I am!

Returning to the purely ornamental part of the grounds, Geoffrey encountered one of the footmen giving a message to one of the gardeners. He at once asked for the butler—as the only man attempted to consult in the present emergency.

Conducted to the butler's pantry, Geoffrey requested that functionary to produce a jug of his oldest ale, with appropriate solid nourishment in the shape of "a hunk of home-baked bread."

The butler stared. As a form of condescension among the upper classes this was quite new to him.

"Luncheon will be ready directly, Sir."

"What is there for lunch, then?"

The butler ran over an appetizing list of good dishes and rare wines.

"Can't you take your kickshaws!" said Geoffrey. "Give me my old ale, and my hunk of bread and cheese."

"Where will you take them, Sir?"

"Here, to be sure! And the sooner the better."

The butler issued the necessary orders with all needful alacrity. He spread the table without a moment unheeded, before his distinguished guest, in a state of blank bewilderment. Here was a solemnized ass, with a public celebrity about the bargain, filling himself with bread and cheese and ale, in at once the most voracious and the most unprofessional manner, in the pantry! The butler ventured on a little complimentary flourish. He mentioned the ham as "particularly good" in his breast-pocket. "I've put six pound on you, Sir, for the Race." "All right, old boy! you shall win the money!" Such were the noble words the honorable gentleman clapped him on the back, and held out to him before for some more ale. The butler felt rebly an Englishman as he filled the foaming glass. Ah! foreign nations may have their revolutions! Foreign aristocracies may tumble down! The British aristocracy lives in the hearts of the people, and pervades the pantry!

"Another!" said Geoffrey, presenting his empty glass. Here's luck to you!" He poured off his liquor at a draught, and nodded to the butler, and went out.

Had the experiment succeeded? Had he proved his own theory about himself to be right? Had a dash of ale, a mouthful of stomach, and a determination of tobacco to the head—these were the true causes of that strange sense of mind which he had felt, a minute in the kitchen-garden. The dumb woman with the stony eyes was vanished as if in a mist. He felt nothing now but a comfortable buzzing in his head, a genial warmth all over him, and an unlimited flow of animal spirits—in short, unexpectedly that cool rest on mortal shoulders. Geoffrey was himself again.

He went onward toward the library, to write his letter to Anne—and so have done with that, to begin with. The company had assembled in the library waiting for the luncheon bell. All were idly talking: and some would be certain, if he showed himself, to fasten on Arnold. He turned back again, without showing himself. The only way of getting at Arnold unobserved would be to wait until they were all at luncheon, and then return to the library. The same opportunity would serve for finishing his letter: he could take the letter, without exciting attention, and for going away afterward, unseen, on a long walk by himself. An absence of two or three hours would cost the necessary dust in Arnold's eyes; and it would be certainly remarked by him as meaning absence at an interview with Anne.

He strolled idly into the grounds, further and further away from the house.

The talk in the library—aimless and empty enough, for the most part—was talk to the purpose, in one corner of the room, in which Sir Patrick and Blanche were sitting together.

"Uncle! I have been watching you for the last minute or two."

"At my age, Blanche, that is paying me a very pretty compliment."

"Do you know what I have seen?"

"You have seen an old gentleman in want of his lunch."

"I have seen an old gentleman with something on his mind. What is it?"

"Suppressed gout, my dear."

"That won't do! I am not to be put off in that way. Uncle! I want to know—"

"Stop there, Blanche! A young lady who says she 'wants to know,' expresses very dangerous sentiments. Her 'wanted to know'—and see what it led to. Faust 'wanted to know'—and got into bad company, as the necessary result.

"You are feeling anxious about something, persisted Blanche. "And, what is more, Sir Patrick, you behaved in a most unaccountable manner a little while since."

"When?"

"When you went and hid yourself with Mr. Delamayn in that smug corner there. I saw you lead the way in, while I was at work on Lady Lundie's odious dinner-invitation."

"Oh! you call that being at work, do you? I wonder whether there was ever a woman yet who could give the whole of her mind to any earthly thing that she had to do?"

"Never mind the women! What subject in common could you and Mr. Delamayn possibly have to talk about? And why do I see a smile like torment on your face? Have you been out with him?—a wrinkle which certainly wasn't there before you had that private conference together!"

Before answering, Sir Patrick considered whether he should tell Blanche the truth confidence or not. The attempt to identify Geoffrey's unnamed "lady," which he was determined to make, would lead her to Cregy Farm, and would no doubt end in obliging him to address himself to Anne. Blanche's interested knowledge of her friend might unconsciously be made useful to him under these circumstances; and Blanche's discretion was to be trusted in any matter in which Miss Silvester's interests were concerned. On the other hand, caution was inpersistively necessary, in the present perfect state of his information—and caution, in Sir Patrick's creed, carried the day. He resolved to wait and see what came first of his investigation at the inn.

"Mr. Delamayn consulted me on a dry point of law, in which a friend of his was interested," said Sir Patrick. "And you have wasted your curiosity, my dear, on a subject totally unworthy of a lady's notice."

Blanche's penetration was not to be deceived on such easy terms as these. "Why not say at once that you won't tell me?" she rejoined. "You are putting yourself up with Mr. Delamayn to talk law! You looking absent and anxious about it afterward! I am a very inquiring girl," said Blanche, with a little, bitter sigh. "There is something in me that seems to repel the people I love. You'll want in confidence to see me from Anne. And not a word in confidence can I get from you! And I do so love sympathized with you then!

Blanche's face flushed brightly with pleasure and surprise. Anne raised Sir Patrick's hand gratefully to her lips.

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "You don't mean that you would do this?"

"I am certainly the last person who ought to do it—seeing that you went to the inn in the hollow against my wishes, and that I only forgave you, on your own promise of amendment, the other day. It is a most irregular proceeding on the part of 'the head of the family' to be turning his back on his own principles, because his niece happens to be anxious about a relative. Still (if you could lend me your little carriage), I might take a early drive myself to Furnival, all by myself, and I might stumble against Miss Silvester—in case you have any thing to say."

"Any thing to say?" repeated Blanche. She put her arm round her uncle's neck, and whispered in his ear one of the most intermediate messages that ever was sent from one human being to another. Sir Patrick listened, with a growing interest in the inquiry on which he was secretly bent. "The woman must have some noble principles," he thought, "who can inspire such devotion as this."

While Blanche was whispering to her uncle, a second private conference—of the purely domestic sort—was taking place between Lady Lundie and the butler, in the hall outside the drawing-door.

"I am sorry to say, my lady, Hester Dethridge has broken out again."

"What do you mean?"

"She was all right, my lady, when she went into the kitchen-garden, some time since. She's taken strange again, now she has come indoors. Wants the rest of the day to herself, your ladyship. Says she's overworked, with all the company in the house—and, I must say, she looks like a person troubled and worn out in body and mind."

"Don't talk nonsense, Roberts! The woman is obstinate and idle and insolent. She is now in the house, as you know, under a month's notice to leave. If she don't choose to do her duty for that month I shall refuse to give her a character. Who is to cook the dinner, pray? Is I give Hester Dethridge leave to go out?"

"I say, my lady, that I am afraid the kitchenmaid will have to do her best to-day. Hester is very obstinate, when the fit takes her—as your ladyship says."

"If Hester Dethridge leaves the kitchen-maid to cook the dinner, Roberts, Hester Dethridge leaves my service to-day. I want no more words about it. If she persists in setting my orders at defiance, let her bring her account-book into the library, while we are at lunch, and lay it on my desk. I shall be back in the library after luncheon—and if I see the account-book I shall know what it means. In that case, you will receive my directions to settle with her and send her away. Ring the luncheon-bell."

The luncheon-bell rang. The guests all took the direction of the dining-room; Sir Patrick following, from the far end of the library, with Blanche on his arm. Arrived at the dining-room door, Blanche stopped, and asked her uncle to excuse her if she left him to go in by himself.

"I will be back directly," she said. "I have forgotten something up stairs."

Sir Patrick went in. The dining-room door closed; and Blanche returned alone to the library.

Now or never was the time, as she ascended the stair, for three days past, faithfully fulfilled this engagement, and to hold only trivial parley to wait ten minutes after luncheon-time in the library, on the chance of seeing Anne. On this she had determined, the headstrong girl sat down alone in the great room, and waited with her eyes fixed on the clock.

Five minutes passed, and nothing living appeared but the birds hopping about the grass.

In less than two minutes more Blanche's quick ear caught the faint sound of a woman's dress brushing over the lawn. She ran to the window, looked out, locked out, and clapped her hands with a cry of delight. There was the well-known figure, rapidly approaching the house, and hastening to their friendship—Anne had kept her engagement at last!

Blanche hurried out, and drew her into the library in triumph. "This makes amends, love, for your cruelty to me!" she said, as she led the best of all ways—you bring me your own dear self."

She placed Anne in a chair, and, lifting her veil, saw her plainly in the brilliant mid-day light.

The change in the whole woman was nothing less than dreadful to the loving eyes that rested on her. She looked as ill as she could look and age. There was a dull calm in her face, a stagnant, stupefied submission to any thing, pitiable to see in the beauty and spirits of youth and grief, thier days and nights of unresting and unconquerable anxiety, had left their traces on her nature, had frozen that warm heart. The animating spirit was gone—the mere shell of the woman was left—and Blanche knew it in the first sheer self.

"Oh, Anne! Anne! What can have happened to you? Are you frightened? There's not the least fear of any body disturbing us. Speak to me! Look at me! Kiss me! Stay to dinner. We have the room entirely to ourselves. My darling! you look so faint and strange! Let me get you something!"

Anne drew Blanche's head down and kissed her. She looked round her, and spoke without a word, without a tear, without a sigh.

"You're tired—I'm sure you're tired. Have you walked all the way from Cregy Farm on foot? I'll take care of that!"

Anne smiled sadly at those words. She spoke for the first time. The tone was lower than was natural to her: sadder than was natural to her—without the charm of the voice, the sive gentleness and beauty of it, seemed to have survived the wreck of all besides.

"I am going back, Blanche. I have left the inn."

"Left the inn? With your husband?"

She answered the first question—not the second.

"I can't go back," she said. "The inn is no place for me. A cruel seems to follow me, Blanche—a cruel fate. I left my husband last night. I told him my fate, and he told me his way, and he and the landlady had hard words together about it. A quarrel, a shocking, violent quarrel. He has lost his place in consequence. The woman, his mistress, lays all the blame of it on me. I am the cause of the quarrel, and she has been harder than ever since Bishopriggs went away. I have missed a letter at the post-office, and I have lost my way home, and have forgotten it. I only know that I remembered to write it, and could not sleep last night. I told the landlady, and she fastened a quarrel on me almost before the words were out of my mouth. Blanche, my life is ended—my life ending my letter. Said things to me—I can't repeat them. I am not very well, and my head aches, and she has been harder than ever since Bishopriggs went away. I have missed a letter at the post-office, and I have lost my way home, and have forgotten it. I only know that I remembered to write it, and could not sleep last night. I told the landlady, and she fastened a quarrel on me almost before the words were out of my mouth. Blanche, my life is ended—my life ending with

NAPOLEON III. AND THE IRRECONCILABLES.

WE give on this page the portraits of the present Emperor of France and three of the most prominent members of the Opposition, who have earned for themselves the title of "Irreconcilables." The word exactly describes their attitude toward the Imperial Government, and the temper of the party which they represent. Under no circumstances will they be reconciled to any condition of affairs by which one man, and that man a member of the Napoleonic family, is placed in authority over his fellows. Recent events indicate that they have less influence in France than was supposed. In spite of all his offenses against liberty, the Emperor is not unpopular with the masses of the French people. Had they really sympathized with ROCHEFORT, and the party represented by him and other "Irreconcilables," the popular demonstration that took place at the funeral of VICTOR NOIR, in Paris, would hardly have subsided so easily, even in face of the immense concentration of the military which the Emperor was able to effect in the capital. No doubt the reluctance of the French people to rebel against him arises from the belief, amounting almost to certainty, that his dynasty will go to the grave with him. Very few Frenchmen believe that there will be a NAPOLEON IV.; and to the knowledge that such a belief exists, and the fear that it may prove to be well-founded, the recent concessions to popular demands are probably due.

NAPOLEON III.

The admirers of NAPOLEON III. affect to regard him as infallible; his detractors, on the other hand, deny him any share of political wisdom or foresight. Neither party is entirely right. That he has succeeded in maintaining his position for twenty years, marks him as a man of no ordinary ability; and when we consider that his reign commenced with powerful parties arrayed against him in France, with all the crowned heads of Europe bitterly hostile to his pretensions, and that, in the face of this domestic and foreign opposition, he has kept his own people tranquil, and compelled other monarchs to fear and court him, we must admit that few rulers have ever displayed greater capacity for governing, however strongly we may condemn the means by which he achieved power and continues to maintain it.

Of the "Irreconcilables" whose portraits we give this week, M. RASPAIL is the best known in this country. He was born in 1794, the third son of a poor man, and was brought up by an ecclesiastic. All his life long he has been an ardent republican, and has frequently suffered political prosecution, fine, and imprisonment, under the various governments of France, for his opinions. He took a prominent part in the revolution of 1848, and was one of the first to take possession of the Hôtel de Ville, in Paris, on the 24th of February; and even before the arrival of the members of the Provisional Government he proclaimed the Republic. Then, refusing the public offices tendered him, he founded, February 27, a daily journal, L'Ami du Peuple, with this heading: "God and father-land; full and complete liberty of thought; unlimited religious tolerance; universal suffrage." Last year he was elected to the Corps Législatif from the city of Lyons, and took his seat with ROCHEFORT as a member of the extreme Left. A false report of his death was invented at the time of the killing of VICTOR NOIR by PRINCE BONAPARTE, and added to the excitement of the hour.—JULES SIMON is a thoughtful, serious writer, as well as an ardent politician. He has recently published a book in favor of the abolition of capital punishment, based on certain incidents of French history. In 1830 serious disturbances took place in Brittany, and many murders were committed by the insurgents. M. BROSSAYS, a village mayor, was seized by them and shot; three brothers named NAUL were present at the murder, but without taking any part in it, for the simple reason that, being opposed to the act, they were massacred by their comrades. But they knew who the murderers were, and, as they refused to reveal the names, they were themselves looked upon as alone guilty. The Assize Court of Vannes sentenced them to death. An appeal suspended execution, and the judgment was quashed. They were again tried before the Royal Court of Caen. During the course of the trial the wife of one of these men, an intelligent and courageous woman, undertook, at her own labor and cost, to collect evidence which left no doubt as to the facts. The NAULS, having had a narrow escape from leaving their heads on the scaffold, were declared quite innocent, and as such acquitted. M. SIMON relates this story in detail, and bases upon it an ingenious, but to my forcible, argument in favor of the abolition of an irrevocable punishment; but he appears to have forgotten the witty reply of ALPHONSE KARR, when some one asked for the abolition of the death penalty: "Be it so," said he: "but let Messieurs the meurtriers begin."—M. GAMBETTA, the third in our list of "Irreconcilables," is a young advocate of great ability, a member of the Corps Législatif, and an earnest republican. Though energetic and stanch in support of republican principles, he has sometimes incurred popular displeasure by refusing to follow the lead of men who seem to have taken leave of common-sense in dealing with political questions, and who insist that the only way to set society right is to turn every thing upside down, and begin over again with themselves at the top; for, though properly classed with the "Irreconcilables," he is no believer in this sort of reconstruction. In the approaching trial of PIERRE NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, M. GAMBETTA will appear for the family of VICTOR NOIR.

M. GAMBETTA.

JULES SIMON.

FRANCIS VICTOR RASPAIL

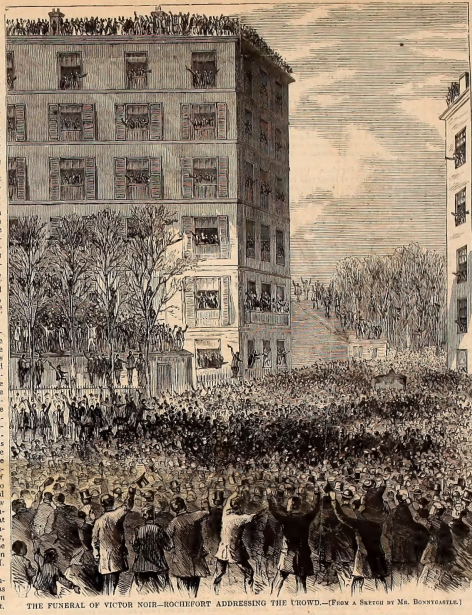
THE FUNERAL OF VICTOR NOIR.

Our illustrations on this page represent two remarkable scenes at the funeral of VICTOR NOIR, at Neuilly, in the suburbs of Paris. M. NOIR was one of the editors of the Marseillaise, the organ of HENRI ROCHEFORT. On Monday, January 10, in company with another of the editors of the same journal, he visited the Prince PIERRE NAPOLEON BONAPARTE for the purpose of presenting a challenge from M. PASCHAL GROUSSET, a gentleman associated with them upon the Marseillaise. At the interview an altercation occurred, and M. NOIR was shot and instantly killed by the Prince.

The affair created the greatest excitement at Paris, and the funeral, which took place on Wednesday, January 12, was made the occasion of the greatest manifestation against the Emperor that has been seen since he occupied the throne of France. The funeral was conducted by the brother of the murdered man, assisted by M. HENRI ROCHEFORT. More than two hundred thousand people were present, and the whole quarter was densely thronged. The "Marseillaise" and other seditious songs were sung, and the people shouted themselves hoarse with "Vive la République!" "Vive ROCHEFORT!"

The first of these scenes represents ROCHEFORT addressing the multitude from the window of the house in which the dead man was lying. He advised moderation, and his words had some effect in calming the tumult of the crowd. The second represents the scene in the Avenue de Neuilly, when the people, in their determination to take the body through Paris to the cemetery of Père la Chaise—a movement that would have been attended with the most sanguinary results—took the horses from the hearse and turned it in the direction of the city. At this juncture M. ROCHEFORT, mounting upon the rear of the hearse, entreated the people to respect the wishes of the family and friends of the deceased, and allow him to be buried at Neuilly. Another gentleman mounted the seat of the driver, and added his entreaties to those of M. ROCHEFORT, the result of which was that the hearse was again turned and taken to the cemetery at Neuilly, where M. NOIR was buried.

The multitude, leaving the cemetery, entered Paris, and were, as at Neuilly, very demonstrative in their hatred to the government.



THE FUNERAL OF VICTOR NOIR—ROCHEFORT ADDRESSING THE CROWD.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. BONNYCASTLE.]

THE FUNERAL OF VICTOR NOIR—THE ADDRESS FROM THE HEARSE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. BONNYCASTLE.]

No organization was made, however; and as the mob came down the Champs Elysées it was quickly dispersed by the military without any bloodshed. The city was held by the troops during the night, no further manifestation of any importance was made, and so the affair has ended for the present.

HORACE, THE LATIN POET,

HORACE has left many descriptions of his rustic retreat at Tibur, both in his epistles and his odes. His wishes were moderate, and his mode of life simple. A good library, food to serve a year—these comprised the whole of his desires, and seemed to him all mankind should pray for. His custom was to visit Rome in the spring, to spend the summer in the country, and to pass the winter at Tarentum. In his retirement he obtained from literary work, and gave himself up to enjoyment. In his latter days he devoted himself entirely to rural pleasures.

In his youth Horace was a professed Epicurean; but "the years that bring the philosophic mind" induced him to turn Stoic. His conversion he has described in one of his odes, in which he mentions that on a certain day it lightened and thundered in a pure sky—an occurrence which he regarded as miraculous, and accepted as an argument for an overruling Providence.

As to his personal appearance, Horace was short of stature and corpulent, being compared by Augustus to a little thick volume which he had sent him, accompanied by a letter. At forty he was gray-haired, and subject to sore eyes, which induced him to abstain from too much exercise, though he loved company and a cheerful glass. But he wished his guests to use their own discretion, and be entirely free in their use of the latter. His disposition was amorous, but he mastered his passions, and lived tranquilly in his old age. He and Mæcenas died in the same year and month; Horace being then in his fifty-seventh year. He is regarded as a master in the lyric school of poetic art, and in his odes has risen to the sublime as well as the beautiful, aiming always at dignity of thought and majesty of expression. His style has many felicities which are peculiar, and by which he contrives to elevate the humblest themes. Delicacy, brevity, and simplicity are its general characteristics. Of satire Horace may almost be considered the founder.

VERONICA

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book IV.

CHAPTER III.

A CLOSE RUN.

On the following day Hugh Lockwood had two surprises. The first was of a very disagreeable nature. The second, though it at first appeared to him to be a very simple matter, was of great importance in its results.

When he reached the office of Digby and West, at Westminster, he found a letter there addressed to himself. The sight of the Dancecster postmark made his pulse beat a thought quicker as he opened it.

It was from Herbert Snowe, and to the following effect:

Mr. Snowe, senior, regretted that he should not be able in person to advance the sum of money Mr. Lockwood had desired to borrow of the bank. The present time was a period of anxiety and uncertainty in the money market. Mr. Snowe did not feel himself justified in entering into any transaction of the kind contemplated, without better security than could be offered by Mr. Lockwood's friends. Mr. Snowe had very confidence in Mr. Lockwood's ability to find the money elsewhere. Meanwhile he begged to assure him of his kind esteem.

Hugh crushed the letter in his hand, and went straight to his desk, where he began to write at a fierce rate. After a few minutes he put down his pen, and took up the letter again and read it through with compressed lips; the only result of letting over the upper, in a way that gave him a strong resemblance to his mother.

There was a few words at the end of the letter expressive of Herbert Snowe's personal regret that the matter had not been arranged.

"I think, Lockwood, that, if you can wait a while, we may yet be able to do the loan for you," wrote young Snowe. "My father is a cautious man, and I believe the fact to be as he asserts, that the present moment is not one in which prudent men are afford to run any money risks."

"Risks!" exclaimed Hugh, contemptuously. "Risks, to a house like Snowe's! I believe the old man could put his hand in his pocket and pull out the first ten sum I want, and never miss it!"

Then he thought that it was of no use to scold or talk, and resolved to bear his disappointment manfully. But it was a disappointment, and he worked on with an increasing sense of depression.

It often happens that the first shock of misfortune is far from being the hardest part of it. We take up our burden with untried muscles, and find it lighter than our fears had anticipated. But with every hour of our journey our strength grows more and more oppressive.

Before the time came for him to leave his office, a note was brought to him by a messenger. And this was the second surprise. The note was as follows:

"Reform Square, Wednesday.

"My dear Hugh,—I have got back from foreign parts, where I have been very busy of late. The result is that I am in a position to offer you an advantageous engagement. I should be glad to see you, either this afternoon or to-morrow, at my office here, as I have something advantageous to communicate to you. I shall be ready for you at any time between five and six. Yours ever,

"S. Frost."

"Something advantageous! It will be very welcome just now," thought Hugh. But he did not allow himself to be too sanguine. He remembered that Mr. Frost's ideas of his advantage were a little at variance with his own. He sent a note back by the messenger, to say that he would be with Mr. Frost a few minutes after five. And as soon as he left office he made his way for Bedford Square.

Mr. Frost received him in his private room with all his accustomed kindness of manner, and bade him be seated in the purple leather chair opposite his own.

"Well, Hugh, and how goes on business? Or can we still call Digby and West, I suppose?"

"Yes, for the present."

"When I went away, you had some idea of leaving them and setting up for yourself."

"I have the idea still, Sir. But it is a mighty difficult idea to carry out."

"Naturally! And I hope you will do nothing rashly. You know the homely proverb about not throwing away the dirty water before you have got the clean."

"I should call Digby and West dirty water. They have behaved very handsomely to me. But as to your proverb, it's a maxim we always consent to stay as long as it would be an impossibility for the world in general."

"I have not been unmindful of you while I have been away, Hugh. I have had your interests in view, and I come back empowered to make you an offer."

"Thank you, with all my heart, for kindly thinking of me."

"Oh, that is nothing. I consider myself bound; I am your father's old friend, you know. There is nothing to thank me for. But I hope you will consider my news good news."

"Whatever I think, I shall not be the less obliged to you for your good-will."

Mr. Frost perceived that Hugh was not going to bind himself blindfold to accept whatever should be offered him: he saw that there was a quiet preparation on the young man's part for making resistance, if resistance should be necessary.

"Well, I am commissioned by the Directors of the Parthenope Embellishment Company to offer you an engagement as assistant architect and surveyor to the works they are employed on at Naples. And if you will cast your eyes over this letter of the secretary to me, and over these papers, I think you will allow that the offer is not a bad one."

Mr. Frost pushed the letter and papers across the table as he spoke.

Hugh read them attentively; and then, raising his eyes to Mr. Frost's face, said: "The offer is a most liberal—and may ay an extraordinarily liberal—one, indeed."

"The fact is that nearly all the power would be in your hands. You have a big name on their prospectus to catch the public, of course. But the actual work will be managed by you. In London; and I dare say would practically trouble himself very little about the works."

"But the assistant architect would have to reside at Naples?"

"It is a charming place. One does not get many opportunities of being paid to go and live in such a lovely spot. Upon my word, I should think a year or two spent on Naples the most tempting part of the business!"

"Not to me, Mr. Frost."

"Well, to be sure, the other advantages are substantially greater."

"They are very great, no doubt. But the fact is, I can not avail myself of them."

"My dear Hugh! You don't mean to say that you will throw away such a chance in anger with you; and I won't take you at your word. What possible reason can there be against the scheme?"

"I hate to seem so ungrateful, Mr. Frost, I assure you. I am."

"And you really mean to throw up this prospect without more reflection?"

"I do not believe that further reflection would alter my intentions. And besides, you know, it would not be honest. I should hesitate to begin, since it is so desirable a thing, there will doubtless be plenty of candidates for it."

"I dare say. But the point will not go a-begging," answered Mr. Frost, stiffly.

"Look here, Hugh. I don't know that I am not ungrateful for your kind interest in me. But I am not a child, and I must be allowed to judge for myself in this matter."

"Oh, certainly!"

"Now you are angry with me; and yet, on my honor, I would do almost any thing rather than that you should be. You remember that we talked of your engagement to Miss Lovegrove, and you then that I was resolved to endeavor to make a little connection between you and her. I am not in the same mind. I believe I am rather a constant fellow by nature—well, obstinate, if you like it. I set a value on your love. But I do not be in any one's employ, I will remain with Digby and West. That is all I have to say. And if they are safe as the Bank. This Parthenope Company offers very magnificently; but it may end in a fiasco. I am not sanguine. I have suspicions sometimes collapse unexpectedly. These are reasons that I can explain, you see. There are others that I am not at liberty to speak of, and that I must ask you to take my word for."

Hugh, if I guess one of those reasons aright, will you tell me?"

"Why, I don't know what to say about that!"

"That means that you won't! But I can tell you that, last year before I left England, I had conversations with your father. And I know, even then, that you were very likely to lose your heart to a fair young lady."

"Did you, Sir?" said Hugh. He was nearly a good deal surprised that his mother should have spoken unreservedly to Mr. Frost on a subject which she had never broached to himself at that time.

"Yes; and I will say candidly that I then thought that prospect a bad one."

"Why, Mr. Frost, you seem to be a fair young lady? After all, it was rather natural!"

"I thought at the time that the loss of your heart to the special fair lady I had in view would lead to trouble. But it may be that I was wrong. I go back for a moment to the business I sent for you upon; am I to understand that your decline answer to the proposition is 'yes'?"

"No, thank you!' at the very least," said Hugh, smiling. Then he added, seriously: "If I was really pressed I should take a day or two to consider of the matter—"

"I am pressed, and should it advisable."

"Then I will do it. I don't wish to seem pig-headed. I will talk over the matter at home, and let you know to-morrow, about noon. But I must add that you must not expect me to give a different answer from the one I have given already."

"In two days' time. Good. The Parthenope Embellishment can wait that time. Now tell me how is all at home—your mother?"

"My mother is very well, I fear. She does not complain, but I believe she has been harassed and tried too much. She frets more than she ought to fret, about troubles. But yet she is wonderfully placid in her manner at most times. Last night, however, she was ruffled and unlike herself."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. You know we have had trouble in the house, in the death of poor Lady Tallis?"

"I heard of her death. It was on the fourth of March, was it not?"

"Let me see. I think so. Yes."

"Had she been ill long?"

"Ill, yes; but not long in apparent danger."

"And she died on the evening of the fourth of March."

"Morning. On the morning of the fourth."

"Oh, morning was it? Ay, ay. I suppose that mere work in her to the last?"

"By an odd chance, I believe I was the last person who saw Lady Tallis alive."

"Really! And was there any hint of her death took place very early—before you went to Westminster?"

"I did not go to Westminster to my office that day. I could not leave my mother and Ethel—Miss Dorrington, you know. I had special work on hand, and had taken a few days' leave of absence."

"I see. I see. Poor Lady Tallis! On Tuesday morning the fourth of March. At about ten or eleven o'clock, I suppose. You said it was in the forenoon, I think?"

Hugh could not but be struck by the coincidence of Mr. Frost's inquiry on the precise hour of Lady Tallis's death, in the same way in which her mother had inquired on them last night.

"Why, Mr. Frost," he said, abruptly, "is it a matter of any importance at what hour Lady Tallis died?"

Mr. Frost was in nowise disconcerted by the question. He occupied with a complex frown on his knotted forehead, and a shrewd smile on his closed lips. "It may prove to be so, indeed, Hugh. It is impossible to say what small linkage an important matter may sometimes turn."

Hugh could resist an uneasy feeling, like the first cold touch of suspicion, as he recalled his mother's manner of the previous evening. "And was there—what could there be—to suspect? He did not know. But the cold touch was there, at his heart.

"Well, Sir," he answered, "if it be of importance, I believe I can set the matter at rest. She died—"

"Stop, Hugh! Wait a minute. Things of this kind are easily said, but not easily unsaid."

"Mr. Frost, I do not understand you."

"I mean that in a case where accuracy is of vital importance, a person not previously warned of this importance may speak thoughtlessly an inaccurate word to which he will stand committed, and which may produce a great deal of mischief."

"But I—"

"So," proceeded Mr. Frost, speaking through Hugh's words, "so I will, if you will allow me, explain to you the importance to others, that it is that you should weigh your words carefully."

Point by point, Mr. Frost went over the story he had told to Mrs. Lockwood. Hugh fixed his eyes on him while he spoke, with a settled, and disguised expression of wonder. Mr. Frost did not look at him often, though from time to time he met his eye steadily and keenly. He had taken a sheet of ruled paper that lay on the table before him, and, as he spoke, occupied his fingers in folding it over and over, with accurate care to make the creases correspond with the blue ruled lines.

When Mr. Frost had made an end of his story, he leaned back in his chair, and began twisting his folded paper into a spiral form.

"Now," said he, "are you quite sure you know at what hour Lady Tallis died?"

Hugh nodded his head gravely and slowly before he answered. "She died in time to make that morning a good marriage, if her death ever all that was necessary to do so."

The twisted paper in Mr. Frost's hands was suddenly rent in half throughout its folded thickness.

"Indeed? You speak very confidently, but your answer is not categorical. And the evidence may be conflicting. Your mother thought differently on this point."

"My mother! If my mother thought differently, she was mistaken. And by insisting on questions it may be possible to elicit an answer of the kind you require, and perfectly fully aware."

"Leading questions! You speak as though I had some advantage to gain by disproving this marriage! What interest can I have in the supposse it matters to me? I don't quite comprehend you, Hugh."

"And to say truth, Mr. Frost, I do not at all comprehend you."

"I have no brief for mystery, I assure you. Nor for Quixotism. It is, perhaps, not difficult to throw away other people's fortunes with a high-and-mighty flourish. I am a plain, cynical kind of man; and I should think twice before I did so."

No twinge of conscience prevented Mr. Frost's handsome face from being scornful, or weakened the determination of his mind as he said those words.

Hugh was pained and uneasy. His mother, then, had seen Mr. Frost! And she had been guilty of something like deception in suppressing the fact! This, to Hugh, was an absolute and tolerable thought. Yet he would not ask any questions, on this point, of Mr. Frost. After a pause he said: "I honestly do not know what you mean, or what you would have me do. At least you will tell me that."

"Oh, of course," answered Mr. Frost, drily. "I can trust to all means: so soon as you are quite sure what is the truth. The other party intend to litigate."

"To litigate?"

"They intend to litigate, I believe (underscored I am not acting for the so-distant Lady Gale. Lovegrove is Miss Desmond's trustee and guardian, and there would be a certain indelicacy in one of the firm appearing on the other side); they intend to litigate, unless they find beforehand by testimony as to the period of Lady T.'s death that they haven't a leg to stand on."

Hugh passed his hand over his forehead. Mr. Frost watched him keenly.

"There are circumstances in this case," said Mr. Frost, "which would render the publicity of litigation peculiarly painful. Miss Desmond's position would be distressing."

Hugh continued to rub his forehead with the air of one trying to revive a painful problem.

Mr. Frost got up and stood in his favorite posture with his back to the fire-place. He exerted his gaze from Hugh, and played with his watch-chain. "My own impression is," he said, "that Lady T. died at a more convenient time for her niece's fortunes than you seem to think, Mr. Lockwood, when I saw her yesterday—Perhaps she did not mention having seen me? Ah! Well, it was quite a confidential interview. Miss Lockwood was impressed that the time she thing rested on her testimony, and that of the servant, it would come right for Miss Desmond."

Hugh got up from his chair and stood opposite to Mr. Frost, looking at him with a very stern face. And the stern was intended to stand as he answered: "But the thing will rest on my testimony. And I have already told you to what effect my testimony will be." And he walked out of the office without another word.

Mr. Frost stood without moving for some time after Hugh was gone. Then he clasped his hands over his head several times, as he, thought he, "that the marriage on shipboard was begun earlier than I fancied. People are so long about time. We must make more inquiries. But, by Jove, it will be a wonderfully close run!"

CHAPTER IV.

GOSSIP.

"I DON'T believe a word of it!" said Mrs. Lovegrove.

"My dear!" remonstrated her husband.

"I do not," repeated Mrs. Lovegrove, distinctly. Then she added, "Now I put it to you, my dearest, what this thing could be based on?"

"It may not stand to reason, and yet it may be true, nevertheless. The mean is in the case, things very often do not stand to reason; but they happen all the same," observed Augustus Lovegrove, judicially.

There had been for some time past a tone of bitterness and misanthropy discernible in this young gentleman's language and manners. He also frequented matins with inflexible punctuality, and always "did lookin" at home" on Wednesdays and Fridays. This severe self-discipline and devotion was attributed by his mother and sisters to a disappointed attachment to Miss Desmond. But no word was ever spoken on the subject in the family when Augustus was present.

"Why, you," said Mr. Lovegrove, grandly, "As regards men or women either, many things happen which one can't exactly say stand to reason."

"I have been told," said Mrs. Lovegrove, making her upper lip very long, "that my intellect is too logical to be a woman's. It is that, I can not help it. But, I repeat, I can not believe that that man"—Mrs. Lovegrove underlined—"committed such a horrible act of injustice at the very brink of the grave."

"I don't see any thing surprising in it. The man had been committing horrible acts of injustice all his life; and there was no reason to expect him to change and alranged man at the last moment. Besides, it is not a question of what any body should do, but of what seems likely or unlikely. The marriage either can be proved or it can not," said Mr. Lovegrove, folding back his Times newspaper so as to read it more conveniently, and giving it a sharp tap with the back of his hand.

"I would not for the world that the girls heard this repulsive story mentioned," said Mrs. Lovegrove.

"I don't see how you're to keep it from them," replied her husband. "They happen to be spending the day out to-day; but that is only once in a way. They will be at home to-morrow, and you can't prevent people gossiping."

And, indeed, it was not long before the Miss Lovegroves were informed of the decease of Lady Tallis (such a gossip!) and had heard of the person who claimed to be his widow; and of the large fortune which was in question; and of a great many details respecting the innermost thoughts and feelings of the parties concerned.

The Lovegrove servants knew the story. So did the Frosts'. So did the little maid-of-all-work at Mrs. Lockwood's; and entitled the relishing gossip to the green-grocer's wife, and to the baker, and to the milkman; and like a rolling snow-ball, the tale grew in the telling.

Mrs. Lovegrove, after her declaration of unbelief, sat down and waited on the extraordinary caprice of fortune which was said to have occurred.

She did not believe it. No; she did not believe it! But she should like to hear a few more particulars. It was really a long time since she had called on Mrs. Frost. Her daughter, Miss Sarah Lovegrove, should be the one to bring discussion between partners! Poor Mrs. Frost's weak vanity was objectionable. But not for that would she abstain from paying her due civility, or long or much civility was not incompatible with principle. Sarah Lovegrove had ever been considered to possess a masculine intelligence, superior to the petty foibles of her sex.

The upshot of Mrs. Lovegrove's meditations was, that she sent for the fly which was hired out from an adjacent livery-stable, and was driven in state to Mr. Frost's residence.

It was a good opportunity. Her daughters were absent; and she would run no risk of contaminating their ears with the details of a kind of story with which, alas! elder persons were obliged to be acquainted in their journeys through the world!

Mrs. Lovegrove always arrayed herself with especial care for a visit to Mrs. Frost. Her toilet on this occasion was a matter of more hesitation and more debate than she would willingly have acknowledged even to herself. At one moment she would resolve to adhere to the strict principles that usually regulated her attire, and that resulted in the general sad-colored effect of it; at another, she would be tempted to relieve the leaden dullness by a bright bow of ribbon or a flower. She was divided between a desire to vindicate the strength of her intellect by showing herself to be above the frivolities of fashion, and a secret fear of Mrs. Frost's satirical glances, and, possibly, speeches.

Mrs. Lovegrove never confessed to herself that she was afraid of Mrs. Frost, and would have hotter had no suspicion of the fact, but spoke to Mr. Frost of her husband's wife as a dear old friend, wooden-headed woman." Nevertheless, Mrs. Lovegrove was by no means self-sufficient enough to be indifferent to the opinion of Mrs. Frost. And she concealed more feminine gentleness and timidity under her hard exterior than had ever entered into the composition of the beautiful Georgina; which is not, however, saying much.

It was about half past four o'clock in the afternoon when Mrs. Lovegrove's fly drew up at the door of Mr. Frost's house. Mrs. Lovegrove was ushered into a small, shady drawing-room, where she found the house-keeping wife in the best dress appearance struck Mrs. Lovegrove with amazement, mingled with disapproval. The visitor wore a brilliant costume made in the most elegant mode; and on the top of a heap of false hair, whose excessive quantity showed a sovereign contempt for probability, was perched a small white hat adorned with peacock's feathers. As the face beneath the hat must have been at least sixty summers, the contrast between it and its head-gear was startling.

"Oh!" exclaimed Mrs. Frost, in a tone that said plainly, Who would have thought of seeing you?" "How do you do, Mrs. Lovegrove?"

Mrs. Lovegrove suddenly became conscious, as she sat down, of the disagreeable fact that her gloves were of a strange yellow color, which stood out objectionably against the leaden hue of her gown. She had been conscious of this fact ting on these gloves, but had at last decided on wearing them, as being the only spot of brightness about her attire. And now, under the eye of Mrs. Frost's fine eyes lately inspecting them, she became painfully aware that they were obtrusive, that they attracted the eye to every movement of her hands, and that she could not so much as raise her handkerchief to her face without demonstratively exhibiting two yellow glaring patches.

But Mrs. Lovegrove was not one of those whose emotions are quickly translated into the expression of their faces; she usually kept opposite to the mistress of the house with a stern countenance.

"You have got Mr. Frost back again," she said, after the first greetings were over. "How is he?"

"Well, really," rejoined Mrs. Frost, "you ought to know better than I do! You people at Bedford Square have more of his company than I have."

"But he is at home generally in the evenings," my dear, is he not?" asked she of the peacock's feathers.

"Sometimes. But in the evening I am often out."

"Out?"

"Yes. I am never sure whether he will be at home or not, and so I do not put off my engagements."

"Well, I wouldn't stir if I were in your place. I would give up fifty engagements for the chance of having a long evening with Mr. Frost."

"I am sure Mr. Frost would be immensely obliged to you, Betsy! I'll tell him," said Georgina, with a disagreeable smile.

All this time Mrs. Lovegrove was sitting silent, with her yellow gloves exposed to view. She felt very uncomfortable. She had thought to find Mrs. Frost alone, and to have drawn from her some vivid account of the interest that had so excited her curiosity. But Mrs. Lovegrove was extraordinarily indiscreet, and could not have thought of touching on the topic before a stranger, although she would have thought it fair to find out, if she could, all that Mrs. Frost knew about it. And now here was this simpering old woman, in whose presence she could not say a word, and whom Miss Mac Lavegrove was inclined to consider a disgrace to a Christian country. And, besides, how could she ask her her guest seemed to take any notice of her!

The simpering old woman, however, very unexpectedly turned round just as Mrs. Lovegrove was thinking these thoughts, and said, in a brisk, good-natured manner: "Now I must ask you to present me to Mrs. Lovegrove, Georgina."

Mrs. Frost somewhat ungraciously complied.

"Miss Boyce—Mrs. Lovegrove."

"I am an old friend of Mrs. Frost's," said Miss Boyce, "and I don't approve of the fashion of not introducing people."

"Every body is supposed to know every body else," said Mrs. Frost.

Mrs. Lovegrove quite understood that she, who lived in Bedford Square, was not included in the "every body." But she merely bowed rather grimly, and said nothing.

"Oh, but that's a very nonsensical supposition, my dear," returned Betsy Boyce, waving her hand up and down contemptuously. "That rule can only apply to a very limited and exclusive circle indeed; and not to your 'every body,' nor my 'every body' either!"

Mrs. Lovegrove felt quite grateful to this old little person; and began to think that her gay petticoat was not quite so short as she had at first supposed.

"Well, and isn't this a queer business about your Sir Talbis?" proceeded Miss Boyce, without the least circumlocution.

Mrs. Lovegrove, being uncertain how much the other woman knew, shook her head mysteriously, and said, "But is it all true that we hear?"

"All true! I should suppose not. Very few things that are true are all true. But I believe there is no doubt that the man is dead—died rather suddenly I was told—and that he has left a tangle of troubles behind him. Served him right, too!"

"What has he left?" asked Mrs. Frost. She had been leaning back in her chair calculating how many yards of some fine old point lace that she had on would be required to border her velvet gown, and wondering whether Mr. Frost's business in London would be well enough to make him generous with his money.

"My goodness, Georgina! I say he has left misery and worry and vexation, and perhaps worse, behind him."

"How do you mean?"

"How do I mean! Why only think what a dreadful position that poor dear girl, the nicest, sweetest creature, Maud Desmond, will be placed in! They say that that young woman, the victim's daughter—I'm sorry to say I have a very bad opinion of her—has come to England to assert I saw her handsome face—claims to be Sir John's rightful wife, and Maud Desmond has brought up with her as a sister. The vicar is her guardian. Poor Lady Talbis was her aunt. I never heard of such a horrid complication."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Frost, "if Miss Desmond cares about money, she won't object to part with Sir John Gale, I suppose she will find it more satisfactory that her friend should have the only money than not."

"But, my goodness, Georgina, you don't appear to understand the case," said Miss Boyce, impatiently.

"No, I dare say I do not," replied Mrs. Frost, with a chirp which said plainly, "and I don't care to understand it."

Miss Boyce chattered volubly, pouring out statements, questions, and answers in a manner that set on fact, and some as sirily unreal as the business itself. Mrs. Frost, as she went along, something of a will left by Sir John Gale; but that part of her information was very vague and confused. She knew that it was said that Miss Desmond would inherit a million of money; others declared that the vicar's daughter would have it all; that the vicar's wife had had a hand in upsetting the will of his wealth to a newly-discovered relative, Mr. Gale Gale.

"But how in the world did you hear all this?" asked Mrs. Lovegrove, during a breathless pause in Miss Boyce's talk.

Miss Boyce was rather flattered by the question.

"Oh, my dear soul," she answered, smiling shrewdly, "although I do not know quite 'every body,' I have a considerable number of acquaintance nevertheless. And as to hearing, I never wonder at people hearing of things; I'm only puzzled when they don't hear of them. The world is very small, after all. And I declare to you that I don't remember when I first heard of it; I have no episode in my life to hide, either for my own sake or any one else's; for I protest on my honor that I am not the horrid young lady mixed in the sand is a trifle to the sort of thing I observe in the world, where, positively, people will be a bit of a gauze veil over their noses, and favor that nobody can see through it."

Mrs. Lovegrove was so delighted at Miss Boyce's having declined the proffered favor that she grimly nodded her head.

But be met her first words with a grave admonition as to the sacredness of keeping the secret of Sir John Talis Gale's affairs.

"Frost brings a queer account of the state of the case. There is, indeed, a will. But if the second marriage be proved valid, the will is, of course, worth nothing," said Mr. Lovegrove.

"My dear Augustus, let me understand! Who inherits the property under the will?"

"That is not the point with respect to inherit us: Miss Desmond!"

"Mr. Lovegrove's maternal thoughts flew back to her son. If Maud should prove to be an heiress, and if she could be induced to like Augustus—

She said a word or two on the subject to her husband. But Mr. Lovegrove's feeling in the matter was not quite in harmony with her own.

"Augustus is a capital fellow," said the father; "but I don't believe he has a chance in that quarter."

"Why not? He would be a husband any young woman ought to be proud and thankful to win!"

"I suppose most mothers say the same of their sons, Sarah. But put the case that our Dora were to come into a great fortune, would you think such a young man as Augustus a fitting match for her?"

"That's quite different—"

"Ahs! It is, is it?"

"Be so good as not to interrupt me, Mr. Lovegrove. I am not a mere—a—fool. I don't know where to find such another young man as Augustus. I'm sure any girl might go down on her knees and thank Heaven for such a husband as Augustus."

"Did you go down on your knees and thank Heaven, when I proposed to you, Sally? I don't much believe in the girls doing that sort of thing."

And then Mr. Lovegrove retired behind his newspaper, and sat and scowled on the subject between the husband and wife.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE query is, shall we have January in May, since we enjoyed warm weather in the early days of January? The "oldest inhabitant" seldom has experienced any thing like it. And our charming days have been delightful for walks and rides—only, all the while, one's main predilection has been sounding in one ears of fearful blocking snow-storms in February, of tornadoes in March, and frost-nipped buds in April and May. And when July comes, shall we have any ice to use in those many luxurious ways which have become almost a necessary part of our summer existence in the city?

There have been many versions of the story of George Peabody and his gifts. The facts are said to be that, about thirty years ago, a young lady of Providence, Rhode Island, went to spend a season in Europe; but not before she had given her affections to a young man living in Philadelphia. The young man, however, was without fortune, and was in no situation to marry; and, unwilling that the lady should vainly wait for the long years of waiting, he released her from her engagement. In Europe she met George Peabody, then a middle-aged gentleman, a young man, but one who was already making his mark. He was received with her grace and loveliness, and, though her heart still belonged to her lover across the Atlantic, after a time she became his affianced bride. When she returned to this country, she met her first love, all her former affection came back, and, indeed, it was not strange that she was willing to share a moderate income with him. All was told to Peabody, and he, with that manliness that characterized his every action, gave her up, and at the time she was married. The marriage proved a happy one; and she lady is now a widow, living in Massachusetts.

England printed last year five hundred novels and two hundred other books; other new or new editions of old works; and enough other new books to bring the number up to 4500.

Many educational reports have been circulated respecting the prevalence of small-pox in the city at this time. It is undoubtedly true that the disease has existed to some extent, but none of the most wicked and deadly populated sections of the city. This has been owing, no doubt, to the care which has been exercised, and has been guarded against by our Board of Health with all possible care. The disease is not spreading, and is now rapidly diminishing, in consequence of the vigorous measures taken. A large number of the cases which have been reported were by vaccination, and, of course, any contagion arising therefrom from these cases is not to be feared. The officers of the Board of Health have made most ample arrangements for all to avail themselves of this simple preventive, using the most scrupulous care that the vaccine virus should be fresh and pure.

Many persons have a superstitious fear of vaccination. In regard to this point statistics show that no death has ever occurred from vaccination among the fifty thousand persons who have been vaccinated with, in the past year, under the superintendence of the Metropolitan Board of Health. Those public schools in the city in which the rule of vaccination has been thoroughly observed are free from the disease. Before vaccination was introduced into New York about two hundred children died annually in this city from small-pox; but since that time—more than half a century ago—only a single child in one household has perished from that disease. So that facts show that death from small-pox has taken place with the universality of vaccination among the people.

During the recent severe illness of Victor Emmanuel, the Pope rescinded the excommunication which had been pronounced against him, so that in case of death the soul of the excommunicated monarch might not be flung by evil spirits into the fires of hell. Yesterday's surprise the King of Italy rapidly recovered. The Pope did not reclaim upon this; and now the question is, shall the excommunicant be re-communicated by Pope and Council?

M. Olivier, the new Prime Minister of France, is very simple in his habits. He receives his friends only at breakfast. He dines at seven o'clock, goes to bed early, and rises at six or seven o'clock. He has only water, never smokes, seldom goes to the theatre, and then only to hear the music. So says the Court Journal.

Madame Ristori has met with brilliant success in Brazil, and the Emperor has been one of her most enthusiastic and appreciative admirers.

The emancipation of the Russian serfs will be complete during February, and they will be allowed to settle where they please. It is probable that many of those who now inhabit the northern districts will make use of their liberty to emigrate to the south, where the land is exceedingly fertile, and the soil will be more remunerative. This, however, will be hard for those who remain, as the taxes must then be levied not on the individual, but on the commune; and if one emigrates the only thing like an estimate which the judges expect it will be, it must reduce the communes in the north to utter ruin, besides causing heavy losses to the government.

How convenient it might be in times when food is scarce and high if human beings possessed the power of a sluggish and torpid creature when long fasts are—and looks like a cucumber of variable dimensions! When this animal is subjected to a forced fast a singular phenomenon is observed. It gradually detaches various parts of its own body, which it supplies successively as food to the remainder. Its gills, its beard, and then the separation of the condemned part takes place quite suddenly. Apparently the animal, feeling that it has not sufficient nourishment to supply all parts of its organization, rejects those parts which it would be most difficult to support.

A party of young men in Springfield, Ohio, spent a part of New-Year's Day in firing salutes from their revolvers. One of the number afterward complained of not feeling well. No special trouble was experienced through the day, but at night on examination a bullet hole was found in the rim of his hat, and upon further search it appeared that the bullet which had pierced his hat had also entered his head, although he declared he was not aware of it, and suffered no inconvenience from it. The ball was then not at his head, because at this time; but the next evening he went home, and upon undressing for bed the wound broke out and was commenced. Two physicians examined the wound, and came to the conclusion that the ball which had entered his head had lodged under the frontal bone, the young man at times complaining of a pain in his right temple. He has not been prostrated a day by the wound; goes about as usual, thing had happened, although some of the attending physicians declare that the ball must have passed through the skull.

A most singular case of depravity is mentioned in a Philadelphia paper. A young woman, only twenty-one years old, is stated to be one of the moving spirits of a gang in New York known as the "Forty Thieves." She is called the "Queen," and goes and receive the gang goes, doing the cooking for the vagabonds who compose it. She is said to be the wife of a brother of a local preacher living in Germantown, who once was a minister to Sweden. But to all attempts of parents and friends to return home she has turned a deaf ear, and has evidently made what have indulged a young girl to such a course of life.

Never was religious charity paraded in a more grotesque and silly form than in a list of contributions to the "Jubilee Fund," a religious movement which has recently sprung up in London. A few examples of the items will be sufficient for our readers: "Mr. Bruce, K——, for a Maux wife and nine children, whom the Lord has graciously given to his servant, £5. Mr. W. H——, in remembrance of two beloved wives in heaven, and with many hearty hearts for the Rev. J. Weslea preach in Wallingford, £1. 4s. Mr. John Vine, £5, as an expression of gratitude for an excellent wife in heaven, and an excellent wife on earth, £5. Much-hardening for five precious children, yet lent unto me to be cheer and bless my widowed years, £5. For Jesus' £5s; for Anna, my precious partner for thirty-one years, gone home to the King in his glory, £3."

The valuable library and art gallery which Mr. James Lenox has offered to the city of New-York will be a treasure to the public, and particularly to American students. Many years have been spent in completing this "collection of manuscripts, printed books, engravings, coins, paintings, sculptures, drawings, and other works of art," and the value of it cannot be easily estimated. A gallery which the Trustees of the Lenox Library has passed both branches of the State Legislature. The donor of this collection has also invited, as a site for the building, such an estate in the vicinity of the Central Park as may be selected by the Trustees. The Legislature has by this act seem ers to be expended in the erection of a suitable building, and the remainder to be devoted to necessary attendant expenses.

The Coutou de Nil is very fashionable just now among the ladies of the French court. But let not any fair reader be too greatly delighted at the fact, for by it her Majesty is prevented from wearing her dresses for a week! This local scourge, irritating, but not dangerous, generally chooses the hands and face for its victims; but neither the Empress nor Madame de la Poize, it has taken possession of the back. Doctors are put in doubt as to the origin of the spiteful little eruption, though they are all accustomed by the lures of the worm peculiar to the most of the Nile's productions attributed to the mud of the Nile, in search of moisture, buries itself beneath the skin. It is only when her dress also caught fire, and before everybody, that her Majesty's suit has suffered more or less from its attacks.

Rumor says that, not long ago, Senator Hamlin, being requested to frank some letters, complied with the request by placing three-cent stamps on them, and then returned them to the writers to be regularly mailed.

Another terrible kerosene accident. One morning last week a woman living in Brooklyn, in attempting to fire, took a can of kerosene and poured it upon the coals, to make them kindle more quickly. The fire communicated to the can, which instantly exploded, scattering the burning oil over the woman's garments. At the two-year-old child, seeing her mother in flames, ran to help her, and took hold of her clothes, when her dress also caught fire, and before assistance could reach them they were both so badly burned that they could be done to save them. After lingering in great agony, they died on the next day.

According to Paris papers the price of oysters has become so fabulously high that a new shell-fish has come to the market which not only answers the same purpose as the oyster, but in some respects an improvement upon it. The new shell-fish is called "ormoide;" it is a bivalve smaller than the oyster, and of a more elliptical form. It can be eaten like the oyster, but what advantage it has over the latter is the mussel with the most satisfactory results.

Professor Agatiue Longo, of the University of Catania, has just published a philosophical and theological work which is designed to counteract the "immoral" tendency of the writings of Darwin. The professor may serve to show the spirit in which it is written:

"Only Catholicism could produce a Dante, a Tasso, a Galileo, a Columbus. The Catholic sects can do nothing but state paradoxes and new ignorance. What has Rationalism produced but the time of Nero? Protestant our own Pro-estis. What is Newton's theory of gravitation? Only a Protestant hypothesis. What has most impressed the world's imagination? Hell. The astronomers with their attraction of gravitation, and the botanists with their sexes are the mechanical theory of host. When will an orthodox and sensible philosophy appear? Only in the theories of gravitation and affinity, the central fire, and Humboldt's Kosmos' are attributed to the ideas of Catholics. A single man rises superior to all others, of whatever class and nationality, Dante Alighieri. He is Pius IX., Rome's great priest. His word has authority, and before him the mighty men of earth and the wisdom of this world shall bow their heads."

An interesting fragment of about eight hundred lines of an early drama by Goethe, called by his educative verse, has been found in the Vernon MS. in the Bodleian library, by Mr. Walter W. Skeat. The fragment is without beginning or end, but it describes chiefly the wondrous shield prepared by Vulcan or Mordreus (Slow-at-shelf) for his descendant Sir Gabinal. This alliterative Gvil fragment is to be published at an early day.

The death is announced of the Baron Schmidt von der Launitz, the sculptor. He was a native of Courland, and long a resident at Frankfort, where he died at the age of seventy-four years. His most important work is the monument to the first printers, Gutenberg, Faust, and Schoeffer, erected in Frankfort about thirteen years ago.

THE RUMFORD MEDALS.

IN 1796 COUNT RUMFORD, in a letter addressed to JOHN ADAMS, requested the American Academy of Arts and Sciences to accept five thousand dollars in United States stocks, the interest of which was to be applied to premiums to American authors of important discoveries, improvements, or inventions in regard to light and heat. The premiums were to consist of two medals, one of gold and one of silver, together of the intrinsic value of three hundred dollars. At a recent meeting of the Academy, in Boston, these medals (of which engravings will be found on this page) were awarded to Mr. GEORGE H. CORLISS, of Providence, Rhode Island. The presentation was made by Dr. ASA GRAY, President of the Academy, with the following remarks.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

Gentlemen of the Academy:

At the last anniversary meeting, after a careful investigation by your appropriate committee, you awarded the Rumford Medal to Mr. GEORGE H. CORLISS, for improvements of the steam-engine. The gold medal and a silver duplicate have been struck, and are now before us. The inventor whose genius you have thus recognized has responded to our call, and is now present. Till he soon presume, these medals will now be consigned to his hands.

Mr. Corliss:

The trust which our countryman, COUNT RUMFORD, charged this Academy to administer empowered it to award these medals "to the author of any important discovery or useful improvement on light or on heat, which shall have been made and published by principle, or in any way made known to the public, in any part of the confederate States, or of any of the American islands—preference being always given to such discoveries or improvements as shall, in the opinion of the Academy, tend most to promote the good of mankind."

As this is only the fifth occasion since the foundation of the trust upon which this premium has been given, it may well be inferred that the Academy has in no case bestowed it inconsiderately.

It has required the discovery or invention to be real, original, and important. It is not restricted to considerations of direct practical benefit, but it may, as it did in the first instance, in the case of the oxy-hydrogen blowpipe, honor a discovery of much scientific interest, the uses of which are doubtful. It would not hesitate to crown any successful, but unrewarded, attempt to subdue the atmosphere to the aerial domain, being confident that so considerable increase of our knowledge of the laws and forces of Nature is likely to remain unutilized. But the Academy rejoices when, as now, it can signalize an inventive skill unequivocally tends to promote that which the founder had most at heart, and commended to our particular regard, the material good of mankind.

Without entering into details, it will be possible to state the ground upon which the present award has been made. It is for the abolition of the throttle-valve of the steam-engine, and the transference of the regulation by the governor to a system of balancing valves of your own invention; with the advantages of a larger saving of fuel, a more steady motion, greater speed, less friction, less lubricant, less maintenance, perfectly uniform motion under varying work.

Previous to your improvements the regulation of the power and velocity of the steam-engine was universally effected by an instrument placed in the steam-pipe, well named the throttle-valve, being used to choke off the steam in its passage from the boiler, to reduce more or less its pressure before it was allowed to act within the engine. Avoiding this wasteful process, your engine embodies within itself a principle by which it appropriates the full, direct, and expansive force of the steam, and measures out for itself at each stroke, with the utmost precision, the exact quantity necessary to maintain the power and speed.

To the most approved engines previously used for manufacturing purposes, the valves employed were comparatively difficult to operate, too far from the piston, and in other respects unfit for working in connection with the governor. Their abandonment, and the substitution of others suitable for the purpose that you had in view, demanded an entire change in the structure of the engine.

In the reconstruction your mastery of the resources of mechanism is conspicuously shown. You introduced four valves to the cylinder, two for the admission and two for the ejection of the steam; and by your device of a wrist-plate you have given to each a rapid motion in opening and shutting, and a slow motion when passing through steam effect, thus securing a perfection in valve movements never before attained.

The special object of these changes, and the gist of your invention, was to place the induction-valves under the control of the governor, by which they are operated in opening through a mechanism from which they are released earlier or later in the stroke of the piston, according as more or less power is demanded of the engine—the governor, with extreme sensibility, determining the point where the supply of steam should be cut off. Thus, at every stroke of the piston, just so much steam is accurately meted out to the cylinder as is needed to maintain uniform velocity, and,left to expand then, and by its expansion develop the maximum of propelling power.

I have only to add that the Academy a brief account of the Corliss engine, by one of the most eminent of British engineers, Mr. J. SCOTT RUSSELL, which must needs be free from personal or national prepossession. It is from one of the official reports on the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1867:

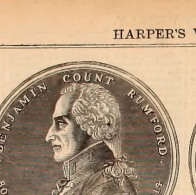
"A third remarkable engine is American, both in invention and execution, and forms perhaps the most remarkable feature of the American department. It exhibits thoughtful design, ingenious contrivance, refined skill, and admirable execution. It is singularly unlike an English engine. It has four ports on four different parts of the cylinder, two on one side and two on the opposite, each worked by a separate mechanism. These ports are worked by valves, not sliding, like our own, on flat surfaces, but sliding valves on cylindrical surfaces. Close up to the cylinder these valves cut off the steam with scarce a particle of waste room, and so economize to the utmost the high-pressure steam which they admit, and which they use so expansively and so sparingly as possible. The mechanism by which these results are obtained is at once so ingenious and extraordinary, but it is, in truth, refined, elegant, most effectual, and judicious; it causes steam to be steamed, but develops what it uses to most effect. Then it proportions in an admirable way the doses of steam it serves out to the continually-varying quantity of work the engine has to do. The mechanism of its mechanical governor is wonderfully delicate and direct; the governor is sensitive to the most delicate changes of speed, and feels the slightest demand upon the engine for more or less work and steady speed. A mechanism so beautiful as the lemon hand re-leases or retains its grasp of the feeding-valve, and regulates the supply of steam in precise proportion to each varying want. The American engine of CORLISS every where tells of wise forethought, judicious proportion, sound execution, and exquisite contrivance."

It appears that within the twenty years since this machinery was perfected more than 1800 engines of the kind have been built in the United States, and several hundreds in other countries, giving an aggregate of not less than 350,000 horse-power; that, as to economy of fuel, evidence has been afforded to the Rumford Committee showing a saving over older forms of engine of about one-third. As to its other characteristics, the testimony is that the wear and tear of one of the engines, now in its eighteenth year of service, certify that, with the power varying from 60 to 300 horse-power within a minute, the speed of the engine is not perceptibly affected.

If it is worth noting that when these medals were voted to you, Mr. CORLISS, just a century had passed since JAMES WATT first patented his improvements of the steam-engine. The vast results of these improvements—the difference between the engine when WATT found it and when he left it—make one of the most important chapters in the history of applied science. It is a great thing to say, but I may not withhold the statement, that, in the opinion of those who have officially investigated the matter, no one invention has done so much to enhance the value of the steam-engine as that for which the Rumford Medal is now presented to you.

If WATT, or his partner BOULTON, could know that they held the supply of that which almost every body longed to have, power, one may justly delicately yourself, and permit us to felicitate you, upon your ability to supply a greater amount of mechanical power for the expenditure, and an exacter nicety in its governance, than any of your predecessors.

In acknowledgment of this benefit, the American



1.—OBVERSE. THE RUMFORD MEDAL. 2.—REVERSE.

NEW-YEAR'S EVE IN IRELAND.—[SEE PAGE 109.]

Academy, administering Count Rumford's trust, now, by the hands of its presiding officer, presents to you these honorable testimonials of its high appreciation of what you have done. And the Fellows here assembled join with me, I am sure, in most sincere and hearty wishes that you may long enjoy this and similar distinctions, along with more material rewards of your genius and skill—hoping also that there may still be fruitful in yet other inventions, redounding to your honor and advantage, and to the promotion of the good of mankind.

MR. COMLEIG accepted the medals, and replied as follows:

Mr. President:

Competitive honors are the reward of effort, stimulated by rivalry and ambition. But this honor comes from gentlemen who won the whole field of science and art, and of deliberate council make their awards after years of study and consideration. In consideration I add the historical associations connected with the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and the scientific fame of its members; and I receive this testimonial with grateful acknowledgment of a distinguished honor.

AERIAL VOYAGES.

A NUMBER of French and English artists went up in balloons last year to take bird's-eye views of the world. If they didn't go quite up to the moon, they went nearer to our planetary neighbor than any living creature had gone before; and from that celestial height obtained most extensive panoramas of the various countries of Europe. This pursuit of "high art" was not unattended with dangers and perilous adventures, such as the one represented by the artist on this page. In this instance, MR. GLAISHER, Director of the Meteorological Observatory of Greenwich, England, with a companion named COXWELL, ascended to an elevation of more than 34,000 feet above the level of the sea, and higher than the loftiest mountain peak of the globe. From this point the panoramic view of the country spread out beneath them was truly magnificent; but the cold was intense, the air almost too thin for respiration; and MR. GLAISHER, while engaged in making observations, suddenly fainted and became insensible. MR. COXWELL endeavored to open the throttle-valve, in order to descend, but the valve-cord had become so entangled that this was impossible. Perceiving but one way to preserve his life and that of his companion, the daring aeronaut climbed up to where he could reach and open the valve. His movement caused the balloon to oscillate in the most frightful manner, and while in tremendous circles through the attenuated atmosphere. Had his benumbed hands slipped on the cords to which he clung, he must have been precipitated headlong downward through the enormous gulf of space, while the balloon, freed from his weight, would have shot up into a still rarer atmosphere, where it must have burst. Fortunately his strong brain withstood the delirium of that tremendous waltz with the balloon, and his life and that of his companion were saved.

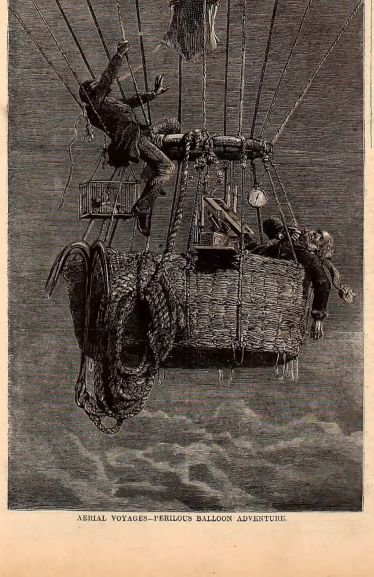
THOMAS C. DURANT.

Our second illustration exhibits the singular appearance of the white mountains of cloud beheld, from the balloon called L'Entreprenant, by M. W. DE FONVILLE, in his second ascent, on March 22, 1868, from LA VILLETTE, near PARIS. They looked quite solid, like a snow-covered range of the Alps viewed from the Gœmer or the Breithorn; and their aspect is well represented by the engraving.

THOMAS C. DURANT.

THOMAS CLARK DURANT, whose portrait we give on this page, has just reached the age of fifty, having been born at Lee, Massachusetts, on the 6th of February, 1820. He was educated as a physician, and took his degree, but without going into practice betook himself early to other pursuits. He has been largely interested in the construction of important railroads in this country, especially in the West, and was the leading spirit in pushing the Pacific Railroad to completion, holding much the same relation to that important enterprise as M. LESSEPS holds to the Suez Canal. When the last tie was laid he retired from the management of the road, and is now devoting his energies to the construction of a railway through the Northern Wilderness, from Saratoga to Ogdensburg.

MR. DURANT has at times taken a leading part in important stock speculations in Wall Street, where he is known as a bold, far-seeing, and successful operator. Of late, however, he has paid but little attention to stocks. He is a gentleman of large means, liberal style of living, and is known among yachtsmen as the owner of the Idler, a yacht which has won several races in the contests of the squadron. Among all who know him he has a high reputation for business probity, cultivated taste, and genial liberality, and the social qualities that win respect and attract friends.



AERIAL VOYAGES—PERILOUS BALLOON ADVENTURE.

AERIAL VOYAGES—CLOUD RANGES SEEN FROM A BALLOON.

NEW-YEAR'S EVE IN IRELAND.

THE jolly scene depicted on page 108 is a gathering of Irish peasants, assembled in a snug old cabin to dance the New Year in in their own merry-hearted way. It is a poor place where they hold their revelry. By day the pigs whine and grunt about the floor, and make slashing forays in search of potato-skins. The earth floor is worn into holes, where the children sail ships in the rain-water that drips from the roof. There are old hats stuffed in the broken windows; and in every nook and corner are seen evidences of improvidence, idleness, and carelessness. Nevertheless, happiness has not entirely deserted the old cabin. To-night all troubles are forgotten—the absentee landlord, the hard, grasping agent, the bad times, the blighted harvest—and every one is enjoying himself, the old people at cards, and the young folks courting or dancing.

There is no evening to be called an evening in Ireland without a fight; and perhaps an hour or two later, when the priest has arrived to take charge of the ceremonies, and the whisky has circulated freely in glasses, egg-shells, and scooped potatoes, a hasty blow or word from some jealous lover may bring on the fun. When the shillalahs have had their turn the priest will set them quiet in a moment. "Why, you murtherers," he'll bawl, "you misguided Antinomian Episcopalians, you vile Mohammedan impostors, are you going to commit murther? Down with your sticks, or I'll turn you into stocks and stones where you stand, and make world's wonders of you as long as you live and breathe!" Then peace will descend upon the cabin, and all will gather about the supper-table, at which his reverence will preside. The mirth may be boisterous at these revels, the appointments rough, the guests humble; but you will have to travel far before you hear sharper wit, or find more real enjoyment.

THE SARDINE FISHERY AT NANTES.

SARDINES are the young of the pilchard (Clupea pilchardus). They get the name of sardines from having been formerly caught in great quantities at the island of Sardinia. They are still largely taken in the Mediterranean, but for export trade chiefly off the western coast of France. The bait is of prepared cod-roe, called rogue, and the sardines are inclosed in fine-meshed nets, when they come to the surface to eat the rogue. They are beheaded, pressed into tins, covered with oil, and soldered up. Sham sardines are largely sold, preserved and packed like the real ones. These are sprats, young herrings, or any young fish with sufficient resemblance to a sardine to pass muster. It is very difficult, when these so-called sardines are headless and pressed flat in oil, to tell them from the real ones.

The fishing begins at the end of MAY, and finishes toward the early part of NOVEMBER. The fish make their appearance in the Bay of Biscay toward Les Sables d'Olonne, Yendée, and come up as far as Douarnenez, Bretagne, and remain between those places all summer. They are not to be found above or below those places. The sardines when they first appear are small, and begin to become larger in July. However, they generally remain small at Les Sables d'Olonnez, and much too large at Douarnenez.

From two to three thousand boats, with five men in each, are employed in the fishery. The fishing takes place from three to twenty miles from the coast. The sardines are baited with fish spawn, called rogue, coming generally from Norway, in barrels of about 135 kilos. During the season of the fishing from 28,000 to 30,000 barrels of this spawn are employed.

As soon as the sardines are landed they are prepared, boiled in salad oil, and put into tin boxes, then recovered with fresh oil, and soldered up.

The greatest activity is necessary in the preparation to obtain the good qualities that depend particularly on the freshness of the fish, and the choice of good olive-oil is most essential. The less the sardines are touched the better they are. This is the reason how much handling why the sardines without bones have been soon discredited.

The quantity prepared every year, under favorable circumstances, is about 25,000,000 canisters of half and quarter kilos, and half ones. The canisters are included in this calculation. The quantity prepared at four fishing-places on the coast of Bretagne, according to the good or bad circumstances of the fishing, from 1,700,000 to 2,000,000 half canisters of the largest size.

GEORGE PEABODY.

"Write him as one who loved his fellow-men."

PLACE among the illustrious dead!
Lo, a hero comes!
Not with trump of martial tread:
Not with muffled drums;
But a nation's sons, to-day,
Speak a good man passed away.

Much of glittering gold he gained,
Earth's most sought-for treasure;
Not to build a vaunted name—
Not for selfish pleasure:
But to cast, with liberal hand,
Richest gifts throughout the land.

Many a pleasant home he reared
And the poor man's blessing,
Like a watered, blowed him,
With a mute caressing;
Wafted such to heaven in prayer,
Found his name acceptance there!

Famine, gaunt, forsook the path,
From his steps retreating:
Saddest faces smiling grew
At his kindly greeting;
For he passed not coldly by,
With proud look and careless eye.

So his life has sweetly passed.
Fellow-men befriending;
Now he leaves it with the rest
That shall know no ending:
Heaven's approving smile is won,
And the Master says, "Well-done!"

SILVER.

SILVER is the most useful, if not the most valuable, of the precious metals; and if it is not invested with the same marvelous and romantic interest as its companion, gold, there is still much that is interesting about its history and its manufacture.

Silver has a specific gravity of 10.50; it is less hard than gold, but harder than copper, and in a pure state may easily be cut with a knife. In ductility and malleability, it can be wrought out into a leaf eighteen of an inch in thickness; while in tenacity it surpasses its more valuable rival, a wire one-twelfth of an inch in diameter capable of supporting a weight of nearly 300 pounds. One of the most important characteristics of silver, however, is that it reflects light and heat more completely than any other metal. The rays of the sun concentrated by the most powerful burning-glass, which would easily melt gold or platinum, strike powerless upon the highly-polished surface of a silver object. They are reflected, not absorbed, and the metal remains unaffected by the heat. Another quality of this quality of silver is its power of retaining heat; whence its use for the manufacture of teapots, coffee-pots, and other vessels for holding liquids which are required to be kept as hot as possible.

Silver has been esteemed as one of the precious metals from the earliest times, and would seem to have been and as a medium of exchange even before gold. We read that Abraham purchased the field of Ephron for four hundred shekels of silver, and Joseph was sold for forty pieces of the same metal. It is noteworthy, also, that the Hebrew word for silver has exactly the signification of the modern French word argent—meaning either "silver" or "money." Gold, however, was certainly not coined until it had been used for many hundred years as a medium of exchange. According to Herodotus, money was first stamped or coined by the Lydians, about 1000 years before the Christian era.

The value of silver, as compared with that of gold, has varied greatly at different periods. M. Faucher in 1857 stated that originally in most some countries, was worth quite as much, if not more, than gold. In the third century B.C. there was only worth six times as much as silver; and in some ancient Egyptian laws we find the relative values of the metals fixed at no more than 10 to one. The immense amount of silver obtained from Asia, Greece, and Spain after the rise of the Empire caused its value to be much depreciated; but the deficiency of skill in working the ores, and the great demand for the metal for ornamental purposes in the sixteenth century, caused its value to rise to one-sixth or one-fifth of gold. During the last hundred and fifty years its value has been pretty constant at one-fifteenth of the value of gold.

The chief silver-producing countries of antiquity were Nubia, Ethiopia, and parts of Greece; but the wealth of the Spanish mines was developed at a very early period, and was the principal support of the extensive commerce so long carried on by the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and Romans. A very valuable mine was opened by Hannibal himself in the Sierra Morena. The Spaniards continued to supply Europe from their native mines until the discovery of the New World opened to them a fresh field for enterprise in the golden realms of South America.

The celebrated mines of Potosi, in Peru, were for a long time unrivaled, but they have fallen off greatly in productiveness of late years; and owing to the heavy government dues in Peru and Bolivia, and the rude and inaccessible manner in which the silver is found, the supply has fallen off to a degree that, taken on two-thirds alone exports annually more than 2,000,000 pounds, only 600,000 pounds are exported from Peru, and the product of Mexico amounts to about 150,000 pounds; Austria, 90,000 pounds; and Great Britain, 70,000 pounds. Silver, like gold, is also found in small quantities in almost every part of the world; but it should be remarked that in Europe it is very rarely found in a pure state, but chiefly combined with lead, from which it is separated by a very ingenious process called cupellation. Even in Mexico the ore is usually found in such an impure state as to render it necessary to be pulverized and separated. It is separated from its impurities in two ways. In the first method the ore is crushed to powder in a mill, and then separated in the usual process of mercury and common salt. In the second method the silver is combined with lead by fusion, and afterward separated by cupellation. In this process the lead containing the silver is roasted in small cavities, or cupels, made of bone ashes. These cupels have the property of absorbing the oxyds of lead, and which are affected by the oxygen, and holding those that will not oxydize. A current of air is made to pass over the metal when in a state of fusion, and the lead, being oxydized by the oxygen, is absorbed into the cupel. What the cupel will not absorb, or refuse, is left absorbed, the cupel is withdrawn from the furnace, and its contents are pure silver.

The silver-mines of Europe, at all times held in the highest esteem among civilized nations; but it remained for a wonderful impetus to be given to the triumph of the Christian religion, under Constantine, if the early part of the fourth century. Immediately we find silver used in decorating the Christian churches, especially at Rome, with figures, shrines, and ornaments of silver, and occasionally of gold; and when numerous vessels, crosiers, and crosses still remain to bear witness to the liberality and artistic taste of the early converts. France soon began to take a lead in the beauty of her works in silver; and Eloy, a celebrated worker in the precious metals, was made a bishop by Dagobert I., and subsequently canonized. He did not confine his art after his consecration, and his example was followed by many of the French bishops. A taste for Saint Eloy's work was thus established, and which continued to flourish in the monasteries and religious houses during the centuries of barbarism. The calamities which befell Italy during the seventh and eighth centuries checked the progress of the arts, and the total demolition of the temporal power of the popes by Charlemagne, the pontiffs sought to enrich their churches to their former splendor. Leo III. is said to have carried no less than 300,000 ounces of silver to his new St. Peter's, then erected, to Rome. The influence of Byzantine civilization had a marked effect upon the silver work of the eleventh century, and in the early progress to the art. Sugar, the minister of Louis le Gros, and Theophilus, a monk of the 12th century, having treatise on almost all the industrial arts of his time) kept up the old glory of France during the dark centuries; but it was not till the revival of the Italians once more took the lead in Europe. Their architecture, and the great works of their painters and sculptors, and the silver-smith's art rose in consequence to a high state of perfection. It would be out of place, in an article like this, to give a list of the great silver-workers of the Middle Ages; but Benvenuto Cellini was the man as Benvenuto Cellini without a word. This great artist came into the world with the sixteenth century; he spent some years in the service of the court of Francis I.; but executed most of his wonderful works in his native city of Florence. Many of his productions have been preserved, by their extreme beauty, from the fate of almost all ancient silver-work, that of being the gems of many a rich collection. Cellini also, in the sixteenth century, threw light upon the art he cultivated, and died while writing his autobiography, in 1572. Previous to the fourteenth century there was but little silver-work executed in the laity—almost all the plate being in the possession of the clergy, or used for ecclesiastical purposes. In the luxurious days of Richard II., in England, however, plate began to be considered a necessary article in the rich man's house. It seldom remained long in their possession; for there were no bankers in those days, nor any way of investing money except in land, so that a sudden call came to be made upon a great lord, who only recovered his plate by the sale of a castle or by the ransom of a prisoner. Owing to this state of things, and to the dissolutions of the monasteries, and the civil wars of the seventeenth century, very little plate was accumulated in the possession of the laity. The silver-work of the reign of Elizabeth, and flourished during the palmy days of the cavaliers, only to be put down as an abomination by the rude Puritans of the Commonwealth.

CHAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hegeman's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

IT IS SURPRISING to see our hair blossoming for the green too early. Many young women feel this affliction, and it is even a greater deformity to them than to old people. Ward's Vegetable Oil will restore the hair sometimes, but its original color always.—[Com.]

Why will ye Doubt?

EARTHLY BLESSINGS.

THE human system, the most perfect of all the works of the Creator, is so constituted that, to be entirely healthy, it must throw off the waste, worn-out, and poisonous matter in the blood, or that it takes on new life from our food and drink. The food is assimilated, and passes into nourishing and healthy blood, principally through the offices of the stomach, liver, and bowels. If these organs are not kept in perfect order by the liver, lungs, and kidneys; but all medical men have heretofore failed to recognize the vast importance of the liver as a healthy and easy-acting organ. The most learned Egyptian physiologists, who have devoted more upon actual experiments, only state that the amount of Bile which should be manufactured by the liver is very small, and the intestines each day is two and one-half pounds. All persons intended to know this fact, and the experiments to prove it, may see a resume of these facts in Professor Wilson's Anatomy.

Remember one thing more: The bile is somewhat like the blood in its quality of the bowels, as bile heretofore, being the cause of nearly all the bile is mostly made up of the worn-out particles of blood—bilious, acrid, and injurious matters. If the liver does not make this bile, and pour it into the intestines daily, it remains in the blood as a poison. It poisons the blood itself, and circulates, as irritating and poisonous matter in the blood, to every organ in the system.

The blood, poisoned with the daily-accumulated excess of bile, returns from the liver to the heart, and the nerves of the system are fed.

Just so with the Lungs. The bile poisoned blood sent from the right side of the heart circle of the heart to the lower cavity, and thence directly to the lungs, to be purified by the oxygen contained in the air we breathe. It is poisoned and contaminated by the acrid carbonic acid gas, and the blood, instead of receiving the carbonic acid gas, and the blood, instead of receiving the exhalations harmless of the blood, because they are poisoned. Hence Consumption, which is the real scrofula—so defined and proved by Lenox and others—is the result.

Catarrh of the head and throat, Dyspepsia, Consumption, Pneumonia, Bronchitis, Liver and Kidney Disease, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Scrofula, Piles, Epileptic Fits, Headache, Neuralgia, Female Weakness, Dropsies, Dropsy, Cancers, and very many other diseases, are caused by Impure Blood and Liver.

SYMPTOMS OF LIVER COMPLAINT, AND OF SOME OF THOSE DISEASES PRODUCED BY HER COMPLAINT.

A sallow or yellow color of the skin, or yellowish-brown spots on the face; sour stomach; pain in the belly; dullness and drowsiness, with frequent headache, bitter or bad taste in the mouth; bad breath; fever; want of appetite; coated tongue; pain in the heart; in many cases a dry, tickling cough, with sore throat; sometimes mistaken for consumption; a feeling of weariness; a feeling sometimes in the throat; sickness and vomiting, dizziness, heaviness, or a feeling of fullness about the stomach and pain, which is often attended with gnawing and tenderness; suppressed perspiration; in the head, forehead, and about the shoulders; cold pains and soreness through the body; with many other symptoms of the bowels, sometimes with frequent attacks of diarrhœa; pales, flatulence, worm-consumption, and in the extreme, a kind of blood in the head, with symptoms of apoplexy; numbness of the body, especially the limbs; cold chills, alternating with hot flushes; female weakness and irregularities, with other diseases, too numerous to mention, generally perhaps fatal.

THE WILLING WITNESSES.

There is presented below a selection of a few from the many willing witnesses who testify to the work wrought. "Discoveries" who have expressed, in glowing and heartfelt terms, their wish to offer testimony in behalf of my system of practice and uniform success in mastering the most difficult forms of chronic disease, by faulty mechanical and chemical action of that great controlling organ, the liver.

Space does not allow of these "noble offerings to Æsculapius" being published in full, many have been in full; but the "despondent in heart and weary in body" can peruse the entire work, free of charge, by sending me their post-office address.

The following are but a few of many of the noblest, truest, and purest men and women who have rendered their "willing testimony" to the value of my system of Life. Many of whom are now in active practice, a physician, a man of honor, and a philanthropist, a priority name and address, and I will cheerfully forward them the humble means, through the hands of a Bible Christian, of testing them. These grand testimonials are to fill in the book mentioned. Write to any of them, and they will tell you what they know. Any of them will answer all inquiries of this character.

CURED OF CATARRH AND LIVER COMPLAINT.

Rev. Joseph Cross, Pastor of Methodist Church, says: "You may refer to me at any time, and I shall be ever pleased to bear testimony to your extraordinary skill.

GOVERNOR JACOBS, OF KENTUCKY.

His Excellency Governor Jacobs, Governor of K. Jacobs, Westport, Kentucky, writes, in concluding his testimony: "I shall be pleased to receive the discussion of my poor sick wretch, racked with pain, who has been afflicted with rheumatism, quinine, iron, and like medicines, I earnestly appeal to him to try your wonderful remedies."

LIVER DISEASE WITH FEMALE DEBILITY.

Mary E. Jones, Grove L. N. Jones, Hog Island, Pickaway, Va.; writes: "May Heaven's richest blessings ever be with you, for you are indeed benefactor of his race, Professor R. L. Hamilton, M.D.

BAD QUICK CONSUMPTION.

The eminent physician and missionary, Rev. A. A. Constantine, 43 Ann Street, New York City, ends his affecting: "Help me to send you a word in your recovery, his great inheritory, and make you his agent in receipt of your valuable remedies."

CURED OF CONSUMPTION.

Rev. J. W. Hamilton, Mrs., writes: "To you with God's blessing, do I owe my worldly existence."

Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Pastor of the Fifth Street Church, 224 Broadway, New York City, adds to his epistle: "Dr. Hamilton, I commend you wisely in the testimonies you may have with acute or chronic diseases."

CHRONIC DIARRHŒA.

The eminent pulpit orator, Rev. George H. Jones, Boonton, N. J., writes me: "I wish I had the voice of seven thunders that I might proclaim the sick in the world, I would direct them to you."

PROFESSIONAL TESTIMONY AUTHORITY—RHEUMATISM.

Rev. Isaac Hugg, Pittsburgh, N.J., writes: "Under the blessings of Divine Providence, you have done great things for me."

STRONG CORROBORATION.

Rev. W. B. Jacobs, 113 Harrison Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

This widely-known clerical editor and divine writes: "I frankly express the hope that diseased humanity in every part of our land may avail themselves of Professor Hamilton's remarkable skill, and thus secure the rich blessings so kindly and freely bestowed upon all."

DYSPEPSIA, WITH HEART DIFFICULTY.

Mrs. Josephine S. Hatch, Provincetown, Mass., writes:

"My friends say to me, 'He must be more than man who has done this.'"

SALT-RHEUM AND SCROFULA.

"It is your medicines that have accomplished my cure of salt-rheum and scrofula."

MRS. CHARLOTTE ROGERS,
Cortlandt Centre, Kent Co., Mich.

CURE OF ASTHMA.

"Any letter of inquiry I will cheerfully answer."

REV. SOLON LITTLE, Alton, N. Y.

RHEUMATISM.—A GREAT CURE.

"In one month I was perfectly cured, after suffering for seven years, and with confidence say, try."

WM. H. NALLS, Oliopolis, Venango Co., Pa.

EPILEPTIC FITS.

John S. Sharp, Rockhart, Ill., says: "I wish you to publish the cure of my wife for and sent."

ANOTHER CURE OF ASTHMA.

Miss A. Kelderhouse, Guilderland, N. Y., remarks: "And if any doubt the truth of my cure, you may refer them to me, and I will gladly testify."

DISEASE OF THE BOWELS.

Rev. Augustus Alvord, Bridgeport, Conn., writes also: "I deem it a duty and a pleasure to state the facts of my case which speed disease, which lasted for years."

GIVES STRENGTH.

"I pronounce myself well. I have done more hard labor in the last two months than have in thirty years."

SAMUEL CRITES, Dakota City, Neb.

A FEW WORDS MORE.

Dear reader, it is useless to try Ayenbuy; for these results I HAVE BEEN CURED, and I am a thousand of others, and in gratitude have signified their desire to communicate with you, or at once commence according all Love, Long, and Blood Income. Write to me, and I will tell you how I was cured, and at once, and will give you the benefit of my large experience. Below are a few out of many that have been cured by my remarkable CURES." I do this to give the skeptical unbeliever the benefit of my refinished and remarkable skill. THE PROOFS ARE OFFERED; weigh them, and act according to your judgment.

Rev. Washington Modarie, Sydney, Ohio; Rev. A. C. Baumgardner, Bloomville, Huron, Ohio; Rev. Thomas, Galion, O.; Mrs. L. M. Richardson, Cleburne, Texas; Joseph and Margaret Hoover, Mount Joy, Lancaster county, Penn.; Vanetine, Dorcester, Sydney; D. W. Russell, 12 Bowdoin Square, Boston; Rev. Solomon Sayre, New York Mills, Oneida Co.; C. Porter, Millwood, Mo.; J. A. Yoder, Canton, Ohio; Rev. Thomas Hamilton, Rockford, Ill.; Mrs. P. S. Hatch, Provincetown, Mass.; Rev. S. J. F. Burnett, Pacolet Depot, S. C.; Emily W. Bates, Hartford, Conn.; L. E. Fish, Co. A, 2d Cav., Fort A. Pickett, Req., Jacksonville, Fla.; Louisa O. Cobb, Wellington, Ohio; Mrs. Amanda Priscilla, Alton, N. J.; Hughes, Esq., Cottawassa, N.Y.; Francis E. Wood, Bridgeport, Conn.; Rev. W. Y.; Mrs. R. A. Pinkerton, Wis.; Mrs. M. E. Mitchell, Jersey Shore, Pa.; J. H. Hamilton, Esq., Rockford, Ill.; Rev. Augustus Alvord, Neb.; H. Heuitin, Esq., Atlanta, Ga.; J. M. Vanzyl, Esq., Ohio; Rev. Dr. Boston, Baltimore; and Mrs. Walker, Esq., Wellington, Iowa; P. Schermerhorn, Esq., Ohio; Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Rockford, Ill.; Rev. J. W. Cobb, Rockford, Coatesville, Pa.; Mrs. Mary E. Jones, Grove L. N. Jones, Hog Island, Pickaway, Va.; Mrs. Wicks, Wormsley, Mo.; Mrs. Lock Haven, Pa.; Mrs. Samuel Sawyer, Grovetown, Georgia; Thomas Hall, Esq., Mo. and Mrs. Mary H. Garrett, Kansas City, Mo.; Benj. Berry, Esq., Mattoon, Ill.; Rev. J. Bayless Hughes, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; Wm. B. Betts, Esq., Norwalk, Conn.; S. S. Parkhurst, Esq., Ohio; Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Rockford, Ill.; Mollie A. Brooks, West Point, Ga.; Mrs. S. E. Black-stock, Columbus, O.; C. Mrs. A. L. Hamilton, Rockford, Mo.; H. Houghton, La Grange, Wis.; Julia Sattler, Ohio.

CAUTION!

I hereby caution the public against certain persons who have taken advantage of my extensive reputation and the wonderful cures of my remedies, and are trifling off upon the afflicted worthless trash of various kinds, pretending to be remedies compounded or prepared by R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D. For the benefit of the public I will state that I have NO AGENTS, AND PREPARE NO OFFER FOR SALE IN ANY MANNER, SHAPE, OR FORM, OF MY REMEDIES, EXCEPT AT MY OFFICE, 224 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY. BEWARE OF ALL OTHER SPURIOUS COUNTERFEITS, AND I PRONOUNCE ALL SUCH WORTHLESS AND A FRAUD. There are no agents, do as at the country. The only remedies I compound, or authorize to be sold, are those which I prepare at my office, 224 Broadway, daily, with my own hands, at No. 546 Broadway, New York City.

Write to Me, all Ye Afflicted.

All I wish to know in any case is the most prominent symptoms; and they can just as well be written to me in plain English, and I can read them as clearly as though the patient were present.

In addition to the many testimonials referred to, or with any form of chronic disease, can write me at once, and I will send them, free of charge, a pamphlet of the same fully describing my system; and, whether you can or can not be saved. To do so, I will tell you in your family physician, and if he is honorable, he will have saved thousands after all hope had fled and the grave was ready to close over them. Write to me, and Providence will not withhold the noble means for the restoration and the happiness of your family and friends.

Also, if you expect a full and specific reply to your letter, always enclose ten cents. Postage must be paid to letters from all persons requesting medical advice for advice, or any other purpose, must enclose ten cents. Don't write me unless you do so, as I have found that, having so many letters every day, it consumes time.

I attend to no correspondence except with the afflicted public may rely upon my responsibility, and that they will be dealt with justly and honorably.

ONE WORD MORE, DEAR READER, NOTICE.

The full history of all the above cases (besides many others), and full details of diseases of the liver, may safe, and positive treatment for all chronic complaints, Topographical Description of the Human Body, Specific treatises—a valuable work for every family—Dr. Hall's Diary, by giving your name and post-office address.

All letters must be addressed thus:

R. LEONIDAS HAMILTON, M.D.,

No. 546 BROADWAY,

Care of Post-Office Box No. 4085, New York.

The number of the Post-Office Box must be put on each letter to insure safety.

LAST CALL.—7000 subscribers in one month. NOW IS YOUR TIME. You have only 100,000 TO SECURITY OFF." We have only 300 January numbers left. You can secure all the numbers of "SPEAR QUICK," Number for 1870 if you subscribe AT ONCE. DO NOT DELAY. For only 10 cents you get the "Banner" a whole year, the superb engraving "Evangeline," 13 by 19 feet, thrown in. Thousands subscribe weekly. You can now secure all the numbers for 1870 if you SPEAR QUICK. Recollect, we will refund your money if you are disappointed. Will you try it? It will save you MONEY. 400 pages of splendid reading matter, illustrated pages, Letter-size paper a whole year, and superb steel plate, all for only 10 cents. Now is the time. Don't delay. Specimens, 6 cents. 10 cents and your name to

SPEAR & ANGELL & BANNER COMPANY,
Ridgefield, N. H.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have just received

ELEGANT NOVELTIES IN

BALL AND STREET DRESSES,

in Silk, Satin, Tarletan, and Swiss Muslin.

Also,

10 Dresses, each different, of

EXTRA RICH GLACE DE CHAMBERYS,

the

MOST ELEGANT AND COSTLY YET IMPORTED.

Five cases

ALEXANDRE'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES,

in all the choice styles,

INCLUDING THE SEAMLESS GLOVE, and in selected colors.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

will continue to offer

EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS

in styles and prices of every description of

DRESS GOODS,

from

PRINTED MOUSSELINE DELAINES, finest quality, 12½c. per yard,

to the

RICHEST AND MOST COSTLY SILKS,

POPLINS, EPINGLINES, &c.

Prices largely reduced.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

BOOSEY & CO.'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A new Catalogue ready, free on application. Six Guess, Six Songs, Opera, and Operatic Choruses, for the use of Choral Societies, 5 cents each. THE BALLAD SINGER.—20 new songs by Clarke and the best composers, 5 cents each. THE MUSICAL CABINET.—A complete library of musical literature, selected and Secular, Vocal and Instrumental, in books of 90 cents each. THE CHEAPEST MUSIC.—A new and extensive series of popular music, 16 pages each, containing OVERTURES AND MASSES, 20 cents each. TUTORS AND STUDIES, for all instruments, 50 cents each. VIOLIN LIBRARY, 40 books, 50 cents each. FLUTE LIBRARY, 13 books, 30 cents each. CHORAL Services, 25 cents each. Organ and Cabinet Organ Music, in Volumes, $1 to $3 each. Complete Operas, with words and music, Operas as Piano-forte Duets, Music for Bands, &c., &c. Send for catalogues, free, entire and perfectly satisfactory in shape."—New York Times. To be had of all music and book sellers.

BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N.Y.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT

BRACED WEB SAW.

PATENT GROOVE.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON SAW MANUFACTURING CO., 50 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six first-class makers, at extraordinarily low prices for Cash during this month, or will take from one to 24 monthly installments. Pianos to let, and rent money applied if purchased. New 7-Octave Pianos for $105 and upwards. Second-hand Pianos for $45 and upward, for cash.

FOR SALE.—Wilcox & White Cabinet Organ, Two-Rank Compass, Walnut Case, Suitable for Church or Parlor. Has been used but little, and is in perfect order. Price, $100. Address Box 1,000, Post-Office, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE WILCOX & WHITE ORGAN COMPANY'S Manufactory is now removed to their new and commodious building, Nos. 831 and 833 Broadway, corner of Eleventh Street, New York.

SAVE MONEY.—Harmless and elegant. Save your Hair. Dr. McLane's Prescriptions and Recipes for Hair Restoring, Hair Dyeing, Hair Curling, Hair Cutting, Shaving Cream, to remove pimples, freckles, moth patches, quickly and safely; to restore gray whiskers, hair, or brows to the whiskers, &c., to grow in three weeks to 50 feet hair per month and beard; and other various Medicinal Prescriptions, &c. Any Druggist can compound. Each recipe, printed on fine paper, 25 cts. Address Dr. C. F. McLANE, Box 2563, Buffalo, N.Y.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination, or Science of the Soul, as applied to Love, Courtship, &c. 400 pp., Cloth. By Herbert Hamilton, B.A. A curious book for inquisitive people. It contains numerous instructions to acquire this wonderful power over men or women, and also how to avoid it. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of 50 cents. Address T. W. EVANS, 41 South Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A HAND-BOOK of PRACTICAL TELEGRAPHY. By R. S. Culley, Chief Operator. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray Street, New York.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL—1870. Vol. 50. New Series. $3 a year; 25 cts. a No. Specimens, 20 cts. Set full of premiums. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

Jan. and Feb. Nos. now ready.

THE WIDE WORLD. Cost Proof Book Keys & Check Lists. Patent Steel Stamps. Agents Wanted. Write Brooks, Boston.

$20. $25.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

in denominations of $1000 and $500, coupons or registered, payable in gold per cent. per annum, payable 1st February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold. Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $13,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. This line, connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, will make a short and through route to California.

The Company have a Capital Stock

of..... $10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress

of 1,000,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at..... 4,000,000

Its Mortgage Bonds are..... 1,500,000

Total..... $15,500,000

Length of Road, 211 miles. Price 97½, and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. These bonds, being so well secured, and fulfilling a large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,
No. 54 Pine Street, New York.
TANNER & CO., Bankers,
No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

Worth double the amount of subscription to any Farmer.*

The Albony, N. Y., COUNTRY GENTLEMAN says this of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

and we invite you to get a good bargain by sending for a sample copy.

Terms: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year. Send stamp for specimen copy. Address

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

BEAR, DEER, Wild Cat, Beaver, Opossum, Otter, Mink, Marten, &c., &c. You can buy, sell, or exchange ANY and ALL Wild Animals. Also, tan and cure hides and furs. Send 10 cents for Journal. It is the only cheap and reliable book. "The Hunter's Guide." Only 16 cents, mailed. Address (now or never)

HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, you can do as fine printing, business or pleasing much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about the size of presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens of type, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 25 Murray Street, New York.

For Family use, simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking free. Address HECKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's Lock-Stitch Sewing Machine.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well-established character, can find handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Press, $3; Size, 2½ by 4 inches, $20, $30. Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO.,

18 Spring St., Springfield, Mass.

BRILLIANT and POWERFUL, for Field, Opera, and General Purposes. Catalogues sent by return mail.

SEMMONS, Optician,
687 Broadway, N.Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $75 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

H. H. H.—Hunter's Helps to Health, by letter, 10 Games with Cards—Checkers, the History of the Turf, Curious Questions, sent by mail for One Dollar. D. ECKLEY HUNTER, 1427 Penn Square, Philadelphia.

THE MAGIC EGG.—Agents can realize $10 per day. Sample by mail, 25 cents. Circulars free. Sample Egg and terms mailed on receipt of 15 cents. Address W. EARLE & CO., Hartford, Conn.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

WATCH Free! and $30 a day sure. No humbug. Don't buy cheap, worthless jewelry. Invested in advance. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

EMPLOYMENT.—$36 a month with Stencil Dies. Sample free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Crosbie).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and for time to gold once costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $200 gold cases. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled lever, equaling in appearance a $300 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed, and satisfaction certificate. All our watches sent by express, and made at Chester, Pa. Price, $15 to $25. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the cost.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Collins Metal is very fine.—N. Y. Times.

Call and see them at C. E. Collins & Co.'s, or inclose stamp for illustrated circular.—N. Y. Times.

The Collins Metal is very fine.—N. Y. Times.

We have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

Collins's Metal Watches are very fine.—N. Y. Times.

Collins's Metal Watches are known in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON: or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, A.M., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial South America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

2.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Bound to the Wheel," "Martin Pole," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

4.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By WILLIAM GODWIN, Esq., Author of "St. Leon," "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 16mo, Paper, 37 cents.

5.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maccii Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Menæchmi. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By C. S. HARRINGTON, A.M., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

6.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES A. DANA. With an Introduction, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron. By HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. Paper, 15 cents.

7.

THE MEMOIRS OF LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village," Related in a Selection of Her Letters to Her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. By ALARIC A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

8.

ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Pipp's Colors," "Denis Donne," "Paying for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Rev. LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Square 12mo, Cloth, from Designs by Dore. Bevelled Edges, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

10.

KITTY. A Novel. By M. BETHAM EDWARDS, Author of "Dotheboys Hall," "Kept with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 210 elegant Illustrations. Square 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

12.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introductions and Commentaries. By THEODORE MARTIN. Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Longo. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

13.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By CHARLES F. COMFORT, Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Allegheny College, Pittsburgh, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

14.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GRANT WILSON, Author of "The Centennial Year in Dependency," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Story of the Thousand Isles," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

15.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misfortunes of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

16.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. With Valuable Additions from Recent Sources. Revised, Assistant Secretary and Librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, and Author of "Words and their Uses," &c. Royal 8vo, Sheep, $6 00; Half Russia, $8 00.

17.

MY EVENTS DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JOSEPH MCCANDLESS, Author of "The Wheeldale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

18.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 85 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Bevelled Edges, $3 50.

19.

SCHOOL AND HOME READING. By EDWARD YATES, Author of "Rising the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

20.

LOST AND FOUND. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries and Adventures in Equatorial Africa," "Wild Life under the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Golden Country," &c. With numerous Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

21.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

22.

A BRIGADE ON HORSEBACK; or, A Country Frolic. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Carlyon's Year," "Pound Dark," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its columns are the best picture of the political and social interest. The best artists in the country are constantly employed in the departments of Illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions. The facilities for obtaining the earliest intelligence and the most reliable and illustrated accounts which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a HARPER'S PERIODICAL.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most attractive features. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 675, for November 20, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S WEEKLY is sure to become a regular subscriber.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid in the history of American literature. Its original features, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper published. Its Fashion Department is under the publishers of the Berlin and Paris publications, and its Fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with the appearance in Berlin and Paris.

The Literary Matter in the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No pains or expense will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has already achieved, and which is so well deserved.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Fortieth Volume. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to the superior excellence of its artistic and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical arts, and upon the topics of the current topics; and to the variety and interest of its Tales, Essays, Poems, Literary Criticisms, and Record of the New Books. Edited, viz., the Monthly Record of Current Events, and the comments upon which the past success of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will still be maintained, and its leading characteristic; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even the present reputation.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the simple space in the columns of the Publishers' Circular from its first fifty of all the topics embraced in their plan.

The Publishers, in announcing the commencement and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been so liberally and so generously bestowed in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, ONE YEAR..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, ONE YEAR..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, ONE YEAR..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, to be paid at the office where received; WEEKLY, twenty cents a year; BAZAR, twenty cents a year. Subscribers in Canada must add the Canada postage, and the Postage to all Foreign Countries must be accompanied with the extra postage required by the Mail Laws of the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to receive the Number current at the time of receipt of order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and the new address must be given. It is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Remittances should be by mail, or Post-Office Order payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred. In case neither can be procured, the money will be sent at risk of the publishers.

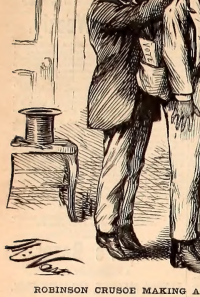
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $55—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Page, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Inside Page; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

ADDRESS HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



ROBINSON CRUSOE MAKING A MAN OF HIS FRIDAY.

INDIAN CHIEF. "Mr. President, we call here to-day to offer our fealty to you as our recognized Guardian and Ward, and to pray you, Sir, to continue our Good Friend and Father."

THE PRESIDENT. "You are welcome; and in reference to continuing your 'Good Father,' as you say, I must answer that I have long thought that the two nations which you represent, and all those civilized nations in the Indian Country, should be their own Wards and Good Fathers. I am of the opinion that they should become Citizens, and be entitled to all the rights of Citizens—cease to be Nations and become States."

KNOX'S GARDEN SEEDS.

Descriptive Hand-Book and Almanac for 1870.

This celebrated Annual contains 128 pages, and is the most valuable work of its kind in existence. Mailed Free on receipt of stamp.

W. W. KNOX, 137 Liberty Street, Pittsburgh.

GENUINE ORIDE GOLD

(Trade-Mark, Copyrighted.)

Hunting-Case Watches are manufactured on scientific principles. Have all the brilliancy, durability, and exact appearance of the most rare and costly decoration of Genuine Gold Watches. Balanced Conductors, Escapements, and Engravers, the most exacting of our patrons pronounce them reliable time-keepers.

Patent Levers, Full Jeweled, $35 and $36 ; Chronometer Balance, Full Jeweled, $40 to $45 each. Send C.O.D. every where. Customers allowed to examine what they order on paying for. Send for Circulars, both ways, previous to paying bill.—JOHN POGANY, Pres. Oroide Gold Watch Co., No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,

Can not be Excelled.

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED; and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, Conn. SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

OPALINE for the Teeth. Gums, & Breath.
OPALINE is reliable, efficient, and convenient.
OPALINE is sold by Druggists and dealers throughout the United States and Europe.
OPALINE is recommended by physicians & dentists. Use no other dentifrice.
Inventor and prop'r, CASE K. PEVEY, Dentist, Worcester, Mass.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York.

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,

Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine

MOSAICS,

and other

FINE JEWELRY AND SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents for J. P. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

Steinway & Sons,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

Beg to Announce

A GENERAL REDUCTION

in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Pianofortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long-felt and frequently-expressed want, by persons of moderate means, teachers, schools, &c., have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of instrument, termed

The "School" Piano.

A thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in scale, interior mechanism, and workmanship as their highest-priced 8-octave Pianos; the only difference being that the external finish and ornament is confined in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means.

At Exceedingly Moderate Prices.

STEINWAY & SONS also desire to call special attention to their new

PATENT UPRIGHT PIANOS,

with Double Iron Frame, Patent Repeating Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal effect. These are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Price-lists and Illustrated Catalogues mailed free on application.

EVERY PIANO is WARRANTED for 5 YEARS.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall, Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth St. (Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place), New York.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

CLEANS WINDOWS, MARBLE, KNIVES.

POLISHES TIN WARE, IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 311 Washington Street, New York.

Waltham Watches.

3-4 Plate, 16 and 20 Sizes.

To the manufacturers of these fine Watches the Company have devoted all the science and skill in the art at their command, and confidently claim that for fineness of finish, beauty, no less than for the greater accuracy of mechanical and scientific correctness of design and construction, these Watches are unequaled any where.

In this country the manufacture of these fine grade of Watches is not even attempted except at Waltham.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

PRACTICAL STANDARD PUBLICATIONS OF

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

191 Broadway, New York.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village Houses, with Specifications and Estimates. Post-paid, Twelve Dollars.

HARNEY'S BARNS, OUT-BUILDINGS, AND FENCES.

Just published, with designs and plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fences, Stable-fittings, and Furniture. Nearly 200 Illustrations. Fully Explained. Royal Quarto, extra. Post-paid, $2.50.

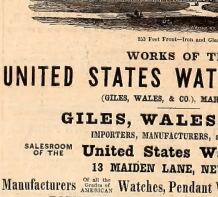
Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 150 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Suburban and Country Houses. 70 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $2.50.
Woodward's Country Homes. 60 Designs and Plans of moderate cost. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Graperies, &c. Postpaid, $1.50.
Wheeler's Rural Homes. Houses suited to Country Life. Postpaid, $2.
Wheeler's Homes for the People. For the Suburb and Country. 100 Designs. Postpaid, $2.
Jaques' Manual of the House. Postpaid, $1.50.
Rural Church Architecture. Designs for Churches. 37 plans printed in colors. Postpaid, $10.
Jaques' Manual of the Garden, Farm, and Nursery-Yard. New Edition. Quarto, cloth, gilt, $5.00.
Todd's Young Farmer's Manual. Vol. 1. The Farm and Workshop. Postpaid, $2.50.
Todd's Young Farmer's Manual. Vol. 2. The Stock-Keeping Farming Boy. Postpaid, $2.50.
Elliott's Lawn and Shade Trees. Postpaid, $1.50.
Fuller's Forest-Tree Culturist. Postpaid, $1.50.
Heusman's Grapes and Wine. Postpaid, $1.50.
Suburban Homes for New-Yorkers. 25c.
Woodward's Architecture. Designs and Plans on diffferent subjects. Quarterly, $1.00.
Books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, free.

Address GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides. Are fully licensed SHUTTLE MACHINES and sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements and the seller and user liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Grover Page.

Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.



52d Fort Frost—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,

(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,

IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,

SALESROOM OF THE

United States Watch Company,

13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

Manufacturers of Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,

BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jeweled, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position, and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Steel Springs; and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St, Chicago, Ill.

☞ WATCH No. 1089—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me from December, 1868, to January 17th, 1870; its total variation being only two seconds in the entire time.

L. E. CHITTENDEN, Late Register U. S. Treasury.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870.

WATCH No. 1064—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month.

WILLIAM H. HARVEY,
Of Derby, Snow, & Prentice, Jersey City.

WATCH No. 1178—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me twelve months: its total variation from mean time being only two seconds.

A. L. DENCH, President N. J. R.R.T. & T. Co.

WATCH No. 1281—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me four months: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.

C. HASKELL, Con. Hudson River R. R.

WATCH No. 1317—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only an average of two-thirds of a second per day.

JOHN C. COX, N. J. Central R. R.

WATCH No. 1637—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me since June, 1867: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month. HENRY SMITH.

Treas. Panama R. R., 88 Wall St.

WATCH No. 12913—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months; its total variation from mean time being only twelve seconds. GEO. LOVIS, Gen'l Eastern Agt. Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express, Virginia & Truckee R. R.

WATCH No. 1220—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months: its total variation from mean time being only eight seconds per month. Have been traveling through different parts of the country, from New York to Galveston, several times, by steamer and railroad.

E. RICE, of Wheeler & Wilson Mf'g Co., Bridgeport, N. J.

SUMMIT, PA., Feb. 26, 1869.

WATCH No. 1116—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only an average of two seconds per day.

HENRY DE LANCEY, Engineer Phila. & Erie R. R.

WATCH No. 1105—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me eleven months; its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds per month.

A. H. KING, 7 Park Place, N. Y.
Vice-Pres't Elastic Gore Boot Co.
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

☞ Call or send for Price-List.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 686.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

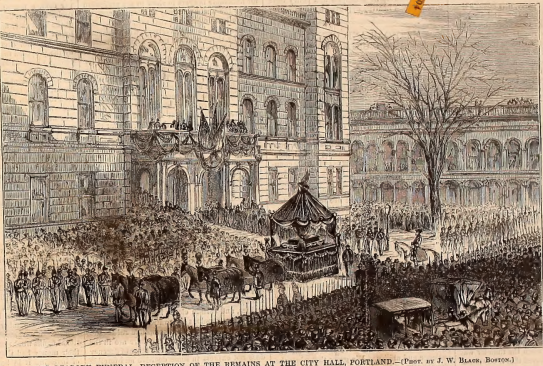
Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE ALL RIGHTS ACT

THE LAST HONORS.

THE last funeral honors to the memory of GENERAL PEABODY have been paid; and his mortal remains, attended to the grave with more pomp and ceremony than were ever before witnessed at the burial of a private citizen, now repose in their final resting-place. On Tuesday, the 1st of February, after solemn services in the City Hall of Portland, the body was taken to the funeral train, and conveyed to the town of Peabody in the funeral car of which we have already given an engraving. In the towns all along the route flags were flying at half-mast, and people from the surrounding country flocked in crowds to the stations to watch the train as it moved by.

On reaching Peabody a procession was formed, and the remains were taken to the Institute, where they lay in state until Tuesday, the 8th inst., in the Library-room, which was appropriately draped and decorated. Our engraving of the room on this page shows the position of the body on the magnificent catafalque prepared for its reception. At the end of the room is seen the portrait of QUEEN VICTORIA. Above the catafalque hang the royal flag of England and the American flag, both artistically draped with crape. At the other end of the room the bust of the deceased, that occupies the space above the door, is also draped with mourning. The catafalque is a raised dais, ten feet in length and six feet in width, covered with black velvet. From each corner rises a standard, supporting a frame-work of the same size as the base, and about six inches in width. Pendent from this are heavy black velvet hangings, artistically cut, and trimmed with a wreath of silvery stars, inclosing a large star, on each of the four sides, and heavy silver bullion fringe, with wide silver braid above it, and massive silver tassels appropriately placed. Above the hangings a neat silver moulding, on a black velvet ground-work, meets the eye. Above this is a row of silver stars, and another moulding that rises to a peak on each of the four sides, containing emblems of mourning in silver. The one on the front end has two reversed torches crossed; on the rear the hour-glass, with the wings of Time, are to be seen; and on either side a large silver star, encircled by the emblem of eternity—an endless snake. On each corner arises an elegant arabesque ornament in silver, surmounted with handsome funeral plumes. In front, on the base, is the monogram of the deceased in silver letters on a black velvet ground-work; inclosed in a laurel wreath in silver, pendent from a leaning pole, surmounted by a knot and rosette of silver. On each corner of the base are cherubs' heads with angels' wings, in silver, the whole being arranged in the ancient Grecian style, at once elegant and artistic.

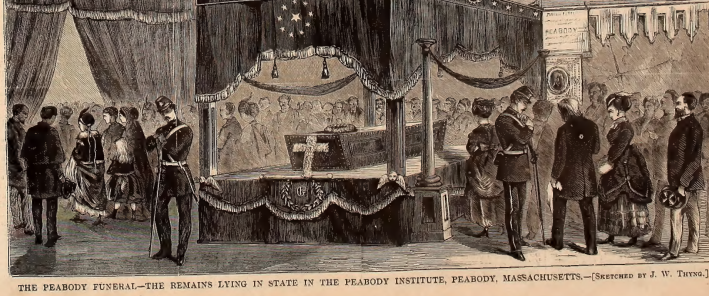


THE PEABODY FUNERAL—RECEPTION OF THE REMAINS AT THE CITY HALL, PORTLAND.—[FROM A SKETCH BY J. W. BLACK, BOSTON.]

Our engraving of the reception of the remains at the City Hall of Portland, on their being transferred from the Manet, is from a photograph by MR. J. W. BLACK, of Boston, to whom we are frequently indebted for similar favors.

CHURCH AND STATE.

MR. NAST's powerful and striking cartoon, which the reader will find on page 121, tells its own story too well to require much explanation; but it may not be out of place to set forth some of the facts that justify the artist's work. A circular recently issued by the committee of the Union League Club upon the diversion of the public moneys of New York city from the legitimate objects of political government to sectarian purposes shows that this evil, which began a short time ago under the specious form of begging from the city treasury a small sum for a deserving charity, has made such gigantic strides that it now absorbs half a million dollars annually, and that the greater part of this sum is used for the purpose of destroying our admirable system of common schools. Of this large sum a single sect receives over four hundred thousand dollars, in addition to gifts of real estate from the city government, for sectarian purposes, amounting to three million two hundred thousand dollars. The following list shows how this money was distributed last year: Roman Catholic, $412,-062 26; Protestant Episcopal, $29,335 09; Hebrew, $14,404 49; Reformed Dutch, $12,650 86;



THE PEABODY FUNERAL—THE REMAINS LYING IN STATE IN THE PEABODY INSTITUTE, PEABODY, MASSACHUSETTS.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. THING.]

Presbyterian, $8363 44; Baptist, $2760 34; Methodist Episcopal, $3073 63; German Evangelical, $3027 24; miscellaneous, $44,085 12.

Glancing over this list, we do not wonder that, as stated in a letter from Rome, the Holy Father has expressed his gratification at the progress of the Church in America, and declared that the Republic of the United States was the republic of intelligence and virtue. But it must be remembered that his standard of intelligence and virtue is not that of America, but that of Spain.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1870.

THE AMENDMENT AND THE TWO PARTIES.

ALTHOUGH the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment formally completes the reconstruction of the Union, it is by no means, as is hastily assumed by many eager Democrats, also the end of the work of the Republican party. Even if there were no other reason for the continued action of that party, it is enough that the opposition proposes no policy, and would be surely at a loss if driven to declare their principles. Since the war the Democratic party has opposed reconstruction upon whatever party prejudices which the war abolished, and it has no plan to meet the situation inevitably produced by the Fifteenth Amendment, which denounces as unconstitutional. It is a strong party, because fraud, ignorance, superstition, and passion are its allies. It has gained numerous apparent successes, because of the necessary reaction against a party long in power, because of some of the mistakes of that party, and because of the unscrupulousness of the Democratic managers. The great Democratic achievement since the war is obtaining power in the State of New York. But Governor HOFFMAN can hardly believe that he was honestly elected; nor would Mr. SWEENY, the New York Dictator of his party, probably deny that the State, honestly polled, is Republican.

In a free government parties are not only organizations to secure certain policies—they are also representatives of certain tendencies and principles in human nature and society. It is a very imperfect and mistaken view, therefore, which does not estimate both these forces. The Republican party apparently began with the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and first nominated a candidate for the Presidency in 1856. But the essential truth is, that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise plainly revealed to the people of this country who henceforth accepted liberty as the foundation of the government the real spirits, purpose, and tendency of the Democratic party. The Whigs attempted to evade the situation, and when the thunder was already angrily roaring, played that it was pleasant warmth. They naturally disappeared amidst universal contempt; and the great issue was at once joined. On the one hand were those who believed in the American principle, that the sole or chose who disbelieved. At the polls and in the field the conflict has raged until the present moment. The believers have often been successful; but the unbelievers do not relinquish the struggle. Is this the moment for the traitors to disband?

The spirit and tendency which the repeal of the Missouri Compromise revealed in the country still exist. They were expressed in the Democratic party then, and they are organized under the same name now. The specific purpose is not the same, but the spirit is unchanged. It is a party whose last National Convention, less than two years ago, was controlled by the extreme South Carolina spirit, and absolutely submitted, in the old way, while rebel chiefs, still wet with the blood of Union soldiers, dictated a virtual repudiation of the national debt of the war. Overwhelmed at the polls, despite its boldest frauds, it has resisted step by step, in Congress and in the State Legislatures, reconstruction upon equal rights; and, baffled in that wretched effort, it turns in the moment of its final defeat and exclaims, "The Republican party has fulfilled its mission, and we must now be intrusted with power!"

Upon what compulsion? What conceivable reason is there for supposing that the Democratic party, whose steady hostility to the principles of the war has the policy of reconstruction to notorious, will more wisely maintain that policy and those principles than the party whose strength lies in its latest achievement—Justice and freedom? Or why should the country suppose that a party the effects of whose undisputed supremacy may be studied in the city of New York would give it a more honest or a more orderly government? And if the party of slavery would be an ill-chosen defender of liberty, why should we expect a government of intelligence from the party of ignorance? The Democratic party is unchanged. What policy fatal to our institutions may not count upon its support?

Look at one fact. The principles of the Roman Church, which is the most absolute of religious despotisms, when applied to politics are necessarily and radically opposed to a popular system like ours. Now, it is the policy of the Roman Church to engage in politics every where. The Pope, in his Syllabus, declares that human governments are subordinate to the Church. Already the purpose of that Church in this State and country is frankly announced by its priests. It is the overthrow of the American system of secular schools, which is the bulwark of our political system. This is a movement dictated in the interest of a powerful and absolutely unpatriotic body, essentially repugnant to all American principles, and necessarily menacing to the happy continuance of the government—and upon what basis it depends for support? Upon the old lackey of slavery, the Democratic party. It is but another illustration of the unplanned nature of that party. The assault upon the American public school system is important solely because it will have the zeal of the Democratic party. And since it still remains organized and formidable, although its policy for a generation has been so utterly exploded, it is not surprising that every one of its measures has been defeated, can any respectable reason be offered why the Democratic party should not be allowed to dissolve because its principles and policy have thus far been heartily approved by the people?

MR. HOAR AND GENERAL SICKLES.

THE President having satisfied himself that, under the circumstances, there was no desirable candidate for the Supreme Bench in the late Judge WAYNE'S circuit, determined to fill that position the Attorney-General of the United States—a man of spotless character, of considerable ability, and of long practice, but of no experience upon the bench, and an original, inflexible Republican. The Senate has refused to confirm him. The objection was to his residence: the actual reason is political independence. Mr. HOAR being rejected, the country is left to see what the Senate will do with General SICKLES. If party considerations have decided Mr. HOAR's case in the first case, it should not be forgotten that there are other considerations involved in the second. The Republican party comprises the great body of the intelligence of the country. What will be the effect upon intelligent and self-respecting men of the rejection of Mr. HOAR, and the confirmation of General SICKLES? Of course it will be a notification to the Executive that the Senate is opposed to the whole class of nominations which will be favorably received, in the first case, by the independent men of the country, and of a kind that will not be tolerated. Can such a confession be made? Republican Senate without—to say no more—losing the confidence of the Republican party?

We frankly acknowledge the patriotic services of General SICKLES, of which his maimed person is a monument. We concede his experience and ability. We grant that when the Republicans of New York made him a delegate at large to the National Convention they surrendered his claim to honorable discharge, and rather honor that might be offered him as a consequence of the action of that Convention. Above all, we grant that those who most strongly urge his confirmation that he has been the object of a great deal of foul, and, doubtless, of very much undeserved censure; and that a man who seeks by good conduct to obliterate the remembrance of evil courses should not be relentlessly cast back and refused even a chance of reformation.

But having granted all this, and most heartily, does it follow that a person is necessarily selected for the highest public honors? Suppose, for instance, the worst of the unfortunate Georgian, BLOUNT, were to appear before us a few years he reforms, lives a reputable life, and shows his patriotism as thousands of others have it. Would that be sufficient reason or reason for making him a bishop in his Church? Or, suppose that some young man is sent to the Naval Academy for gross and wanton cruelty basely and patiently, and returns to society a reformed man. Can those who do not think that he should be selected for especial public honor be fairly accused of forbidding him to rise, and of refusing him Christian sympathy?

The essential point in the opposition to General SICKLES's confirmation is evident to every generous mind. The Republican party has a right to choose, and to make its selection influence the action of the Senate. If any body is disposed to quote the Prodigal Son, let him remember that the father, with all his joy, did not prefer the prodigal to the elder son, and that it was to the other that he said, "All that I have is thine." We are sincerely sorry that the nomination was made, and as sincerely we hope it will not be confirmed.

THE DISGRACE OF THE NEW-YORK BAR.

THERE are lawyers in New York who are just as heartily ashamed of the ill fame of the profession here, both in some of its representatives upon the bench and at the bar, as all other intelligent and honorable people. There are certain gentlemen before whom no self-respecting advocate or honest man wishes to plead, as there are members of the bar whom it is a disgrace to be compelled to recognize as professional peers. A distinguished lawyer, who sent his wine at a public table to a certain judge, said, when his friend remonstrated, "I don't want to get his ill-will;" and such is the condition of the judiciary in this city, that when the charge is publicly made that some of the judges that sit in the most important cases are notoriously corrupt, every body shrugs his shoulders and assents, and no sentence lest he should be cast into the hands of one of those magistrates, and have ingenious revenge deals out to him for justice. Even those magistrates and lawyers who are known to be as much the property of certain men and corporations as GUSSIE was the thrall of Count FRANCIS the SECOND, if they wore a collar like GUSSIE'S, inscribed with their owner's name, they would not be more plainly and distinctly labeled than they are.

The honor of a great profession was never more enriched than that of the law in the city of New York to-day, and it is not surprising that the better part of the profession intend to consider whether it is not possible to do something to cleanse it. It is certainly practicable for honorable lawyers to show to the profession and to the world that they despise abysses, of high or low degree, and that men who practice dishonorably, in whatever way, will be stigmatized by those who do not. Such a pressure of opinion can be applied that a man will pause before accepting the largest retainers for undertaking the most despicable work. Money is not everything in New York; but we all know men who have bought great fortunes too dearly. There are men, noted in their pursuits, in which they are very daring for money, and they are so shunned that they live in isolation. Their power may make them feared, but their evil is made comparatively good.

Let it be understood that a similar fate awaits any magistrate or lawyer who thrives dishonestly, and the bar will be drawn between honorable lawyers and others, which will be of signal service both to the profession and to the public. The reputation of the bench is doubtless professional peers. It is certainly practicable considered, in great part, by the system of election instead of appointment; and if the recent meeting and declaration of the profession should result in an organized effort to secure the adoption of the proposition of the new Judiciary article to return to the appointing system, it will be a worthy result. Moreover, the moral influence of a professional protest, so significant, but against infamous members of professional practices, will be of the utmost service.

Public acquiescence in immorality is demoralizing. The certain notorious men in the judges, and certain clever lawyers become the tools of unscrupulous corporations, and serve, for hire, the purposes of contemptible men—and such judges and such lawyers there are in the city of New York—if the public sense of decency does not express some decisive and forcible manner its abhorrence and disgust, it is a sign of an alarming decay of the public virtue, and a corroding influence upon the profession, which can only in some general catastrophe.

A TUB TO A WHALE.

THE people of the West are generally feeling poor. They have been selling their No. 2 wheat at 80 cents instead of $1 50 as last year; they are discouraged, too, owing to accidents in harvesting, an unusually large proportion of the crop will class as No. 3 on the whole, they are only going to receive much less money than they expected for the bountiful harvest of 1869. Turning over the subject in their minds, with their habitual philosophy than the vicissitudes of the past few years should have taught them, they have come to the conclusion that the difficulty arises from the scarcity of currency and insufficient supply of banks. They have, accordingly, instructed their Representatives in Congress to insist on an extension of the national banking system, and the result is Senator SHERMAN'S Currency bill, which passed the Senate on the 3d inst.

This bill authorizes the issue of $45,000,000 more bank currency to be put forth by new banks, against a like deposit of fifty per cent. certificates which are to be canceled; and after this issue has been made, a further sum of $30,000,000 of bank notes is to be taken from the States which have more than their proportion of the whole. This will now afloat, and given to those which have less.

This would appear, on its face, to be an increase of the volume of irredeemable paper money to the extent of forty-five millions, and in this view it would seem singular that the passage of the bill through the Senate did not lead to the start of another gold at New York, in cotton at New Orleans, or in wheat at Chicago. But the West is right in its theory, that the cause of the prevailing poverty in that section is the want of bank currency, how does it happen that a premium of 15 per cent. more currency meets with no response in the Western markets, sensitive as they are?

No action has yet been taken on the bill in the House of Representatives. It is presumed, however, that the influences which led to the passage of the bill by a large majority in the Senate will secure its adoption without material amendment by the House. We see no reason why it should not become a law, if the West wants it.

For it is, in simple truth, a mere "tub to the whale," and does not matter one iota, one way or the other.

The idea that money can be made more abundant, and that prices can be made to advance, by the establishment of new banks under the national system, is very ingenious. But no one has laughed at the simplicity of the rogue in the old play who proposed to his "pal" to create a land boom by way of meeting the necessities. But really, in view of recent discussions in Congress, it seems proper to state gravely that banks are mere cancelling, not creators, of capital; and that capital and currency are two very different things.

The West needs the bank-capital. They are, comparatively speaking, new countries. They are growing rich very fast indeed; but they are not yet so rich as the East, or as the wealthy parts of Europe. The demand for capital in the West is so far in excess of the supply that the rates of money averages nearly one per cent. a month. Western merchants who desire to do business on borrowed money chafe at the high rate, and fancy it could be reduced by an extension of the national banking system. But for every dollar of currency issued by the proposed new banks, only about ten cents, in bonds, must be deposited at Washington, and every dollar of discounts must be offset by ten dollars of loans. The proposed new banks, with a million capital each, were authorized to-morrow at the West, money—i. e., capital—would not be any more plentiful there. The new banks could not issue currency without lodging bonds with the Bureau, and they would not lodge bonds unless more capital left with them on deposit. Capital, which is merely another word for the savings of a community, is the growth of years. The enormous increase in trade and industry continued through a series of years. To fancy it can be suddenly secured, because the Government allows banks of issue to be as to seek the philosopher's stone. In the course of a generation or two money will naturally be cheaper in the West than in New York, six to seven per cent. in Cincinnati and Chicago, and eight to nine per cent. in San Francisco. But there will be no such rapid accumulation of capital from long-continued profits from trade and industry, and the result can not be quickened by the establishment of banks.

It is not at all likely that any considerable number of banks will be established under Senator SHERMAN'S bill, if it should become a law. If the existing sixteen hundred national banks, a considerable number are making little or no profit, and many stockholders in Western national banks would have done much better with their money had they kept it in hand, instead of investing it in bank stock. Banking in a new country, where the people are rich in every thing except money, is by no means a flourishing business. A Western or Southern banker has no deposits to speak of, for the customers of the bank have but little money to deposit. This is not, we are assured by Western friends, a very profitable business. New York has plenty of capital, and supplies it, when it is required, with lavish hand. But it is apt to charge a round price for its use. To establish banks at the West, which will be dependent on New York for the money they will lend, and not to their home customers, is a business in which a "good hater" might fairly wish to embark his enemy.

SENATOR REVELS.

IT is a curious and interesting fact that with the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment, and the close of the great series of measures of reconstruction which formally end the war, a living symbol of the victory of equal rights which the war secured should appear in the Senate of the United States in the person of Mr. REVELS, the colored Senator from Mississippi. It is a striking and significant fact that the papers which always nodded to the Democratic orators in Congress gibe and sneer at the new Senator, sometimes with shallow or affected arrogant as Mr. TOOMBS, as false to his country as Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS; and if, like those anti-Democratic Senators and all their brethren, he shall devote all his energies to the perpetuity and extension of the most un-American, the most disastrous, and the most inhuman policy that was ever proposed in the Legislature of a civilized nation, we shall agree that the Democratic gibes are well deserved.

If, on the other hand, he shall modestly and steadily continue to support the great principles to which his life has been devoted—if he shall continue to do all that he can to elevate and enlighten the most unfortunate class of American citizens, to establish securely that policy of equal rights among the people which is alone truly American and democratic, to cultivate universal sympathy and fraternity, and to hold the Union to the great and humane purposes for which it is declared in the Constitution to be established—if he proves by his Senatorial course his faith in popular government, in liberty, in justice, as the best guarantees of prosperity and progress, and the greatest good of the greatest number, he will do what neither Mr. WEBSTER, nor Mr. TOOMBS, nor Mr. STEPHENS, nor Mr. MASON, nor Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS, nor any of the Democratic Senators ever did, and will commend himself, as they certainly never did, to the grateful remembrance and honor of his fellow-citizens.

PANDORA'S BOX.

THE recent summary execution of SALNAVE in HAYTI evidently turns public attention to that island and its sisters in the Gulf, and impressively suggests the question whether this is the kind of population that it is desirable to add to ours. The history of HAYTI is a tale of blood. The negroes were cruelly wronged in the beginning, and they have terribly revenged themselves. There is no occasion for bestowing them. Every sneer and excretion leveled at them recoils with twofold force upon the head of our own color. But what good reason can be urged that the United States should incorporate into themselves all this medley of negro and essentially perilous element? Coffee and sugar and tobacco are not reasons for adding the most discordant elements to our population. Is it which the free of old hate and jealousy still slumber.

Nor must it be forgotten that the victorious party in the HAYTIEN war, whose leaders have just shot SALNAVE, are also a party in the DOMINICAN troubles at the other end of the island. SALNAVE was regarded by the HAYTIENS as General CABRAL, who is in arms against BAEZ, from whom we propose to lease the BAY of SAMANA, and under whose auspices the Annexation emit is asking to pay ten millions of dollars to be admitted to the Union, it might become necessary to allow that the destiny of the island be first to be resisted. But a commercial intrigue against which the leaders in power upon the island protest is not manifest destiny by any means. If we wish a naval station in the WEST Indies, we have agreed in honor to take St. Thomas, and the taking involves not only no barbarism, and nothing but the addition of a few thousands of peaceful Danes to the population. In both cases, as proposed, we buy money; but let us be very careful that we buy something, and are not sold in the transaction.

A correspondent of the Tribune writes that the 8th of January from Port-au-Prince, that HAYTI is ready to enter upon a career of peace. On the 10th of January the DOMINICANS had not captured SAMANA or delivered him to the provisional Haytien authorities. On the 18th SALNAVE arrived at Port-au-Prince. He immediately upon his arrival, at three o'clock in the afternoon, he was tried by the revolutionary tribunal. At twenty minutes past six he was shot. The people are said to have danced and sung when it was known that SALNAVE was brought in a prisoner. But three hours ago they danced and sung when he appeared as President. To-day it is SAGOT who takes SALNAVE'S first place. So-morrow it will probably take his last. The Haytien struggle, as the Tribune correspondent says, is to prevent "an entire relapse of Haytien society into barbarism." We ask again, is this a struggle and a society which patriotism or good sense requires that the United States should annex?

If the San Domingo treaty shall be reported for ratification by the Foreign Committee of the Senate, the country has a right to expect the most conclusive statement of the advantages which will be secured by it to this country, and an equally conclusive reply to the objections and stringent reasons for letting the island severely alone.

STATE OF THE LAW AS TO USURY.

THE decisions recently made in various portions of the State on this subject show the need of a uniform regulation applicable to the whole country. In a late suit brought by the Lake Ontario National Bank of Oswego, in which the defense of usury was maintained, Judge MUTLER, of the Supreme Court, held that the State law did not apply, as the loan on which excessive interest was paid or agreed upon was made by a national bank, and that Congress had provided for the case.

Under our State law the whole debt, principal and interest, would have been forfeited. The act approved June 3, 1864, known as the National Bank Act, provides that in case a greater rate of interest shall be knowingly taken or reserved by any such institution than the rate allowed by the laws of the State or Territory in which the bank shall be located, it shall be adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon.

It should be stated, in justification of the bank, that only seven per cent. interest was actually taken in the case of the loan, but there was an agreement on the part of the debtor to pay, in addition to the principal, "exchange on New York"—which is the same decision, we suppose, to explain, as under the circumstances, it was found to be usurious.

Appeal from this ruling of the Circuit Judge was taken and argued before Judge BACON, who, at Special Term, affirmed the decision, and the defense was abandoned. The Albany Argus states that Judge MORGAN, of the same judicial district, and Judge ROSENKRANS, in another, had come to the same decision. The case before Judge ROSENCRANS was one in which The First National Bank of Whitehall was plaintiff.

The defendants in these cases contended that the act of Congress, with respect to usury, was merely cumulative; that it left the State law in force, full operation, as if it were beyond this, and superseded the State law, that the act of Congress was void. These points were overruled, and the decision may now be regarded as the settled law on the subject. The power of Congress to prescribe a rule in this respect, applicable to national banking and their contracts, is unquestionably derived from the specific grant of authority "to regulate commerce among the several States." But this authority is asserted, if there is power to affix the penalty for taking usurious interest in any case which arises in the State, it must also be applicable to all other cases. There would be a great defect in our system if it were impossible for the General Government to prescribe the law in such cases.

The laws of the respective States on this subject are various. In some States the principal and interest are both forfeited; in some only the interest is forfeited; in others the excess of interest over and above the prescribed rate, while in many it is not. In some States, the regular rate is forfeited. By the act of Congress approved June 3, 1864, above referred to, if the rate of interest paid by the debtor is usurious, the latter may recover from the bank "twice the amount of interest so paid."

Certainly there would seem to be no good reason for establishing different penalties in the different States for a violation of usury laws. A person living in a State where usury is the excess of interest is forfeited might, in his dealings with a neighboring borrower, living in or adjoining States where the prescribed penalty for interest are forfeited, be seduced into making a loan in the latter in ignorance of that severe penalty, and thus lose his whole debt. We are now bound together in close commercial interest—closer than formerly, on account of the creation of the national banks on a system which requires that the circulation of one shall be accepted by the others to a certain extent; and it would seem to be unreasonable that commerce shall not be confused with divers penalties and different rules of law in such transactions. The mere fact that the General Government has interfered in this matter at all, is a sufficient reason for advancing to the passage of a general regulation, immediate as to act, but in its existence, adds one more to the immense variety of penalties and punishments.

The opinion delivered by several courts in the decision that Congress has not passed beyond the true boundary of its powers into the region appropriated by our system to individual States, is an answer in part to the unjust clamor that there is a tendency in the Republican administration to unjust usurpation, to extend the national authority.

Before the war there was a decided tendency in the opposite direction, due to the claim that the weight of sovereignty resided in the States, and they were allowed to legislate on many subjects over which the power of the General Government was exclusive whenever it chose to legislate. Thus it was held that the insolvent laws of States might be enforced until Congress chose to act by passing a uniform bankrupt law, when instantly State laws inconsistent with it were to be invalid. The power of the Union existed from the beginning, but it was suffered to be dormant until occasion arose for its exercise. The power to regulate excludes the idea that any other can make regulations applicable to the same thing.

It would seem, therefore, to be wise to pass a general law to create uniformity in these penalties and punishments; so that, in order to be safe in dealings between citizens of different States, it shall not be necessary to know the various rules which may be established in any one State, to be derived from various and, to the uninitiated, inaccessible statute books.

THE LABOR CONVENTION UPON INTEREST.

THE late Labor Convention in Boston debated resolutions which condemned the taking of interest under any pretext, inasmuch as it made labor subservient to capital. A very simple explanation clears this absurdity.

Our paper-money is a promise to pay the gold and silver dollar, of a certain weight and fineness, of one or other of those metals, as specified in acts of Congress. These metals, into which our circulating medium must ultimately be exchanged, are derived from the earth by labor. They may be said to be, therefore, the sole product of labor; and hence every law which steps in to make labor pay is a law on labor itself. If their creation was wholly artificial, and their commercial value was derived principally or entirely from legislative acts, and the legislative power was lodged in aristocratic hands, there would be some ground for the demands made by the Convention. But as their value in exchange is due chiefly to the amount of useful labor which the coin represents, and which drew from GALLATIN the remark we quoted in a recent article, that "man that is to say, his labor—is the only true measure of value," the attack of members of the Convention was leveled at the very cause they represented.

NOTES.

IN discussing the school question it must not be forgotten that what the enemies of our present system most condemn is not the exclusion of the Bible, but the division of the school-money among the sects proportionally to numbers. The Rev. Mr. PRESTON, to whose discourse upon the subject we have already referred, and who states distinctly the claim of the Roman Catholic clergy, says: "We have never regarded the reading of appropriate portions of the Bible as any great objection in itself to our Public Schools, provided that it be done without comment or attempt at interpretation." And he adds: "The exclusion of the Bible would not render the Common Schools satisfactory to us, for this alone would not make them non-sectarian." And again, "With our convictions of duty, no schools will satisfy us in which we can not teach our own religion." The scope of this demand, therefore, is, that the State shall provide for teaching every sectarian view of religion, and that the Protestant shall receive their share of the public money to teach their own religion. The statement PRESTON "emphatically" denies any hostility to the Public Schools. "We do not wish them destroyed," he says. "All that we desire is that his proposition is radically antagonistic to the present system. To the principle of the school system now is that the State supports no church. The schools are neither Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, nor Episcopal. But he would have the State support every sect. The contest is vital, for it involves the American idea of government.

SENATOR WILSON'S bill for a pension for MRS. LINCOLN should be passed without hesitation, but with an increase of the amount. Two thousand dollars is not enough. The annuity asked for the family of General RAWLINS and of MR. STANTON will doubtless yield an income of two thousand dollars each, and we do not believe that the people of this country are unwilling to give a suitable and handsome provision for the widow of the murdered President if they are willing to make any, of which there can be no doubt. The proposition does not seem to us so long delayed, and Congress must pass with the hearty welcome with which the press has received the proposition of the pension, that it is the wish of the loyal nation for whom the late President had down his life.

IN an admirable little paper read before SECRETARY STANTON, in the Army and Navy Journal, we find a fine characterization, by which the writer, evidently an intimate, personal friend of MR. STANTON, draws the portrait. It is one of the most valuable that it was told in kindly defense of MRS. LINCOLN: "The second day after I took office, I found in one of those little half-boxes, for gentlemen, came into my office, and handed me a card from MRS. LINCOLN, asking that an order be made a commissary. I said, 'There is no place for you, and if there were, the fact that you ask it would prevent your receiving anything it to you;' and I tore the card up. The next day I was told that a lady was in the office. I looked, and handed me a formal letter from MRS. LINCOLN, making the same request. I said, 'I told you yesterday there was no place for you, and there never will be one while I am Secretary.' I tore up the letter, saying, 'I will have no more said.' During the day I called upon her, and said, 'I thought it only proper to call upon MRS. LINCOLN, finding a card and letter had been received from you.' She said, 'Yes, MR. SECRETARY. I thought that as wife of the President I was entitled to ask for so small a favor.' I said, 'Madam, we are in the midst of a great war for national existence. Our success depends upon the people. My first duty is to the people of the United States; my next duty is to protect your husband's honor and your own. If I should make such appointments, I should strike at the very root of confidence of the people in the government, in your husband, and you and me.' She said at once: 'MR. STANTON, you are right. And I will never ask you for any thing again,' and she never did.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 31.—In the Senate, almost every member presented petitions for the abolition of the franking privilege.—In the House, bills were introduced to admit MISSISSIPPI; to remove all political disabilities; to grant belligerent rights to CUBA; to establish the salaries of Senators and Representatives at $5000 a year, and reduce the mileage to ten cents; and for appropriations for the year.

January 3.—In the Senate, progress was made with the Civil Service bill, but no vote was not taken.—In the House, the Tariff bill was reported, and after debate was ordered to be printed.

February 1.—In the Senate, the Tariff bill was passed by a vote of 29 to 28.—In the House, a resolution was introduced by MR. ELDRIDGE, declaring the recognition of the Cuban as belligerents. A bill to establish the salaries of Senators and Representatives was reported.

February 2.—In the Senate, a resolution was introduced to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national bank, in view of the financial affairs in portions of the South. MR. SHERMAN reported a bill for funding the National Debt, extending banking privileges, and establishing specie payments.—In the House, MR. ELDRIDGE'S resolution, declaring that a declaration of the bill to supply the naval deficiencies, amounting to $3,000,000, the result of which was the adoption of an amendment striking out appropriations to $1,000,000, and the passage of the bill as amended. The bill for the admission of MISSISSIPPI, which it exactly similar to the one under which VIRginia was admitted, was passed, 145 to 46. Under a call in relation to additional bounties, which extends the provisions of previous acts, to the families of deceased soldiers who enlisted for a period of less than a year, was passed. An extensive Civil Service bill providing for the execution of every and all the laws of the United States, was introduced and referred.

February 3.—In the Senate, a bill was reported authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold moneys due to States in default of the payment of interest on bonds held in trust by the government. A long discussion took place in reference to the action of the franking privilege on a motion to take the Tariff bill from the table. The motion was lost by a vote of 32 to 34.—In the House, a resolution was offered that the Committee on Naval Affairs be added on Military Affairs to investigate the reported sale of ordnance stores by the Navy Agent at Mare Island by members of Congress.

February 4.—In the Senate was not in session, and the time of the House was occupied with an unimportant debate.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The most important measure passed in the New York State Legislature during the week was the one to provide a new charter for the city. The salient features of the instrument are the following:

The Governor, Mayor, Recorder, and Police Commissioner are to be elected for four years. No charter election is to take place until the fall election of every second year. The new Common Council is to consist of eighty-four members, two elected from each ward. The details of municipal labor are to be left with seven departments, viz.: Of the Department of Finance, of Public Works, of Law, of Public Charities, of Police, of Parks, of Health, of Buildings, of Public Parks, of Excise, Sanitary Department, and the Board of Education. The Commissioner of Police is to be appointed by the Governor, and the Board of Police to be the mayor, and the present Superintendent of Police to be continued in office. Provision is made for retention of the present police and firemen, except in certain cases. The Board of Police is to consist of three members. Liquor shops may open at 4 o'clock in the morning and must close at 10 P.M. Saloons may be closed on Sundays, but the prohibition does not extend to the selling of liquor with meals or at steamboats. The restriction upon the sale of liquor to minors is left unchanged. The Common Council shall have the power of impeaching the Mayor, Commissioners, and County Officers for misconduct. The Education Department is not changed in any of its features. The Board of Health is to have charge of matters of quarantine. The Board of Liquor and Excise Commissioners is to be abolished.

The bill authorizing Governor HOFFMAN to issue bonds and ordered to be printed.

The statement of the public debt shows a net decrease of $3,103,464 89 during the month of January. The coin balance is $101,015,000 in the Treasury. Certificates amounting to $20,060,000. The currency balance is $17,000,000. The gold certificates on account again, and $1,000,000 in coin.

The Legislature of Tennessee has passed an act granting aid to the Mediterranean and Oriental Steam Navigation Company of New York, the object of which is to encourage immigration to the South by means of direct communication between that State and Europe.

Governor HOFFMAN and Governor FENTON visited to take the oath at the polls in Missouri, and was defeated from voting. The Democrats had a full delegation for an opinion. The Court has decided against the Democrats, declaring the voting to be a fraud in such.

The "new nation" across the northern border has come to a sudden end. Dictator RIEL, after a short but bloody career, has been driven from power, and Governor MCTAVISH has been reinstated. The Hudson Bay Company has come into control again, and RIEL is a prisoner in Fort Gerry.

FOREIGN NEWS.

IT is said that the Pope will hereafter refuse to receive protests against the affirmation of the dogma of Infallibility. The Pope has also issued a new coin, just in circulation, but were found to have originated from the Government Mint at Rome, and the forgery, which was not regarded as of a fatal character. These coins bear the head of the Pope on one side, and an inscription in regard to his successor. No favorite candidate for the Papacy is mentioned in the coin.

It is reported that the Turkish Government has refused to have dressed for the Spanish throne. Prince LEOPOLD of Lothen, Duke of GENOA, Prince NAPOLEON, and Prince Charles of Prussia, are now among the candidates whose names named.

M. DE VERNE, the distinguished French astronomer and Director of the Observatory of Paris, and Professor of the Imperial Observatory for action in the Senate of France, has been summoned before a committee on his official position.

Despatches from Vienna states that the Archbishops Rauscher of Austria has left for his country. No reason for his visit to Rome is assigned.

The agent of the Spanish Government in Cuba has arrived with the consent of the Dutch government for the purchase of arms in Holland.

It is reported, on the authority of a letter from a Spanish officer, that the body of the late Dr. LIVINGSTONE had been burned as a wizard by a chief in Central Africa. The statement is not yet confirmed by the London papers.

Diplomatic relations between Egypt and Greece is said to have been completed.

Despatches from Mexico represent the condition of affairs in that country as fully disguised. Revolutionary attempts are frequent, but the government is seemingly able to preserve tranquillity. A plot to proclaim Santa Anna was discovered, and the principals arrested. A battle is reported quiet. A battle is reported to have taken place in San Luis Potosi, which resulted in a victory of the insurgent troops, and the capture by them of twenty pieces of artillery. General NEGRETE is said to be in command of the insurgent forces in the vicinity of Santa Anna.

The Spanish Minister, Senor Cartanon, editor of the Pro de Cuba, a journal in the Spanish interest published in Havana, was shot and killed in the streets of Cuba at Key West, whither he had gone to the Cuba at Key West, whither he had gone to VACCINATING THE BABY.

A PRETTY domestic story is that which our artist tells in this beautiful engraving, and tells so well that we need scarcely call the attention of our readers to the artistic skill displayed in its treatment. The happy manner in which he has expressed the pride of the young mother, the shrinking timidity of the baby, the anxiety of the nurse lest the doctor should hurt her pretty charge, and the kindly good-nature of the old family doctor, will strike every one at first glance.

We trust the hint conveyed indirectly by this picture may not be lost upon families where this necessary precaution against a loathsome disease has been neglected. The sanitary superintendent of the Metropolitan District of New York, in a recent report, called attention to the fact that this disease has become fearfully prevalent throughout the West, especially in California, and that great precaution will be necessary to keep it from spreading through New York. In most European countries the regulations in regard to the vaccination of children are very rigid, and are enforced without respect to rank. At a certain age every child is vaccinated; those of the poor by the police physician, who gives a certificate that the law has been complied with. This excellent regulation has nearly banished small-pox from many cities where it once made fearful ravages among the poorer classes. One of the results is, that this disease is very seldom brought to this country by immigrants. In 1869, out of 662 cases treated at Blackwell's Island Hospital, only 152 were brought from abroad. This fact carries its own moral.

VACCINATING THE BABY.—[FROM A SKETCH BY SOL EYTINGE.]

GENERAL AMES.

GENERAL ADELBERT AMES, who has just been elected to the United States Senate from the State of Mississippi, and whose portrait is given on this page, is a native of Maine, and entered West Point as a cadet from that State. He graduated with honor in 1856, received a lieutenant's commission, and has since remained in the army. No officer has a more honorable war-record than General AMES. He served with distinction in the Army of the Potomac, and participated in nearly every battle in which that gallant host was engaged, and was promoted for gallant and meritorious services through the various grades, from lieutenant to the rank of major-general, which he now holds.

General AMES is about thirty-five years of age, a man of pleasant bearing, of frank and yet firm disposition. His administration as Military Governor of Mississippi has been eminently wise and successful. He was chosen Senator by the nearly unanimous vote of the Legislature of that State. Should the question of his eligibility be decided against him, his rejection by the Senate would cause general regret throughout the State, where his impartial conduct has won the respect of all parties.

HON. H. R. REVELS.

ON this page will be found the portrait of Hon. H. R. REVELS, Senator elect from Mississippi. Mr. REVELS was born in North Carolina, in 1822, of free colored parents. He was educated at a GENERAL ADELBERT AMES, UNITED STATES SENATOR ELECT FROM MISSISSIPPI.

HON. H. R. REVELS, UNITED STATES SENATOR ELECT FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Quaker Seminary in Indiana, and became a Methodist minister. At the breaking out of the war he was settled in Baltimore, and from that time took an active part in the management of freedmen's affairs. In 1864 he went to Vicksburg, in pursuance of this mission, and assisted in the organization of schools and churches among the liberated slaves. He passed the next two years in Kansas and Missouri, preaching and lecturing on moral and religious subjects; returned to Mississippi the following year, and has since resided in Natchez. He is presiding elder of his Church for the southern portion of the State. Since July last he has been a member of the City Council, and has served in that capacity with credit. A short time since he was elected to the State Senate by a handsome majority, and has now been selected by the Legislature as a proper man to represent the State in the Senate of the United States.

MR. REVELS is a tall, portly man, of light complexion: has benevolent features, a pleasant voice, and cultivated manners. He is thoroughly respected by his own people, and by the whites.

SEA-DRIFT.

THE inhabitants of the sea are fiercer than those of the land, all, or nearly all, being carnivorous, and preying upon each other. Various regions or zones are inhabited by certain fishes and other animals peculiar to them, and found in no other parts. Sometimes they travel to find food, but those greater travelers, the currents, bring them large supplies too. The Gulf stream carries immense numbers of the jelly-like medusæ northward, to be eagerly devoured by the Greenland whale, whose huge body is chiefly sustained by such apparently trifling food. It is well known that the narrowness of its throat prevents it from swallowing any thing larger than shrimps and small crabs. Medusæ abound in the polar seas, sometimes to such an extent as to calm ruffled water; but the amount drifted from the tropics is not too much to make up for its constant destruction by this animal. The great nursery of marine life is in the Pacific and Indian oceans. There the warm, placid waters are seen tinged for miles with crimson, yellow, or white, by millions of infusoria, whose curious forms are only revealed by the microscope. There whole fleets of the "Portuguese man-of-war" and "Sailor-man," as sailors call the nautilus and velella, are setting out with the gentle drift; currents on a long voyage that has no end for them but death, and a sinking into unfathomable depths of still, dark water below, where their delicate shells add to the crust of dead organisms ever forming freshly upon the sea-floor.

Sea-weed is not without its uses. The immense quantities of wrack thrown upon the coasts of Scotland, Ireland, and Iceland are used by the poor for fuel and cattle-food, and the more delicate kinds are even eaten by themselves. Formerly thousands of tons were used annually in the manufacture of alkali. The edible birds' nests found along the shores of the Java and Chinese seas are made by a swallow which feeds upon a species of floating sea-weed. From this it extracts the glutinous substance forming the nest. This gelatine can be made artificially, if one may so call it, by boiling down the weed; and in some parts of the Indies it is really used in cookery.

CUPID'S MESSENGERS.

Seeds, plants, and even large trees are often drifted across the seas to foreign shores, where they sometimes take root if the soil and climate be favorable. Growing in the hot, rank moisture of a primeval forest, or among the reeds bordering a grassy upland, this living vegetation is swept away with its whole banks by the furious inundations of tropical rivers. It forms a sand-bank at the river mouth, which in course of time silts up into a delta, generally an immense, thickly-wooded swamp of rich alluvial soil, tigers and alligators infesting its gloomy depths. But a great part of this débris is driven out to sea. Mr. Bates says that in the flood season the Amazon bears along "a continuous line of uprooted trees and islets of floating plants," and in the open sea, four hundred miles from its mouth, he saw "patches of floating grass, mingled with tree-trunks and withered foliage," among them fruits of a tree found only on the banks of the Great River, the Ubussie palm. The floods of the Orinoco, the Congo, the Ganges, the Plate, and the Mississippi float out to sea similar natural rafts. Among the Philippine and Moluccas islands they are met with, coming probably from the large Chinese rivers. Those of the Orinoco are covered with water-plants in flower; and so solid are they that many a canoe is wrecked against them on dark nights as they come down with the swirling flood. The Mississippi rears away whole acres covered with wood; and one hundred miles from the mouth of the Ganges floating islands have been seen, composed of matted trees and soil, with trees growing erect upon them. Many of these carry monkeys, storks, alligators, snakes, and tigers. Generally victims of the next storm, a few may have smiled safely before the steady summer winds to more than one lonely rock or sand-key, plants taken root, and animals multiplied there, before man come to reign over all. It is an interesting question to many how animal and vegetable life spread over the earth, and our increasing knowledge of deep-sea currents explains much. All these things are received by the great universal ocean, and by it distributed far and wide.

Not only is this lower life dispersed by the currents, but man too is affected by them. The idea conceived by Columbus of a western continent was confirmed by the fact of trees and bodies of strange men being stranded on the Azores. In 1688 a French ship captured an Esquimaux canoe containing seven men, near the English coast, and Esquimaux have several times been driven in their canoes by storms to the Orcades. The wreck of a Japanese junk was drifted to the Sandwich Islands with her surviving crew. In this it is easy to trace the agency of the Black Stream of Japan as the foregoing instances may be attributed to that of the Gulf Stream. Stories are on record of Pacific islanders having helplessly drifted on mountain before seeing land; and undoubtedly many islands have been peopled in this way. Humboldt says that some casks of palm-oil, belonging to the cargo of a vessel wrecked near Cape Lopez, were carried across the Atlantic by the equatorial current, and made a second passage with the Gulf Stream to the coast of Scotland, where they were found. A similar thing has happened to more than one wrecked cargo in the West Indies.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE PYRENEES.

THE multiplicity of charms of various kinds almost rivals those of the ages of faith. A toad hung up and left to die in a stable preserves the horses from the evil-eye; certain pointed stones, called Peyras de pigotes, or smallpox stones, laid round the neck, are a defense against infectious diseases. In the valley of Argelès the poorest peasant contrives to procure a mighty log of wood on Christmas-eve; this is lighted, and to it he offers a portion of the bread, wine, etc., of which his poor supper on that night is composed. Hawthorn and laurel sacred to the vesper-squirrel shrinker; the inhabitants of Biarritz make wreaths of these plants at dawn on St. John's Day; they then rush to the sea, plunge in after a prayer, and are safe during the ensuing twelvemonth, from the temptations of evil spirits. The belief in fairies and spirits is common. There is the friendly sprite who tends the fire, folds the linen, and reders up the house in the absence of its owner. "Le Folet is a tricksy imp, who lives among the mountains, and specially delights in teasing horses, which are sometimes found on stormy mornings with manes marvelously plaited, and in a state of great agitation from his visits. As to fairies, they are still visible to the unsophisticated Pyrenæan, and they sit at the entrance of their grottoes, combing their golden hair, much as they used to do in our own old nursery days. He who tries to reach them perishes; should he find favor in their eyes, he disappears forever from this world. If, however, a mortal release a fairy from a spell, she sometimes lends him her magic wand, with which he can obtain whatever he desires. In the Barége valley the fairies inhabit the interior of the Pic de Bergons, and this placed at the foot of their abode is instantly spun into the finest thread. In the valley of Barousse they go from house to house on New Year's night, carrying happiness in their right hands, and sorrow in their left, under the form of two children, the one crowned with flowers, the other weeping. To propitiate them a repast is spread in a room with open doors and windows, and on the morrow the master of the house distributes the food among his family and servants, with good wishes for the New Year. Occasionally, however, tricks may be played upon female fairies with impunity, as when one was caught in a pair of trowsers, left in a garden for the purpose.

A reputation for witchcraft is both profitable and dangerous in those parts. A witch who died quietly at Argelès in 1865 had lived surrounded with benefits and advantages conferred on her by those who feared her power; but in 1850 a poor old woman, named Jeanne Bedorres, was thrown alive into a heated oven at Pujo, near Vic-Bigorre, and died under the torture.

TOPSY'S VALENTINE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY SOL EYTINGE.]

Like all superstitious people, the inhabitants of the Pyrenees account, by legendary stories, for natural sights and sounds. The man in the moon was banished to his place of distant exile for Sabbath-breaking; he sinned in February; he has been in the same cold month ever since. He still bears upon his shoulder the fagot that he gathered on that accursed day. He is condemned to labor without repose until the end of the world, when he will have expiated his transgression, and will regain his liberty and name. When the shepherd, leading home his flock, hears the shiver of leaves on the wind, he recognizes woodland sounds startle him, when the mountain echoes awake from rock to rock, he remembers, for he knows that Basua Jaona (Sire of the wild lord) is near. Basua Jaon is of enormous size; he has a human countenance, and walks upright like a man; but he surpasses the stag in activity, and is covered with long, smooth hair. He bounds over gorges, and his loud voice cries aloud, for he knows that he must endure the hardest buffets of the elements. Occasionally he forewarns the herdsman of the approaching storm, and woe to the unlucky wight who neglects or despises the caution! Despite the formidable appearance and manners, Basua Jaon seems to be rather a good-natured personage, who does not resent liberties. Once having fallen, like the fairy, into the trap of a pair of trousers, he allowed himself to be tricked into revealing the secret of the previously unknown art of walking iron. Some have supposed that Basua Jaon is a legendary reminiscence of the crang-outang of Africa, where the Basques are said formerly to have sojourned.

SUN AND RAIN.

A young wife stood at the lattice-pane,
In a study sad and "broun,"
Watching the dreary, endless rain,
Steadily pouring down—

Drip, drip, drip,
It kept on its tireless play;
And the poor little woman sighed, "Ah, me!
What a wretched, wretched day!"

An eager hand at the door,
A step as of one in haste,
A kiss on her lips once more,
And an arm around her waist:

Throb, throb, throb,
Went her little heart, and coy,
As she thought, with a smile, "Well, after all,
It isn't so dull a day!"

Forget was the plashing rain,
And the dreariness all alone,
For the sombre room was lighted again
By the blessed sun of Love:

"Love, love, love!"
Ran the little wife's murmur'd lay;
Without, it may threaten and frown if it will;
Within, what a golden day!"

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

GONE.

Blanche came in, with a glass of wine in her hand, and saw the swooning woman on the floor.

She was alarmed, but not surprised, as she knelt by Anne, and raised her head. Her own previous observation of her friend necessarily prevented her from being at all at a loss to account for the fainting fit. The inevitable delay in getting the wine was—naturally to her mind—alone to blame for the trouble which now met her view.

If she had been less ready in thus tracing the effect to its cause, she might have moved to the window to see if any thing had happened, outof-doors, to frighten Anne—might have seen Geoffrey before he had time to enter the house of the home—and, making that one discovery, might have altered the whole course of events that met in her coming life only, but in the coming lives of others. So do we shape our own destinies, blindfold. So do we hold our poor inheritance of happiness at the capricious mercy of Chance. It is surely a blessed delusion which persuades us that we are the highest product of the great scheme of creation, and sets us doubting whether other planets are habitable, because other planets are not surrounded by an atmosphere which we can breathe!

After trying such simple remedies as were within her reach, and trying them without success, Blanche became seriously alarmed. She threw by, to all outward appearance, dead in her arms. She was on the point of calling for help —come what might of the discovery which would ensue—when the door from the hall opened once more, and Hester Dethridge entered the room.

The cook had accepted the alternative which her mistress's message had placed before her. If she insisted on having her own time at her own sole disposal for the rest of that day. Exactly as Lady Lundie had desired, she intended her resolution to carry her point by placing her account-book on the desk in the library. It was only when this had been done that Blanche received any answer to her entreaties for help. Slowly and deliberately Hester Dethridge walked up to the spot where the young girl knelt with Anne's head on her bosom, and looked at the two without a trace of human emotion in her stern and stony face.

"Don't you see what's happened?" cried Blanche. "Are you alive or dead? Oh, Hester, I can't bring her to! Look at her! look at her!"

Hester Dethridge looked at her, and shook her head. Looking again, she turned to the table, and wrote on her slate. Held out the slate over Anne's body, and showed what she had written: "It's only a fainting fit."

"You stupid creature!" said Blanche. "Nobody but fools faint!"

The eyes of Hester Dethridge steadily read the worn white face, telling its own tale of sorrow mutely set to endurance. Then, with the slate, Hester Dethridge steadily looked back at her own knowledge of her mistress's secret married life. She again returned to writing on her slate —again showed the written words to Blanche.

"I brought it to by a man. I don't know God will take her."

You horrid unfeeling woman! how dare you write such an abominable thing!" With this natural outburst of indignation, Blanche looked back at Anne, and, doubting the death-like persistency of the swoon, appealed again to the mercy of the unmoved woman who stood looking down at her. "Oh, Hester! for Heaven's sake help me!"

The cook dropped her slate at her side, and bent her head gravely in sign that she submitted. She motioned to Blanche to loosen Anne's dress, and then—kneeling on the knee-cushion Anne to support her while it was being done. The minute Hester Dethridge touched her, the swooning woman gave signs of life.

A faint shudder ran through her from head to feet—her pulse trembled—her eyelids rose for a moment—and closed again. As they closed, a low sigh floated softly from her lips.

Hester Dethridge put her back in Blanche's arms—considered a little with herself—returned to writing on the slate—and held out the written words once more:

"Shivered when I touched her. That means I have been walking over her grave."

Blanche turned from the sight of the slate, and from the face of the writer. "Don't say that! Don't frighten me!" she said. "You will frighten Me, if she sees you. Don't mean to offend you; but—leave us, please leave us."

Hester Dethridge accepted her dismissal, as she accepted every thing else. She bowed her head in sign that she understood—looked for the last time at Anne—dropped a stiff courtesy to her young mistress—and left the room.

An hour later the butler had paid her, and she had left the house.

Blanche breathed more freely when she found herself alone. She could feel the relief now of seeing Anne revive.

"Can you hear me, darling?" she whispered. "Can you let me know you are coming to?"

Anne's eyes slowly opened and looked round her—in that torment and terror of reviving life which makes its awful pressure felt instinctively against its recall to existence when mortal mercy has denied its own help to the end of time.

Blanche rested Anne's head against the nearest chair, and ran to the table upon which she had placed the wine before entering the room.

After swallowing the first few drops Anne began to feel the return of her consciousness. Blanche persisted in making her empty the glass, and refrained from asking or answering questions until her recovery was complete and the glass of wine was emptied.

"You have overexerted yourself this morning," she said, as soon as it seemed safe to speak. "Nobody has seen you, darling—nothing has happened. Are you feel like trying to walk?"

Anne made an attempt to rise and leave the library. Blanche placed her gently in the chair, and went on:

"There is not the least need to stir. We have another quarter of an hour to ourselves before any body is at all likely to disturb us. I have something to say, Anne—a little proposal to make. Will you hear it?"

Anne took Blanche's hand, and pressed it gratefully to her lips. She made no other reply. Blanche proceeded:

"I won't ask any questions, my dear—I won't attempt to force you to confess against your will—I won't even remind you of my letter yesterday. But I can't help feeling without knowing it in my mind made easy about you in some way. You will relieve all my anxiety, if you will do one thing—one easy thing, for me. Will you?"

"What is it, Blanche?"

She put down her hand with her mind far away from the subject before her. Blanche was too eager in pursuit of her object to notice the absent tone, the unusually mechanical manner, in which Anne had spoken to her.

"I want you to consult my uncle," she answered. "Sir Patrick is interested in you; Sir Patrick proposed to me this very day to go and see you at the inn. Let me tell him that I consider the dearest old man living—and you can trust me to put your proposal before him. Will you take my uncle into your confidence, and be guided by his advice?"

Anne looked up with a sudden, convulsive movement, which Anne had spoken to her.

"Consult Sir Patrick!" she repeated, in a low, startled voice.

"Why not? Is there any thing—still thinking of something else—Anne, you're not afraid of Sir Patrick?"

Blanche was exhausted. "How will I must have managed it!" she thought. "This is what my uncle means, when my uncle talks of 'putting it strongly.'"

She bent down over Anne, and gayly patted her on the shoulder.

"That's the wisest 'Yes,' darling, you ever said in your life. Wait here—and I'll go in to luncheon, or they will be sending to know what has become of me. Sir Patrick has kept my place for me, next to himself. I shall contrive to tell him what I want; and he will contrive (oh, the blessing of having to do with a clever man!) there to be a time for them]—he will contrive to leave the table before the rest, without exciting any remark or suspicion. Go away with him at once to the summer-house (we have been at the summer-house all the morning; nobody will go back to it), and I will follow you as soon as I have satisfied Lady Lundie by eating some lunch. You will be all the safer from her our three selves. In five minutes or less you may expect Sir Patrick. Let me go! We haven't a moment to lose!"

Anne held her back. Anne's attention was concentrated on her now.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Are you going on happily with Arnold, Blanche?"

"Arnold is nicer than ever, my dear."

"Is the day fixed for your marriage?"

"The day will be ages hence. Not till we are back in town, at the end of the autumn. Let me go, Anne!"

"Give me a kiss, Blanche."

Blanche kissed her, and tried to release her hand. Anne held it as if she was drowning, as if her life depended on not letting it go.

"Will you always love me, Blanche, as you love me now?"

"How can you ask me?"

"I said I should. You say Yes too."

Blanche said it. Anne's eyes fastened on her face, with a long, yearning look, and then Anne's hand suddenly dropped here.

She ran out of the room, more agitated, more anxious, more puzzled to decide on herself, than ever had she felt so certain of the urgent necessity of appealing to Sir Patrick's advice as she felt at that moment.

The guests were still safe at the luncheon-table when Blanche entered the dining-room.

Lady Lundie expressed the necessary surprise, in the properly graduated tone of displeasure, at her step-daughter's want of punctuality. Blanche made her apologies in the most exemplary humility. She glided into her chair by her uncle's side, and took the first thing that was offered to her. Sir Patrick looked at his niece, and found himself in the company of a model young English Miss—and marveled inwardly what it might mean.

The talk interrupted for the moment (topics, Politics and Spiritual-rappings, when a change was wanted, Sport and Politics), was resumed round its former lines. Under cover of the conversation, and in the intervals of receiving the attentions of the gentlemen, Blanche whispered to Sir Patrick. "Don't eat any more. I'm in the library." (Politic Mr. Smith offered cayenne-hens. Gratefully declined.) "Pray, pray, pray go to her; she is waiting so very anxious in a dreadful trouble." (Gallant Mr. Jones proposed fish and sherry—it is, therefore, needless to add that he politely declined to commit an unprovoked outrage on his own stomach.)

"My cake!" persuaded Lady Lundie, elevating the horrible composition on a fork. "Won't anybody have my cake?"

Sir Patrick saw his way to slipping out of the room under cover of a compliment to his sister-in-law. He summoned his courtly smile, and laid his hand on his heart.

"A faithful friend," he said, "is met by a temptation which he can not possibly resist. If it is a wise mortal, also, what does he do?"

"Eat some of My cake," said the prosaic Lady Lundie.

"No!" said Sir Patrick, with a look of unutterable devotion directed at his sister-in-law. "He puts temptation, dear lady—as I do now." He bowed, and escaped, unsuspected, from the room.

Lady Lundie cast down her eyes, with an expression of virtuous indignce for human frailty, and divided Sir Patrick's compliment modestly between herself and the cake.

Well aware that his own departure from the table would be followed in a few minutes by the rising of the body of the house, Sir Patrick hurried to the library, lest as his latest hope he should let him. Now that he was alone, his manner became anxious, and his face looked grave. He entered the room.

Not a sign of Anne Silvester was to be seen any where. The library was a perfect solitude.

"Gone!" said Sir Patrick. "This looks bad."

After a moment's reflection he went back into the hall to get his hat. It was possible that she might have been afraid of discovery if she staid in the library, and that she might have gone out to the summer-house by herself.

If she were to be found in the summer-house, the quieting of Blanche's mind and the clearing up of her uncle's suspicions alike depended on discovering the place in which Miss Silvester had taken refuge. In this case time would be of importance, and the capacity of making the most of it would be a precious capacity at starting. Arriving rapidly at these conclusions, Sir Patrick rang the bell in the hall which communicated with the servants' offices, and summoned his own valet—the person of tried discretion and fidelity, nearly as old as himself.

"Get your hat, Duncan," he said, when the valet appeared, "and come out with me."

Master and servant set forth together silently, on their way through the grounds. Arrived within sight of the summer-house, Sir Patrick ordered Duncan to wait, and went on by himself.

There was not the least need for the precaution that he had taken. The summer-house was as empty as the library. He stepped out again and looked about him. No living creature was visible. Sir Patrick summoned the servant to join him.

"Go back to the stables, Duncan," he said, "and say that Miss Lundie lends me her pony-carriage to-day. Let it be got ready at once and kept in the stable-yard, so that no attract as little notice as possible. You are to go with me, and nobody else. Inform the coachman with a railway time-table. Have you got any money?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"Did you happen to see the governess (Miss Silvester) on the day when we came here—the day of the heavy rain?"

"I did, Sir Patrick."

"Should you know her again?"

"I thought I saw a very distinguished-looking person, Sir Patrick. I should certainly know her again."

"Have you any reason to think she noticed you?"

"She never even looked at me, Sir Patrick."

"Very good. Put a change of linen into your bag, Duncan, and be ready yourself to take a journey by railway. Wait for me in the stable yard. This is a matter in which every thing is trusted to your discretion, and to yours."

"Thank you, Sir Patrick."

With that acknowledgment of the compliment which had always been paid by him, Duncan gravely went his way to the stables; and Duncan's master returned to the house, to wait there until he was joined by Blanche.

Sir Patrick showed signs of failing patience during the interval of expectation through which he was now condemned to pass. He applied repeatedly to the bell for a fresh cup of tea. He fidgeted incessantly in and out of the summer-house. Anne's disappearance had placed a serious difficulty in the way of her future discovery; and there was no attacking that obstacle, until precious time had been wasted in waiting to see Blanche.

At last she appeared in view, from the steps of the summer-house; breathless with haste, and seeing to the place of meeting as fast as her feet would take her to it.

Sir Patrick immediately advanced, to spare her the shock of making the inevitable discovery. Blanche, he said, was to be trusted to herself, my dear, for a disappointment. I am alone."

"You don't mean that you have let her go?"

"My poor child! I have never seen her at all."

Blanche sank down on a seat in the summer-house. Sir Patrick followed her. "I must find out again to meet him with a look of blank despair. "Oh, how I did set my pity her!

And see how little pity she has for me!"

Sir Patrick put his arm round his niece, and softly patted the fair young head that reclined on his shoulder.

"Don't let us judge her harshly, my dear! we don't know what serious necessity may not have led her astray. It is plain that she can trust nobody—and that she considered it safest for me to get you out of the room and spare you the pain of parting. Compose yourself, Blanche. I don't despair of discovering where she has gone, if you will help me."

Blanche lifted her head, and dried her tears bravely.

"My father himself wasn't kinder to me than you are," she said. "Only tell me, uncle, what I can do!"

"I want to hear exactly what happened in the library," said Sir Patrick. "Forget nothing, my dear child, no matter how trifling it may be. Trifles are precious to us, and unimportant to others to us, now."

Blanche followed her instructions to the letter. her uncle listening with the closest attention. When she had completed her narrative, Sir Patrick suggested leaving the summer-house. "As I have ordered your chaise," he said; "and I can tell you that I propose doing on our way to the station-shall"

"Let me drive you, uncle?"

"Forgive me, my dear, for saying No to that. Your step-mother's suspicions are very easily excited—and you had better not be seen with me if my inquiries take me to the Craig Fernie inn. I promise, if you will remain here, to tell you every thing when I come back. And the orders in any plan they have for the afternoon—and your will prevent them from in any way crossing things more than a passing remark. You will do as I tell you? That's a good girl! Now you shall hear how I propose to set about this poor lady, and how your little story has helped me."

He paused, considering with himself whether he should begin by telling Blanche of his consultation with Geoffrey. Once more, he decided that question in the negative. Better to still defer taking her into his confidence until he had ascertained the result of investigation on which he was now setting forth.

What you have told me, Blanche, divides itself, in my mind, into two heads," began Sir Patrick. "There is what happened in the library before your own eyes; and there is what Miss Silvester told you had happened at the inn. As to the event in the library (in the first place), it is too late now to inquire whether that fainting-fit was the result, as you say, of mere exhaustion—or whether it was the result of something that occurred while you were out of the room."

"What could have happened while I was out of the room?"

"I know no more than you do my dear. It is simply one of the possibilities in the inquiry; and, as such, I notice it. To get on to what practically concerns us: If Miss Silvester's delicate health it is impossible that she could get, unassisted, to any great distance from Windygates. She may have taken refuge in one of the cottages in our immediate neighborhood. Or she may have met with some passing vehicle from one of the farms on its way to the Station, and may have asked the person driving to give her a seat in it. Or she may have walked as far as she can, and may have stopped to rest in some sheltered place, among the lanes to the south of this house."

"I'll inquire at the cottages, uncle, while you are gone."

"My dear child, there must be a dozen cottages, at least, within a circle of one mile from Windygates. All the inquiries would probably occupy you for the whole afternoon. I won't ask what Lady Janet would think of your being away all that time by yourself. I will only remind you of two things. You would be making a public matter of an investigation which it is essential to pursue as privately as possible; and, even if you happened to find Miss Silvester, your inquiries would be completely baffled, and you would discover nothing."

"Why not?"

"I know the Scottish peasant better than you do, Blanche. In his intelligence and his sense of self-respect he is a very different being from the English peasant. He would receive you civilly, because you are a young lady; but he would let you see, at the same time, that he considered you had taken advantage of the difference between your station and his position to come on an intrusion. And if Miss Silvester had appealed, in confidence, to his humanity, and if he had granted it, no power on earth would induce him to tell any person living that she was under his roof—without her express permission."

"But uncle—if it's of no use making inquiries of any kind, how are we to find her?"

"I don't say that nobody will answer our inquiries, my dear—I only say the peasantry won't answer them. Some of the servants are hired for their protection. The way to find her is to look on beyond what Miss Silvester may be doing at the present moment, to what she has in her mind to do. Let us say, before the day is out, 'We may assume that Miss Silvester (as has happened), that, as soon as she can leave this neighborhood, she assuredly will leave it? Do you agree, so far?'

"Yes! yes! Go on."

"Very well. She is a woman, and she is (to say the least of it) not strong. She can only leave this neighborhood either by hiring a vehicle or by traveling on the railway. I suppose you first to the Station. At the rate at which your pony goes over the ground, there is no chance, in spite of the time we have lost, of my being there as soon as she is—assuming that she leaves by the first train, up or down, that offers."

"There is a train in half an hour, uncle. She can never get there in time for that."

"She may be here sometimes before we think or she may get a lift; or she may not be alone. How do we know but somebody may have been waiting in the lane—her husband, if there is such a person—to help her? No! I shall assume she is now on her way to the Station, and I shall get there as fast as possible—"

"And stop her, if you find her there?"

"What I do, Blanche, must be left to my discretion. If I find her there, I must act for the best. If I don't find her there, I shall have reason (who goes with me) on the watch for the remaining trains that start to-night. He has

PIERRE BONAPARTE.

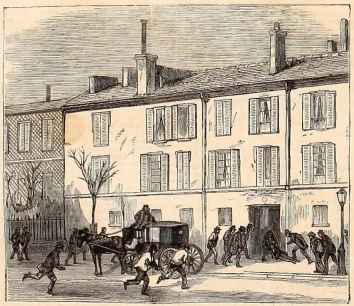
VICTOR NOIR.

PIERRE BONAPARTE AND VICTOR NOIR.

On this page will be found the portrait of Prince PIERRE NAPOLEON BONAPARTE and that of VICTOR NOIR, the journalist whom he recently quarreled with and shot. The Prince is the third son of LUCIEN, brother of NAPOLEON I., and was born at Rome in 1815. In 1832 he came to this country, to join his uncle JOSEPH, who had figured for a while as King of Spain; and from that time until the coup d'état placed the present Emperor in power he has led a wandering and adventurous career. From this country he went to Colombia, and joined the army of SANTANDER, by whom he was placed in command of a squadron. Soon after he returned to Italy, where he was regarded with disfavor by the Papal Government, which in 1836 intimated to him that he should leave the Papal States. Surrounded by a troop of mounted police, he wounded two and killed their chief; he received, however, two wounds in the encounter, and had to surrender. After a rather long detention at FORT SAINT ANGELO, in Rome, he returned to this country. He next went to England, and thence to the island of Corfu. During an excursion in Albania he had a quarrel with the Pallikares, and sustained, almost unaided, a deadly combat. The English Government having induced him to leave the Italian and Greek coasts, he left for London, after vainly offering his services to France, and to MEHEMET ALI, the Viceroy of Egypt. In 1848, on hearing the news of the revolution, he hastened to Paris, recalled to the public the life and opinions of his father (who had always entertained republican principles), and obtained a military appointment. He was elected a member of the Assembly from Corsica, and sided with the extreme republicans. The expedition to Rome received his warm opposition. He exhibited in all his conduct a self-willed, intractable disposition. In 1849 he went to Algeria, where he assisted at the first operations of the siege of Zaschta, and then, before the assault, and without permission, he returned to France. The Minister of War deprived him of his military rank, and this measure, which was followed by a duel between M. PIERRE BONAPARTE and a journalist of the extreme Right, received the express approbation of the Assembly.

Since the coup d'état, of which he did not approve, he has lived in retirement, and, though holding the rank of Prince, has not been considered as a member of the Imperial family. He is accustomed to amuse himself with literary pursuits, and writes much for the newspaper press. A controversy in a Corsican paper, in the course of which the Prince severely assailed M. ROCHEFORT, led to the quarrel which resulted in the shooting of VICTOR NOIR.

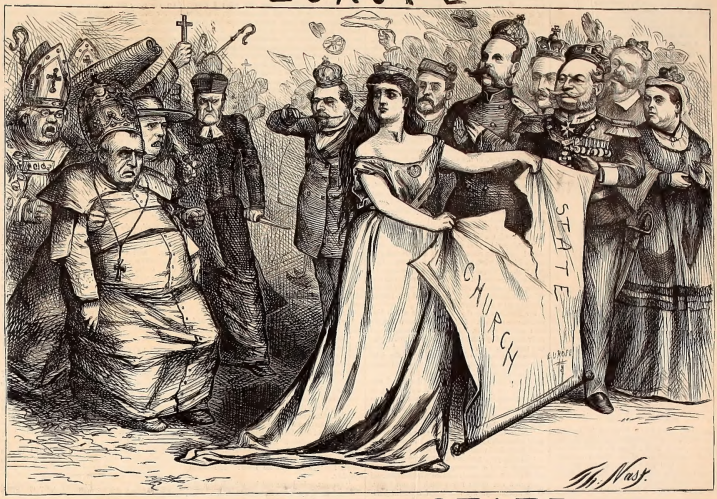
The circumstances of this tragedy are too fresh in the minds of our readers to require repetition here. The victim of the Prince was a young journalist of rare capacity attached to the Marseillaise—a political newspaper edited by M. ROCHEFORT. His murder created a profound impression in France, and but for the firmness of the Emperor, and the extraordinary military precautions taken by him to secure the tranquility of Paris, the popular excitement would, in all probability, have swelled into a revolution. The prompt arraignment of Prince BONAPARTE also, doubtless, tended to allay the resentment with which the news of the tragedy was received.



PRINCE PIERRE BONAPARTE'S RESIDENCE.

SCENE OF THE MURDER OF VICTOR NOIR.

EUROPE



CHURCH & STATE

UNITED STATES.

A LOVE-LETTER OF THE PERIOD.

DEAR WILLY,—I trust you are better,
And send the last copy of Punch.
You scarcely the time for this letter
Before Mrs. Dashaway's lunch.
Of course it's a vast deprivation,
Your absence each evening—although
The Opera brings consolation,
And parties are frequent, you know.

Your fleece quite grieves me; however,
My sympathy it won't cheer.
I'm not the least particle clever
At comforting invalids, dear.
They tell me you've threatened with—gracious!
It is such a puzzler to spell
But doctors are often fallacious,
And doubtless you'll shortly be well.

I hope, love, you have no objection
To my going out—when you're ill.
Don't take it for lack of affection,
As sometimes I leave you still.
Why can't I feel and as elsewhere
At parties as bores to my lot?
And then I love dancing so dearly!
And then—you are sick, dear, not dead.

Ah no, Willy! awful misfortune
A nature like mine truly needs.
Besides, I don't govern my actions
According to popular creeds.
Mamma means to send you some guava
Quite soon. As remir for today.
My ball-dresses came in the Juno—
Miraculous fits, by-the-way.

Which one of your sisters, dear, is it
Who makes you so splendid a nurse?
Don't ask me to pay you a visit,
Unless you're decidedly worse.
In sickness I'm utterly silly:
So spare me, I beg you—but please
Believe me forever, dear Willy,
Your very devoted
LOUISE.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Three Books.—Book IV.

CHAPTER V.

THE NEW BARONET.

VERONICA, LADY GALE, as she styled herself, was established in a handsome house, but by no means fashionable, hotel, at the West End of London. She had brought none of the Indian servants with her, and had even dismissed her French maid, and taken in her stead a middle-aged Swiss woman of staid vigilance.

For Prince Cesare de' Barletti lodgings had been found, within a convenient distance of the hotel. At these modest apartments he was known as Signor Barletti merely. And this temporary lopping of his title had been exercised at the donna's express desire, lest the glories which she had anticipated sharing with him by-and-by should be tarnished in their passage through the less comparative poverty and obscurity. Also she had explained to Cesare that the separation from such of his compatriots as he might chance to meet in London. This latter injunction, however, he had not kept to the letter.

The truth was that poor Cesare was desperately full and forlorn. His visit to Veronica was one of the most rigidly formal character, and the invariable presence of the Swiss maid during these interviews had caused some hard words to pass between the cousins.

"At Naples, at least, I could see you and speak to you, sometimes, without a hideous duenna," complained Cesare.

"At Naples things were different. Have patience. We must risk nothing by impredence. Louise understands no Italian. You can say what you please before her."

"But I hate the sight of her. Dio mio, how ugly she is!"

Then Veronica would bid him go out and amuse himself. But he found London dull and depressed his spirits with a leaden weight; that he could not speak ten words of English so as to be understood, nor understand a tithe of what was then spoken; that he could not wander about the streets all day; that he had not the heart to sort to; that London was cold, ugly, smoky, noisy, dull; and that there had not even been one fog since his arrival—a thing he had set his life longed to see.

At this climax Veronica lost patience.

"In short," she observed, disdainfully, "you are like a spoiled child, and don't know what you want."

"On the contrary, I know but too well. Cara, if I could only be with you, this cruel world pass quickly enough. But I am more banished from your society now than I was when—he was alive."

And in his utter misery he had stooped acquaintance with certain of his own countrymen, who frequented a foreign café, and smoked many a cigar with men whose superficial wealth have recruited Veronica to the quick, could she have beheld their cousin in their company. And yet the difference of a coat would have transformed some of them into as good men as he, even including the pedigree of the Barletti in the list of his advantages. But it was past the cost which Veronica would carry until have condescended to be of extreme importance.

Mr. Frost had, as he had said to Hugh Lockwood, declined to act as Veronica's legal adviser. But he had, at Cesare's request, given her the name of a respectable lawyer who would assume the responsibility of looking after her interests. Cesare could not be got to understand Mr. Frost's motives for not conducting the case himself, but Veronica declared that she understood them.

Meanwhile there had been several interviews between Mr. Lane and the respective lawyers of Sir Matthew Gale and Veronica.

Mr. Simpson, Veronica's lawyer, of course quickly perceived that the new baronet had no interest in establishing the validity of the will. If it were established, he inherited nothing beyond the entailed estate; if it were set aside, he would receive a certain proportion of the personal property. Sir Matthew's lawyer, Mr. Davis, perceived this much as soon as he was made acquainted with the contents of the will. It had been read at Mr. Lane's office, there being present Sir Matthew, Mr. Frost, and myself—which, it will be remembered, was named executor—and the two lawyers present under the will.

Mr. Simpson, a heavy, mannery, pasty-faced man, with two dull black eyes, like currants stuck in dough, contented the sons of being the Matthew acquainted with his client. Their interests were nearly identical, and he felt that it would be a desirable thing for "Lady Gale" to be recognized by the late baronet's successor. He trusted, too, to the effects of the lady's personal influence on the shy, awkward, provincial bachelor.

The meeting was consequently brought about.

"It can do you no harm to call on her, Sir Matthew," said Mr. Davis. "It would only emphasize your case to say she was Lady Tullis Gale fifty times over."

"I—I—I'll talk to do what's right. Davis. It's devilish work meddling with wills, you know."

"Meddling! my dear Sir Matthew! But this—but this either is a will, or it is not, you see. That is what we have got to prove. If it is a will, the disposition of the property must be held sacred—sacred. If it is not a will, you observe, the sentence of intestacy is to return. It is quite another matter," responded Mr. Davis, winding up a little abruptly.

Sir Matthew called at the hotel at which Veronica was staying. He was accompanied at his own request by Mr. Davis, and, on entering the their cards, they were both ushered into Veronica's presence.

She was dressed in deep mourning, of the richest materials and most elegant fashion, and looked strikingly lovely.

"I am glad to see you, Sir Matthew," she said, making him a superb courtesy, which so embarrassed him that, in his attempt to return it by as good a bow as he knew how to make, he backed into Mr. Davis, and nearly hustled him into the fire-place.

"It is naturally gratifying to me to be on such terms with my late husband's kinsfolk," continued Veronica, when the two men were seated.

"Thank you, ma'am—I mean my—my lady," said Sir Matthew, blushing. "I—I—I—cannot mind what we're about, and do what's right and all that, when you're looking at me, you know. That was always my rule when I was in business."

"An excellent rule!"

"Yes. And as to your law—as to Sir John Gale's family lawyer, I—I—I—I've got very much good of them from him, ma'am. My cousin John was an overweening kind of a man, and we come of a family that—that—I—I—"

"Certainly."

"Yes. We come of the same stock. There's no doubt of that in the world."

Sir Matthew rubbed his knee round and round with his handkerchief, which he had doubled up into a ball for the purpose; and looked at every part of the room save that in which Veronica was seated.

She was in her element. Here was an opportunity to exhibit her tact, to manage. The man was vulgar, rather mean, and not overwise. No matter, he could be made to admire her—and he should.

It was already evident that Sir Matthew had not exposed to his lawyer the existence of any lady in the person who claimed to be his cousin's widow. The history of her relations with Sir John was known to Mr. Davis, but was conjured up by such a history in the mind of a man like Matthew Gale was not at variance with Veronica's manners and aspect.

"I am sorry that Sir John was not on terms with his very few surviving relations," she said, with the least possible touch of hauteur. "You see his path in life had been very different from theirs."

"So much the better for them, if all tales be true!" exclaimed Sir Matthew, who had now screwed his handkerchief into a rope, and was twisting his knee with it.

Veronica was not embarrassed by having to meet his eyes, for he turned them studiously away from her. Her object was gained. She knew she answered, quietly, "Family differences are of all others the most difficult of adjustment. I have never entered into them. I am sorry they may be friends."

She said the words with such an air of infinite condescension—of almost protecting good-nature, that Sir Matthew felt himself obliged to reply, "Oh, that's nothing. I'm sure I'm very lady!"

Mr. Davis was lost in admiration of this young woman's talents. "Why, she might have been a duchess, or any thing else she liked!" thought he, marking the impression she had ruled on Mr. Frost's dictum, that if her marriage could be proved to be valid, there would be no further question of the will. And she rested all her hopes on this point.

"I shan't litigate," said Sir Matthew, quickly. "I don't see what I've got to litigate about. It's bit of money that would come to me wouldn't be worth it. For there's lots of second, and third, and maybe fourth cousins, for what I know, that 'll turn up to divide the property, if it is to be divided. And my motto always has been, 'Keep out of the way of the law.' You'll excuse me, Mr. Davis!" And Sir Matthew laughed with a dim sense of having made a joke, and having in some way got the better of his attorney.

The only person that has any thing to go to law about, is Mr. Lane. I can say," said Sir Matthew, after a minute's pause, "is the person that has been appointed under the will! This Mrs. Desmond. I don't know why my cousin John should have gone and left all his money to his wife's niece. I'm sure he was no kind of her family, nor of her, during his lifetime! And I fancy they looked down on her. I suppose he did it just to spite his own relations."

Veronica was silent.

"Oh, I've said my piece," pursued Sir Matthew, "if there's some one else that wouldn't much like the will to be set aside—that's Mr. Lane. He's executor, and a legatee, besides, to the tune of a couple of thousand pounds."

"Mr. Lane appears to be an honest, upright person," said Veronica. "I have seen him once or twice. And he speaks very reasonably."

Mr. Davis glanced piercingly at Veronica.

"Oh," said he," your ladyship finds Mr. Lane reasonable?"

At this moment the door was opened, and Cesare walked into the room. He stared a little at the two men because of whom he had ever been before. But Veronica hastily informed him, in Italian, who the visitors were, and turning to Sir Matthew, presented Cesare to him as "My cousin, Prince Cesare de' Barletti."

Cesare bowed, and said, "Ow-de-doo?"

Sir Matthew bowed, and said nothing; but he was considerably impressed by Cesare's title.

"Oh, I didn't know," he stammered; "I was not aware—I mean I had never heard that you were—connected with foreigners, ma'am, so to speak."

"My mother," said Veronica, with powerful nonchalance, "was a daughter of the house of Barletti. The principality is in the south of the Neapolitan dominions."

"Oh, really!" said Sir Matthew.

Mr. Simpson informed me that he was to have an interview with Miss Desmond's guardian to-day," said Mr. Davis, addressing Veronica.

"Her—guardian!" said Sir Matthew, blankly.

The word had sent a shock through her frame. Maud's guardian! Why that was her father! "Is he here?" she asked, quickly.

"Oh, yes. Did you not know? It is a Mr. Lovegrove, of Frost and Lovegrove. A very well-known firm."

"Ah! Oh yes, I understand."

"Mr. Lovegrove acts for Miss Desmond, I understand. Do you know if Mr. Simpson has seen at the Admiralty since last saw him?" inquired the other day that the Faribond was paid off at Portsmouth last week."

"I believe he has," answered Veronica, faintly.

"Then, madam, I make bold to say that, under the offer now determined to litigate on all hazards, you will soon be put out of suspense."

Cesare's ear had caught the faint tones of Veronica's voice, and Cesare's anxious eye had marked her pallor and agitation as the prospect of Maud's return to her fate was placed before her. He came immediately to her side. "Thou art not well, dearest," he said, in his own language.

"Yes, quite well. Don't make a scene, Cesare! I will tell you my room for a smelling-bottle, and come back directly."

"Can I not help you?"

"No. Stay here."

And Veronica, with a murmured apology to Sir Matthew, left the room.

"Is my thing the matter with Lady—with your—with the lady?" asked Sir Matthew.

Cesare, left alone with the two Englishmen, felt himself called upon to make a great conversational effort. He inflated his chest slowly, and answered:

"She—your—fortune—it—suit."

"Eh?" exclaimed Sir Matthew, staring at him.

"English suit. Sale inglese. Come si dice?"

In his despair Cesare raised his closed fist to his nose and gave a prolonged sniff.

"Ah!" said Mr. Davis, with a shrewd nir. "To be sure: snuffing suits. Eh? Headache?"

"Yes—and pain."

"Poor lady! She has been a good deal excited. Her position is a very trying one."

"Very well, I guess. A good deal to Sir Matthew's bewilderment. But Cesare merely inclined his person and was silent.

Sir Matthew would have liked to strike into the conversation himself, but was withheld by an embarrassing ignorance of the proper form in which to address Barletti. He could not certainly call him "Prince," and was, moreover, deliberating on the propriety of saying signor which was his notion of pronouncing the Italian for "sir"—when Veronica returned.

She looked a changed creature. Her cheeks were flushed, and her eyes extraordinarily luminous.

"Hope you're better, ma'am," said Sir Matthew.

"Thank you. I have been suffering a little from headache. But it is not severe. I must have patience. My nerves have been greatly shattered."

Her tone was so plaintive, and her face so beautiful, as she said this, that Sir Matthew began to feel a strong indignation against his dead cousin, who could find it in his heart to deceive so charming a creature.

"I—I hope it will come right for you," he said. "I do, upon my soul!"

"I only ask for justice, Sir Matthew. I have undergone great and unmerited suffering. But on that topic my lips are sealed."

Sir Matthew thought this very noble, and looked at Mr. Davis for sympathy. But the attorney was gazing at Veronica, with eyes in whose expression admiration was blended with a kind of watchful curiosity.

By the time the visit was brought to a close the new baronet was completely converted into the partisan of at his cousin's widow," as he now markedly entitled her.

"I say more of all the sort of person I had expected," he said to Mr. Davis, as they walked away together.

"Is she not, Sir Matthew?"

"And that cousin of hers—I suppose he is such a prince, eh?"

"I suppose so—an Italian prince."

"Yes, of course. Well, it isn't for the sake of the share of the money that I would come to me—I've got the entailed estate, and no thanks to my cousin John either! He would have left it away from me if he could. No, it isn't for that; but I do hope her marriage will turn out to be all right."

"It can not be long before we know, Sir Matthew."

"Well, I do hope it will come right for her. My cousin John behaved shamefully to her. He did his best to split his own family into bargain. And I don't mind saying that I should be glad if it turned out to be the case of the bitter last. Only," he added, after a minute's pause, during which he grew almost frightened at his own unaccustomed boldness, "only of course we mustn't go and be rash, and get ourselves into any trouble. As a will's a will, you know."

"Why that is just what remains to be seen, Sir Matthew."

LOVE AND PATIENCE.

By JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

THERE was a birthday party given in one of the streets crossing Fifth Avenue—indeed the inmates of the house, if ambitious of gentility, might almost claim to live in Fifth Avenue—to celebrate another anniversary in the life of one of the daughters. It was a pleasant party, although that story-teller was one of the guests. There was quite a pretty little ceremony—is it of American society, or old English, Knickerbocker, or German?—which consisted in the distribution of the birthday-cake, cut up into luscious compounding in small boxes, for the eyes of the young lady whose nativity were we celebrating. Each portion—there were seventeen of them—was presented by a "young" guest, of the Christmas-tree family, set on a silver wire, on wire stands, on the pieces of cake, and the taper lighting like a little social glow-worm. There was a sort of graceful competition for the honor of receiving one of these presents—for the guests were many and the young lady's years were few—which doubtless the gentlemen observed something like an order of seniority. On this principle it was (ehem!) only too natural that the narrator should receive a portion, to the exclusion of some disappointed competitors who, had Virgil's rule been in force, would, fortunate, if they did but appreciate the luck of their fewer years. Many a pretty little speech was made, many a sweet voice was raised by those who received the sweet and flaming fragments, and by those who did not; and many kisses were given to the heroine of the day by the matrons and maids around. One of the latter class, in the act of kissing, especially attracted my attention by the gracefulness of her form and her movements, by the delicate and singular beauty of her face, the expression of which, and refinement in her eyes. I was, indeed, so much struck by her that I could not help asking my hostess who she was; and this led to my being presented to her, and our gliding into a conversation which lasted for the rest of the night. I had got a fragment of the cake and she had not, and my condescension, therefore, was surprisingly unanimous offer to resign my possession in her favor. I soon found that she was a girl of remarkable intelligence and cultivation of mind—in variety, and evidently a good deal of character.

And to this last quality I had received my morsel of birthday-cake, some one of the wisest gear me was shaken suddenly against me by the pressure of the little crowd around, and by shoving fragment, my fire-fly of confectionery, was nearly stood. The person who thus came into collision with me was beginning a courteous and earnest apology, when he and I broke into a mutual consciousness of recognition and a friendly greeting. I recognized and was glad to meet young Herman Oppenheim, whom I had known in London. He was a musician, a pianist of rare and brilliant promise, and he had known a little of me, and we found culture. He had often been brought by this friend and that to a literary and artistic club of which I was a member, and I liked him much. But he did not get on in London somehow. It is terribly up-hill work there for a young Bohemian musician to make any way, and poor Herman suffered many disappointments and trials, against which he bore up with a cheerful, though, thoroughly Teutonic perseverance. But the Danco-German war brought up the furious, unreasoning ephemeral passion of the English public mind against every thing German, especially every thing Prussian; and Oppenheim was more sensitive about his country than about himself. He writhed under the injuries of modern Germany by English journalists and politicians, and I had often heard him vow that if he could only get money enough to pay off some debts, and enable him to provide for a passage across the Atlantic and a new start in life, he would try his chances in America. So when he vanished out of the clutch where I used to meet him I assumed that he was gone to the United States, and presently forgot him. We forget each other terribly soon in London.

I was surprised and pleased to meet him again. We had no time just then for explanations or long talk; but we exchanged promises of a speedy meeting and full confidences.

Let me now come back to my friend the pianist, the beautiful and intellectual Augusta Fielden. In the course of our conversation I told her of the odd and unexpected chance which had brought me here face to face with my friend the musician; and as he happened to pass across the room at that moment, I pointed him out to her.

Herrman was a handsome, dark-eyed youth, with the true artistic mould of head and face. Except that he was much taller, he looked very like a young English poet who has had the fortune to be more warmly praised and more bitterly denounced than even poets commonly win. I made mention of this fact to Miss Fielden as I called her attention to my friend.

To my surprise, the young lady's face crimsoned, and her eyelids drooped, and she seemed quite discomposed and almost agitated.

"I know that gentleman," she said, in a somewhat tremulous voice; "that is, I have met him, but I do not expect to see him here."

And now Herrman Oppenheim had seen her, and his pale face glowed as brightly as hers, and he came to a full stop, and his eyes sparkled; and he seemed uncertain whether to come over to us or to pass us by; and in truth he was greatly agitated; and, as Miss Miggs would say, "here's mysteries!"

"Will you introduce your friend? I should be glad if you would," Miss Fielden said.

"But I thought you knew him?"

"Yes, oh yes; I do, of course; we have met. He was in the steamer in which we came from Europe; but we were not exactly introduced, and if you would rather——"

"Of course I shall be delighted."

So I crossed the room, and said to my friend: "Come with me, Herrman. I want to introduce you to Miss Augusta Fielden."

"Oh, thank you, my dear old friend, thousand thanks! True, good friend!" Herrman whispered, with an earnestness that was quite passionate; and he opened my hand with force. Truly an unexpected and wonderful amount of gratitude for a favor which cost me so little to bestow.

As I presented Oppenheim I observed that he almost trembled, and that Miss Augusta was hardly less agitated. One glance that passed between them might have made the dullest observer, placed so closely and favorably as I, suspect some love-mystery. I left them together. Herrman sat beside her for a while, and then spoke in low tones; then some one else came up, and my friend resigned his place sadly. I would have sworn him out that our friendship was interrupted but, and begged him to play something on the piano. He played superbly, and I knew full well that he made the instrument just now the bearer of many a message to Miss Fielden, which probably he could not put into words. He played a selection of morceaux, apparently taken at random—Mendelssohn's, as to which Heine has the tender, thrilling words, "Ich weiss mein Schmerzen;" passages from Beethoven's Adelaide; passionate love-songs from Mozart and Meyerbeer—all that he played but one prolonged, ever-varying monologue of love. I glanced more than once almost involuntarily to where Miss Fielden was sitting; and though her eyes were downcast, and her whole attitude check had regained their composure, I knew that her soul accepted and rejoiced in the message: and that here was a true crowning success, here in the centre of this brilliant commonplace, a love-drama was going on, with Herrman Oppenheim and Augusta Fielden for actors, and myself for the one only spectator.

Something disagreeable presently occurred—something which reminded me of an incident in "Martin Chuzzlewit," and only that one other thing in is discreditable to any of the persons involved. Among the many listeners who expressed the highest admiration for Herrman's playing, one of the warmest in her praises was Mrs. Fielden, mother of Augusta. Mrs. Fielden was, I had already found out, a sort of queen of society in this particular circle—a woman of wealth and station and ambition, who ruled her husband and her set. Our hostess hastened to present Herrman to her. Herrman was confused, embarrassed, could hardly speak; while Mrs. Fielden kindly patronized him and his glorious art, as if the latter were something of the cause of his embarrassment.

"His manners are awkward," said Mrs. Fielden, when he had called back. She was addressing herself partly to me, partly to our hostess. "I think I have seen his face somewhere before now."

"Why, certainly," said the hostess, with a simile. "He was a fellow-passenger of yours. He came over with you in the Wizer when you were returning from your European tour."

"Oh no, certainly not. He was not one of the passengers."

"Indeed yes."

"Did he say so?"

"He did, and so did your daughter Augusta."

"My daughter told you so?"

"Yes, dear, she did."

Mrs. Fielden looked as amazed and angry that I thought it best to interpose and hazard an explanation.

"The truth is," I said, "that I fancy my friend Herrman Oppenheim was, like many other young artists, very poor when in London; and I dare say he roughed it, poor fellow, and came out in the fore-part of the steamer; and Miss Fielden may have chanced to see him."

Mrs. Fielden's brow ceased to look angry, and became compassionate. She was not like the people in "Martin Chuzzlewit." She was a lady, and, with all her pride and her love of supremacy, she had a heart. "Poor fellow!" she said; "I hope he is doing well now. I am sure he has talents entitling him to success;" and I noticed that she soon after addressed herself to some young musician, and was especially kind and gracious to that youngster.

I walked with my friend Herrman some part of the way home that night, and heard a little of his history since his leaving London. He had now been a few months in New York, and he had found, as I expected, that he had a long battle to do pretty well, and to have a tolerably fair prospect. About his previous acquaintance with Augusta Fielden he was very reticent, telling more than most of his countrymen would have been; but time was enough. He saw her for the first time on board the steamer. He had, as I guessed, taken a passage in the emigrants' part of the vessel. The emigrants were mostly Germans; and he used to beguile the time for many of them, when the sea was tolerably calm, by playing on the flute and the cornet-à-piston, or any such instruments he was nearly as skilful a performer on as the piano. Some time after we left the exquisite music, Miss Fielden and one or two of the other cabin-passengers had often joined the circle in the fore-part of the vessel. It was there that very soon found out that Herrman was an artist, and was overjoyed to find that there was a pianoforte. She was a candid, fearless, true-hearted American girl; and I fancy they had many a walk along the deck, and many a pleasant evening under the dazzling reshing waves and up to the starry skies, while Herrman played and sang, and occasionally, in the lighted saloon below. Then the voyage came to an end, and they parted, each feeling somewhat as if they were about to be impressed—which one at least would not acknowledge even to herself—unreasonably too poor, too proud, too sadly uncertain of his future, to dare any attempt to keep up the acquaintance; and they had not met again until Herrman brought them together at the birthday party.

After that Mrs. Fielden herself took up the young musician quite enthusiastically. She praised him, patronized him, pushed him every-where—called him "our Herrman," and extremely kind to him. She gave brilliant receptions on Friday evenings throughout the winter, and my friend Herrman was asked to one of these always. Indeed, he was now in a fair way to make quite a little income as a pianoforte player. Mrs. Fielden never thought of him in any other capacity.

Nor her daughter, as I at least could see; and others too, doubtless. Herrman Oppenheim and Augusta Fielden met regularly in society, and each other as any two beings I ever saw. I have indeed Nature seemed to have made them to be each other's mates. Their mutual love was beautiful, so highly gifted with artistic tastes and sympathies.

Herrman made me his confidant, told me of his passion, his hopes, his fears, and asked for my advice. He had now been a year in town, and declared his love to Miss Fielden, although he felt little doubt as to what her answer would be; for he knew that she loved him, and that his suit would be graciously and cordially received.

I do not know whether it would have made any difference in the end if Mrs. Fielden had before Herrman received to open the subject to Mrs. Fielden herself, or any member of her family. I told the latter that somebody in New York so very was talking of Augusta's marriage to the young pianist as quite a settled affair. Perhaps this did not substantially change the condition of things; but it greatly affected Mrs. Fielden's manner of dealing with my unlucky friend. His love for her daughter, which she fitted was presumptuous or dismissed of, seemed now not merely a piece of unwarrantable audacity, but an act of downright treachery and treachery. She did not wait for any proposal or explanation from him, but wrote him a bitter, passionate letter, refusing him all acquaintance with her daughter, telling him with an exuberance to delude her daughter into marriage for the sake of the daughter's fortune, and forbidding him ever to enter her house again.

This letter was late in reaching Herrman. I have heard that letters sent by the New York post-office are not uncommonly a little slow in reaching their destination. Herrman was now a day to see Mrs. Fielden, quite resolved to tell her of his love and ask her for her hand, entirely ignorant of the fact that she had already sent him an insulting dismissal. She was just descending from her own room to enter the drawing-room to come up. Her daughter and two other ladies were with her. Mrs. Fielden was wholly her self-temper, forgot her good sense, and all feelings of propriety. She assailed the poor artist with indignant, scornful, insulting words, and bade him never again to come near the house, and then got into her carriage and left him planted là, bewildered, speechless, burning with shame and disappointment and passion.

Not one word had Augusta uttered. He told me that she stood pale, silent, cold, with no gleam of emotion apparent on her face. No glance of sympathy or pity or reward turned upon him to help him to bear his grief and his humiliation. She never looked at him—and so she left him.

He sent for me that evening and poured out the story of his repulse and his degradation, and the bitter pangs of his deceived and wounded love. I thought none the less of him because he laid his head on the table and burst into a passion of tears. Men in England don't shed tears; neither, I suppose, do American men. We surely no matter what agonies, and no locker-on ever sees the tears that flow from our eyes. But the man, the Frenchman, the Italian are as brave as we are, and they will think no shame to cry like children, before no matter what spectators. A rod of fate and misfortune has stricken the soul of the man, and tears sharp enough to cut like the waters flow. They do not suffer more keenly than we do, but we say stronger than they, only we have our different ways. I am not any thing but a Mars in bravery; yet I don't think I should mind much the hearing of a multitude if I received a wound; and Homer's we read rousing under such provocation louder than a herd of bulls of Bashan.

I did my best to console my hapless friend. Every body knows how valuable ordinary words of solution is under such circumstances, and what an immediate and magical effect it has in reconciling one sufferer to his fate. I preached to him of the notorious incontancy and perfidy of women; showed him that they were not worth a loss than to win a heartless girl; diluted on the danger of ill-assorted marriages; pointed out that sometimes there probably were in the world better worthy of his love than the cold and cruel Augusta. I reminded him that there are many cases in which, according to Lucretius, disappointment is ever so much better than success—and so on. He was as much consoled by this wisdom as any body else under the circumstances would have been. Probably he did not listen to much of it. Even while I was busy trying to assuage his grief I kept thinking to myself that I should like to see Augusta Fielden by every such effort to diminish, by mere words, the reality of a human sorrow. I sincerely pitied my friend, but I was constantly forbear to "argue with the inexorable." Indeed, I was making up my mind that the best thing I could do was to get him out and leave him alone to wrestle with his misery or to succumb to it.

He left me, and soon aroused him. He noticed to me to open the door—indeed he, the poor fellow, could do nothing for us. A letter for him, addressed in a woman's handwriting, was brought to me. I gave it to him; he started at the sight of it, tore it open, read it with trembling, eager haste, and read it once and again, and smote the table, and sprang to his feet, and flung his arms up to-ward heaven, and confronted other such wild feats expressive of ecstasy and rapture.

"She is mine!" he exclaimed, his eyes flashing and his lips quivering; "was there ever so generous and noble a being? Ah, how cruelly I have misunderstood her and wronged her! Can I ever forgive myself? Read, read, my friend, that I am right that you should read it—you must read it."

So I took the letter and read:

"Mrs. Fielden is unlucky, Herrman, when you were insulted; I could not speak then. But if you are willing to be my husband I love you! I love you! Ishall bless all the world; and if you will have me for a wife, I will be your wife. Come to me, dear, dear Herrman, to-morrow, and I will marry you to-morrow, in the face of all the world, if you wish it. Come to-morrow, and I will be yours, in any time, always, I am, with undying love, your own

"AUGUSTA."

I confess that, as I read that letter, I was more moved than when I looked on the young man's agony and despair.

"Generous!" I said, "for the sake of that sweet and noble girl, you must do nothing rash. You must wait. Time will settle all this, and you will be happy yet."

"My friend," he replied, with a sweet, sad smile, "I have nothing to wait for but misery myself, but only of her. I will strive for my success for her, wait for her. One who has the love of such a girl can afford to be patient with fortune—for her sake."

I did not see, or wish to see, the letter he wrote in reply to Augusta. I could well imagine how tender, fervid, passionate would be the love it breathed; how noble and manly, generous, and denying resolve is expressed. The lovers waited. Augusta had told her mother fearlessly and calmly that she had loved the artist, that she had always love him, and that she would wait for him. Her mother smiled with pitying incredulity, and looked with confidence for the change a season or two would make. The seasons went, and the change made not the slightest way to her purpose. This pair of lovers never met, never tried to renew their love by any things clandestine. So long as Augusta remained a minor, and under the guardianship of her mother (her father had died before Herrman), they resolved that they would, thus far at least, respect infinitely the parental authority. They lived for each other wholly separated; they lived almost literally on love. "Love and Patience," Herrman said to me, cheerily, one day, "against any two parents."

Need I say that Love and Patience conquered? Mrs. Fielden was not an unkind or ungenerous woman at heart. She looked one day at her daughter's pale, melancholy face and sorrow, and then whispered:

"Augusta, my child, you still, then, love him?"

"Still love him! I shall never cease to love him."

Her mother kissed her, and straightway wrote to Herrman:

"Come and see her! I am defeated! I thought I was acting for her happiness; and now I know I was not. Come and see her, and take her. I fully believe you deserve your victory and all your reward. Forgive me, if I have been cruel to you for so long."

Soon after I read that my friend Herrman were married.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

It was an Irishman who wrote to his son in the "auld country:" "Come till America, Mike. It's a mane country to get a living in. All you have to do is to get a three-cornered box and fill it with tea and carry it till the top of a three-story building, and the man at the top does all the work." It was sardonic of the same nationality who, hearing that his widowed mother had married again, since he quitted Ireland, wrote to her: "Mother, I hope she won't have a son older than me; if she does, I shall lose the property."

"I suppose," said a quack, while feeling the pulse of a patient who had recently submitted ex officio his advice—"I suppose you've had a doctor?" "Yes, once a country to get a living in. All you have to do is to get a three-cornered box and fill it with tea and carry it till the top of a three-story building, and the man at the top does all the work." It was sardonic of the same nationality who, hearing that his widowed mother had married again, since he quitted Ireland, wrote to her: "Mother, I hope she won't have a son older than me; if she does, I shall lose the property."

A lady leaving home was thus addressed by her little boy: "Mamma, will you remember and buy me a penny whistle, and let it be a religious one, so that I can use it once on Sunday."

RECIPE TO AVOID DISPEPSIA—Don't take any.

A Cincinnati paper advertises for "girls for cooking." An economical reader replies: "I will send him mine raw, when you get accustomed to them."

A negro clergyman addressed his congregation thus: "I speak dese words to you and sisters; you mustn't be offended for dem de gospel." Every bell: I shall ask you to speak to me, and, if you do, make no sense but on your own."

"My dear wife," as the man said when he looked at the last milliner's bills.

A sailor explains the distribution of prize-money to his shipmates: "It is difficult to divide, for the bills through goes to the officers; what sticks the men gets."

A wag recently appended to the list of market regulations of Cincinnati "No whistling near the sausage stalls."

"Gently the dews are o'er me stealing," as the man said when he had five dos bills presented to him at once.

A gentleman mentioned to a witty friend that he had been engaged to the ninth, and was wet through. "Are you really wet through?" said the wit. "I was never wet through in my life—never further than my skin."

What class ought never to die with confusion? Merchants and bankers, for they fail regularly.

A DRAMATIC SWEETMEAT.—Venice Preserved.

"Isn't your bill awfully steep?" inquired a speculator of his tailor. "You ought to know best, for it is not the up to you," was the reply. Sharp rejoinder.

Josh Billings says that cod-fish are better than umbrellas to keep you dry.

GOOD FABLOR GAME FOR THE SEASON.—Courting.

A GOOD SPECIMEN.—One who "chirels" his landlord out of his board.

The reason why whales frequent the arctic seas is probably because they supply the "northern lights" with oil.

A young lady in California broke her neck while relishing the attempt of a young man to kiss her. Young ladies should be very careful not to resist such attempts. It is extremely dangerous.

A NEVADA CITY merchant advertises: "Old rags of genuine linen wanted—cash paid. Cheap photographs, tearfully accepted in payment for stock."

HOW TO PET DOWN WHISKY.—Drink it.

Alluding to chignons, Mr. Grace Greenwood, "A girl, now, needs a head." Yes, till you talk to her," replied Mr. Clever.

"Great heavens!" cried a hair-brown bully of Denver, "I never met a stranger yet that came to take a drink with him.—" Great heavens! am I never to come to a drink with you?" replied a stranger to himself.

A New York pre-cast vendor declares that "every fine people eats more as plain day," and it is therefore supposed that he is a provider of sprinkling.

Take a little wife,
The prettier the better;
Put her third in a carriage,
She wants to kiss you—let her.

Keep her by the side
There she'll cook your mutton;
Love her with a will,
If she's worth a button.

Never mind the fuss
Of her aunts and cousins;
Ask them to "stop to tea"
Dine them all by dozens.

One of these odd days
You'll find you like each taller,
When you see her hug
An overgrown baby-stroller.

One of Mark Twain's farmers bought some Bartlett pear-trees, and the next season he took some of the fruit to the village store, and asked: "Can you get rid of them?" "Certainly, I will," was the cautious reply. "But they grow on one of the trees in my orchard." "Ah, I see you own a flock," was the dealer's convincing rejoinder, "as to suppose that I can't get rid of pears because they grow the first year?"

Why can not a deaf man be legally condemned for murder?—Because the law says no man can be convicted without a hearing.

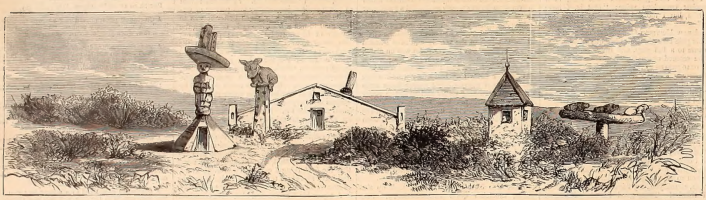
During a fire starlight evening lately, a three-year old philosopher, after a silent and apparently profound scrutiny of the heavens, asked his mother, abruptly, where the stars came from. Mamma replied: "I don't know, Willie—I don't know where the stars come from." Well, you bet I do. The moon laid 'em." This was a settler for mamma.

CHICAGO FASHIONS.—Diverce suits.

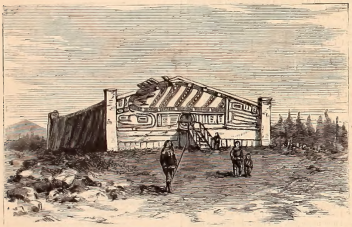
The story of a man who had a nose so large that he couldn't blow it without the use of gunpowder is said to be a lie.

CENTENARIAN.—A fellow who has "sixty a cent."

THE UNITED STATES MILITARY POST AT WRANGEL, ALASKA.—FROM A SKETCH BY VINCENT COLYER.—[SEE PAGE 125.]



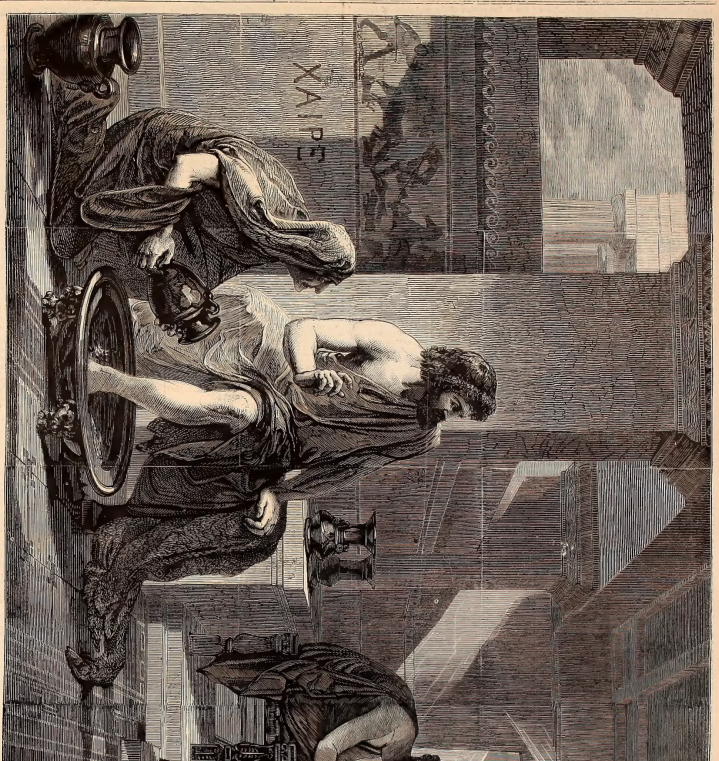
INDIAN HOUSE AND MONUMENTS AT WRANGEL, ALASKA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY VINCENT COLYER.]



A CHIEF'S HOUSE, WRANGEL, ALASKA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY VINCENT COLYER.]

INTERIOR OF INDIAN HUT, WRANGEL, ALASKA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY VINCENT COLYER.]

INDIAN VILLAGE AT WRANGEL, ALASKA.—FROM A SKETCH BY VINCENT COLYER.—[SEE PAGE 125.]



ULYSSES AND HIS NURSE.—[FROM A PAINTING BY MR. F. T. GOODALL.]

ULYSSES AND HIS NURSE.

ON this page we give an engraving from an historical painting by MR. F. T. GOODALL, which received the prize gold medal and £50 scholarship from the English Royal Academy at the last biennial competition of the students. The artist, a young man of high promise, is the son of MR. FREDERICK GOODALL, the eminent Academician, and grandson of MR. EDWARD GOODALL, whose engravings of TURNER'S pictures are so justly celebrated. The subject selected by the Academy for the last competition was drawn from the "Odyssey"—the return of ULYSSES to his native Ithaca, and his recognition by his old nurse, EURYCLEA, his foster-mother. Readers of HOMER will not require to be told how dramatic is this situation, and our engraving will convey some idea of how faithfully the poet's description has been realized by the young painter.

ULYSSES, after his twenty years' wandering, had at last landed at Ithaca, assuming the disguise of a beggar in order to take revenge on the insolent suitors, and thus deceiving his faithful PENELOPE; he had given her a fictitious account of his adventures, assuring her that he had formerly entertained her husband in Crete, describing his person and dress, and affirming that his return was certain within a month. Full of gratitude and admiration of the wisdom and gentle manners of the poor guest, PENELOPE had ordered him a bath, with EURYCLEA as attendant. During the performance of this hospitable rite the already aroused suspicions of the old nurse are suddenly changed into certainty at sight of the scar left on ULYSSES'S leg from a wound received as a youth in a boar-hunt on Mount Parnassus, and which he vainly sought to conceal by turning from the light of the blazing fire. The stern enjoinder of ULYSSES on his foster-mother to preserve the secret she had surprised, lest she should discover him to PENELOPE and mar his plot of vengeance, brings us to the moment selected for representation. The situation is rendered by MR. GOODALL with great dramatic effect. The accessories are well considered, and harmonize admirably with the principal group.

SKETCHES IN ALASKA.

ON page 124 will be found a series of interesting sketches by VINCENT COLYER, in and around the Indian village at Wrangel, Alaska, which was recently bombarded by the military commandant at that post. The settlement, he informs us, was a well-built village of about thirty-five houses, and contained 150 inhabitants, men, women, and children. The houses were built of hewn timber, 30 by 50 feet, well morticed together, and were subdivided into smaller apartments for families. MR. COLYER explains that the village was only about 500 yards from the post, of which we give an engraving, and as there were not over seventy-five able-bodied men in the village, it is certainly remarkable that the commandant of the post, who had a company of well-armed soldiers under his orders, should resort to bombardment, instead of taking a squad of men and making arrests. The villagers, MR. COLYER thinks, will now be afraid to occupy their houses again for the winter, and will be great sufferers by this act of the commandant.

Our sketch of the house of the Indian chief shows the style of architecture employed in the better class of dwellings in the village. It belonged to a chief named STILLAT, and at the time of the bombardment was occupied by his widow. The front is curiously ornamented with paint and rude carving. In the vicinity of the house belonging to the principal chief, who bears the name of "Snake," are various carved objects of grotesque shape and rude workmanship, which are shown in our engraving. One of these figures is that of a bear reposing on a stump, the holes in the sides being supposed to represent his tracks. On the platform on the right of the picture rest the figures of three colossal frogs. The small building near the platform is a burial-place or tomb.

The village, as our engraving shows, was beautifully situated on the shore, within the edge of the forest, with a magnificent back-ground of mountains in the distance. The mountains were quite, however, and well-disposed toward the whites, and it is very much to be regretted that the commander of the post should not have been more judicious in his treatment of them.

OLD LADIES.

THE world is notoriously unjust to its veterans, and above all it is unjust to its ancient females. Every year, and fresh all the year, old woman has been taken to express the last stage of uselessness and exhaustion; and while a meeting of bearded dotards goes by the name of a council of sages, and its deliberations are respected accordingly, a congregation of palsied matrons is nothing but a congregation of old women, whose thoughts and opinions on any subject whatsoever have no more value than the chattering of so many magpies. In fact, the poor old ladies have had a time of it; and by the time at it is its right light, perhaps nothing proves more thoroughly the course of the world than the steam respecting women than this disdain which they excite when they are old. And yet what charming old ladies one has known at times; women quite as charming in their own way as seventy a their grand-daughters at the same age been, and all the more so because they have no design n w to be charming, because they have given up the attempt to please the fickle goddess of praise, and long since have consented to become physically old, though they have not been drifted into impertinence or neglect. While retaining the intellectual vivacity and active sympathies of maturity, they have added the dignity of ness, the mellowness, the tempering got only from experience and advancing age; they are women who have seen and known and read a great deal, and who have suffered much, but whose sorrows and whose intellectual power make them—rather have made them even more sympathetic with the sorrows of others, and yield for all the better. They have lived long and lived down all their own trivials, and have come out into peace on the other side of life, to remember the trials of the fiery passage, and they feel for those who have still to bear the pressure of the pain that they have overcome. Those old women touch me with in society; they are of the kind which gently stays at home, and sees all the world come to them. They have done with the hurry and glitter of life, and they no longer crave to carry their parts abroad: they are certain their hold on the affections of their kind, they take an interest in the lives of their children, the progress of the day, but they rest tranquil and content by their own fireside, and they sit to receive, but do not go to gather. There is a fashionable old lady who haunts the theatres and drawing-rooms, bowgirdled, bejewelled, painfully in her vain attempts to appear young, hideous in her frenzied clutch at the pleasures meting her; but there is something in her wild rush on a life that is passing away from her so rapidly, known nothing of the quiet dignity and happiness of the maiden sister who has been wise enough to renounce before she lost. In her own house, where you gather a small knot of men of mind and women of character, where the young bring their perplexities and the matter-of-fact their thoughts, the dear old lady of ripe experience and loving sympathies and cultivated intellect holds a better court than is known to any of those miserable old creatures who prowl about the gay places of the world, and wrestle with the young for their graces and garlands—fierce competitive monsters of womanhood who will not grow old and who can not become old. But the old lady, the kind of old lady extant, answering to the assertion of classic times—to the Mother in Israel before whom the tribes made obeisance in token of respect; the woman whose book of life has been well studied and closely read, and kept clean in all its pages. She has been no prude, however, and no mere bleacher. She must have been, with another color; that is, she must have known many things of joy and grief, and have had the fountain of the sensations in her ever wise and good she may be, as a spinster she has had only half a life; and it is the best half which has been refused her. How can she be a mother, when they come to her in their troubles, how draw and a kindly will have counsel for her, if she has never passed through the same circumstance? Theoretic comfort is all very well, but one word of experience outweighs many volumes of counsel based on general principles and a lively imagination.

One type of old lady, growing yearly scarcer, is the old lady of Radical political tendencies based on the doctrines of Voltaire and the Rights of Man—the old lady who talks of the French Revolution as if it was yesterday, and who has heard so often of the Porteus mob from poor papa that one would think she had assisted at the hanging herself. She is an infinitely old woman, for the most part bird-like, chirpsy, and wonderfully alive. She has never gone beyond her early teaching, but is a fossil Radical of the old school. She is an irreligious old creature, and scoffs with more cleverness than grace at every thing new or earnest; she would as fat see Socrates swimpers at once as think any thing good mommery they call Ritualism; and Romanism In her version of the unchaining of Satan. As for science—well, it is all very wonderful, but more wonderful she thinks than true; and she can not quite make up her mind about the spectroscope or the protoplasm. Of the two, the protoplasm commends itself most to her imagination, for private reasons of her own connected with the Zoological; but these things are not so much in her line as Voltaire and Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley and Tom Paine, and she is content to abide by her ancient loves, and to cherish the principles of her youth in younger and stronger hands. And this type of old lady is for the present part an extinct species, though the old worn itself away in the arid deserts of mental doubt and emotional negation. If she ever lived, she lived in a time when Voltaire symbolized idea long years ago; but most likely she did not get even to that sanctuary temple, but contented herself with books and discussions only. If she has ever honestly loved and been loved, perhaps she would have gone beyond doubt, and have learned something holier than a scoff. The old lady of strong intellectual affections, who never reflects and never attempts to restrain her kindly weaknesses, stands at the other end of the scale. She is the grandmother who worships and spends her life in spoiling the little ones, consuming them with sugar-plums and cake, and whenever she has the chance, and nullifying mamma's punishments by surreptitious gifts and caudles. She is a fond, doting, beloved old creature in recollections, and to the last days of our life a cherish for many reasons; and we have had one with her beaming smile, taking out of her large black reticule, or the more mysterious recesses of her unfathomable pocket, the wonderful little screws of paper, which her withered hands thrust into our chubby fists, as we were conscious that we were what an awful nuisance she must have been to the authorities, and how impossible she made it to preserve order in the family room. But the terrors of the domestic law in the family.

The old lady who remains a mere child to the last, who looks upon the world as a faded old wax doll with her scanty hair blown out into transparent ringlets, and her cheeks painted with the flowers and gay-colored bows, who can not rise into dignity or true womanliness, who knows no magic, can give no spell, has no consolation or protection, but on the contrary demands all sorts of care and protection from others. Her simpering and giggling as if she were fifteen, is by no means an old lady of the finest type. But she is better than the terrible old lady of the faded old wax doll with her scanty hair blown out into transparent ringlets, and her cheeks painted with the flowers and gay-colored bows, who can not rise into dignity or true womanliness, who knows no magic, can give no spell, has no consolation or protection, but on the contrary demands all sorts of care and protection from others. Her simpering and giggling as if she were fifteen, is by no means the worst of the feminine failures in the matter of old ladies. The old lady who remains a mere child to the last, who looks upon the world as a

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering to purchasers

ADDITIONAL INDUCEMENTS IN SILKS,

IRISH AND FRENCH POPLINS,

EPINGLINES,

choice quality and colors,

FRENCH PRINTED PERCALES, PERCALE ROBES,

PLAIN AND PRINTED PIQUES,

SASH AND BONNET RIBBONS,

Every Variety of

MILLINERY GOODS,

&c., &c., &c.

Our customers and the residents of neighboring cities are respectfully invited to examine

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

HOVEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN

Vegetable, Flower, and Agricultural Seeds, Fruit and Ornamental Trees, Plants, &c.

53 North Market Street, Boston, Mass.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED GUIDE

To the Flower and Vegetable Garden, and Catalogue of Seeds for 1870.

The 35th Edition, revised, enlarged, and improved, containing 140 pages, illustrated with more than 100 fine engravings.

A BEAUTIFUL COLORED PLATE

and a descriptive list of more than 2500 varieties of Flower and Vegetable Seeds embracing every novelty of merit as well as the best of the older sorts; directions for the culture of flowers and plants, the arrangement of the garden, &c. Also, a descriptive list of 10 varieties of the best French Gladiolus, including the superb new varieties of 1869, now first offered; all the summer-flowering bulbs, such as Lilies, Tuberoses, Tigridias, &c., together with every requisite for the garden. A copy mailed to every applicant on the receipt of 25 cts. Our customers supplied free of charge. Address HOVEY & CO., 53 Merchants Row, Boston.

RASCALITY VENTILATED.—In addition to all the former aids in exposing swindling and humbugs, the "Star-Spangled Banner" has engaged one of the most talented reporters in N. Y. City, to write up all the new tricks and traps of unscrupulous men for this paper. He will search out and ventilate every attempt at villainy, and expose it in time to save victims. Subscribe at once. Remember the "Star-Spangled Banner" is a large, illustrated, 8-page paper, printing on fine white paper, and is exciting. Nothing like it. Only 60c. per year, or single copy 5c., or stamp about it. Overflowing with Wit, Humor, Fun, and good things generally, it is the cheapest, richest, brightest, and prettiest sheet ever published. The entire press of the country proclaims it unapproachable, except in point of unbridled swindle - supporting, semi silly and religious sheets, which, lacking half the circulation or power of the "Star-Spangled Banner," can but howl in their impotent rage at its wonderful, unparalleled success. You want it. Your wife needs it. Your children will read its pages over and over again. Only 60c. per year. AGENTS WANTED everywhere. The supersheet pleases "Brentano's." We will send a specimen, GRATIS, to any one who writes. An elegant parlor ornament, or an excellent fire-kindler. Specimens of the "Star" will be sent to perfectly scattered. Specimens of the "Star" will be sent to "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD

For the Piano-forte.

Excelling in popularity all instruction-books for the Piano. There is hardly a home in the country containing a piano-forte without this celebrated book. Annual sale, 19,000, and the demand is increasing. Published in both American and Foreign fingering and in several editions.

Price, $3 75. Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

BOOSEY & CO.'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A new Catalogue ready, free on application. Just Given, Part Songs, Glees, and Church Choruses, for the use of Choral Societies, 5 cents each. THE BALLAD SINGER.—20 new songs by Claribel and the best composers, 8 cents each. THE MUSICAL CABINET.—A complete library of music for the parlor, vocal and Sacred, Vocal and Instrumental, in books, 50 cents each. HORSLEY'S CHOICE.—Two new and favorite songs, 30 cents each. THE MUSICAL ORGANIST.—A collection of 20 pieces, 50 cents each. VIOLIN LIBRARY.—40 books, 50 cents each. FLUTE LIBRARY.—40 books, 50 cents each. Send for Catalogue. Services, 25 cents each. Organ and Cabinet Organ Music, in Volumes, $1 to $2 each. Complete Operas, with words and music, Operas as Piano-forte Duets, Music for Band, &c., &c. "Absurdly moderate in price and perfectly satisfactory in shape."—New York Times. To be had of music and book sellers, or of BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

PIMPLES.

The undersigned will cheerfully mail (free) to all who wish it, the Recipe and full directions for preparing and using a simple and beautiful vegetable Lotion that will immediately remove Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, and Eruptions, and produce a clear and healthy, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth, and beautiful.

He will also send (in confidence) directions for producing, by very simple means, a luxuriant growth of hair on a bald head or smooth face.

The above can be obtained by return mail, by addressing THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,

P. O. Box 3236. 26 Broadway, New York.

DICTIONARY PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL—1870. Vol. 50. New Series. $3 a year; 25 cts. a No. Specimen sent for 10 cts. Address

S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

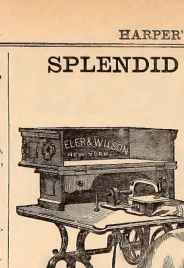
Jan. and Feb. Nos. now ready.

ASTHMA! ASTHMA! ASTHMA!

BIESTAND'S ASTHMA REMEDY not only relieves, but permanently cures this dreadful disease. Sold by druggists generally. $1 per bottle. Send for circulars. BIESTAND'S & CO., Dayton, Ohio.

SOUTHERN FARMS, all sizes and prices. 20 Send 4c. for Catalogue. WM. H. NEWTON & CO., 85 Lexington St., Baltimore, Md.

SPLENDID PRESENTS!



1000 $75 Sewing Machines.

One to be given to every person

WHO GETS 35 SUBSCRIBERS, AT $3 00 EACH, TO

Hitchcock's New Monthly Magazine.

Instead of expending a large amount of money in advertising our MAGAZINE, we propose to use the amount in purchasing Sewing Machines, to be given gratuitously to those who will personally exhibit a copy and secure us 35 subscribers at $3 00 each for one year. We are induced to pursue this course because we believe that the MAGAZINE has sufficient merit to commend itself wherever shown, and we prefer to obtain a still larger circulation at once through the exertions of live agents, rather than pursue a long course of advertising (at great expense), and waiting a long time for the MAGAZINE to find its way by that channel into households which would gladly welcome it to-day. Therefore we offer a first-class $75 00 Sewing Machine to each person who will send us $75 00 and the names of 35 subscribers to our MAGAZINE for the year 1870. Those who are disposed to undertake the work, and who will remit us the amount (35 cents each) for the specimen copies they desire—one or more; or your newsdealer will supply you.

Those unacquainted with us can deposit the money at their Express Office (to be paid upon receipt of the Sewing Machine), at the same time sending us the list of subscribers and the receipt of the Express Agent who holds the money.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,

24 Beekman Street, New York.

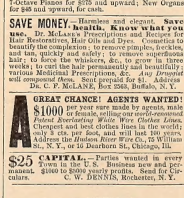
A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during this month, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid. Second-hand Pianos, $50 to $100; Melodeons, $25 to $50; Organs, $50 to $75. Illustrated Catalogues sent for stamp. Agents wanted.

SAVE MONEY—health. Know what you use. Dr. McLane's Prescriptions and Recipes for Hair Restoritive, Hair Oils and Dyes. Cosmetics to beautify the complexion; to remove pimples, freckles, and tan, quickly and safely; to remove superfluous hair; to dye the whiskers, &c., to grow in three weeks; to curl the hair permanently and beautifully without injurious chemical preparations. Any article will oversee. Sent prepaid for $1. Address Dr. C. F. McLANE, Detroit, Mich., Box 1,000.

GREAT CHANCE! AGENTS WANTED! $1000 per month and expenses paid Agents, or female, selling our well-invented Patent Imperial White Wire Clothes Lines. Cheapest and best clothes lines in the world; only 3 cts. per foot, and will last 10 years. Address the Hudson River Wire Co., 75 William St., N. Y., or 51 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$25 CAPITAL.—Parties wanted in every Town in the U. S. Business new and permanent. $1000 to $5000 yearly profits. Send for Circulars. C. W. DENNIS, Rochester, N. Y.



$20 $25

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primeval Condition of the Earth, the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Just Ready.)

2.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By ALTON CLYDE, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Eastern South America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

4.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife." "I found in the Wheel," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations from Three Characteristic Designs. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

6.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By William Godwin, Author of "Caleb Williams," "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 18mo, Paper, 25 cents.

7.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maccii Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By C. S. LANCASTER, M.A., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

8.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introduction, and a Supplement containing the Evidence brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authorress of "Our Village, &c." Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her Literary Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 Vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

10.

ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "False Colors," "Played Out," "Pretty Boy," "Living for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTH. By LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Engaged Illustrated Designs by Darley, Dielman, Fredericks, Durham, and Parsons. 4to, Cloth, Bevelled Edges, $3 50; Full Gilt, $4 50.

12.

LITTY. A Novel. By J. BERTAM EDWARDS, Author of "Doctor Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 220 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $8 00.

14.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By Lord LYTTON. With Latin Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Yonge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

15.

COMPORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted to Colleges, Schools, Families, and Academies. By Geo. F. Comfort, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Belles-lettres in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

16.

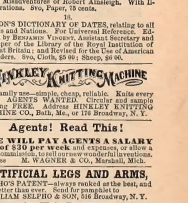
WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD; a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By ALEXR. GORDON-WOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

17.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

18.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised by an American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.



For Family and Manufacturing Purposes. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking free. Address HENKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $75 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new wonderful inventions. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS,

SELPHO'S PATENT—always ranked at the best, and now more than ever ADOPTED and WORN.

SELPHO LEG AND ARM CO., 916 Broadway, N.Y.

THE MAGIC EGG.—Agents can realize $10 a day. Sample Egg and terms mailed on receipt of 10 cents. Address W. EARL, 94 Leigh Street, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Full directions and apparatus sent by express. J. F. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$130 a day. Agents wanted. Business honorable. No gift enterprise. No money wanted in advance. Address LAFFA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE WIDE WORLD Semi-Weekly Illustrated Family Paper. Sent Free 4 Months to Introduce. Wide World, Boston.

THE COLLEGE PAPER, Mailed Free. Address R. NELSON, Nelson's College, Fourth and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send it free to others. Miss M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N.J.

H. R. H. Prince ARTHUR returns from "Epiphany Church," and is the object of marked attention from the Citizens.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

PRACTICAL STANDARD PUBLICATIONS OF
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
191 Broadway, New York.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.
1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village Houses, with Specifications and Estimates. Postpaid, Twelve Dollars.

HARNEY'S BARNS, OUT-BUILDINGS, AND FENCES.
Just published, with designs and plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fences, Stable-fittings and Furniture. Nearly 100 Illustrations. Fully Explained. Royal Quarto, extra. Postpaid, Five Dollars.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 150 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Suburban and Country Houses. 70 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Country Homes. 100 Designs and Plans of moderate cost. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Graperies, &c. Postpaid, $1.50.
Woodward's Rural Homes. Houses suited to Country Life. Postpaid, $2.
Wheeler's Homes for the People. For the Suburb and Country. 100 Designs. Postpaid, $2.
Jacques' Manual of the House. Postpaid, $1.50.
Rural Church Architecture. Designs for Churches. 45 plates printed in colors. Postpaid, $12.
Jacques' Manual of the Garden, Farm, and Barn-Yard. 200 Illustrations. 12mo. postpaid, $2.50.
Todd's Young Farmer's Manual. Vol. I. The Farm and Workshop. Postpaid, $2.50.
Todd's Young Farmer's Manual. Vol. 2. How to make Farmers pay. Postpaid, $2.50.
Elliott's Lawn and Shade Trees. Postpaid, $1.50.
Fuller's Forest-Tree Culturist. Postpaid, $1.50.
Husmann's Grapes and Wine. Postpaid, $1.50.
Suburban Homes for New-Yorkers. 25c.
Woodward's Architecture. Designs and Hints on Building. With printed catalogue of books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, 25 cents.

Address GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliance. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., Box 5076, New York.

SHERMAN'S PATENT BRAKE, to prevent Retrograde Motion on Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines. Sent by mail, postage paid, with Instructions for using, on the receipt of $1 50.
ADDRESS WARREN SHERMAN,
SHERMAN PATENT BRAKE COMPANY,
2302, Philadelphia, Pa.

FOLIAR & SON, Manufr's of Genuine Necrochsum Goods. Stores: 829 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 27 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale and retail circular to Letter-Box 3586. Repairing and Roofing also done.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office of delivery. Subscribers from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber desires to begin with the Number next after the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given. A request to discontinue must be accompanied with payment.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable in the city of New York is preferable. If unpayable in Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a first space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 75 per Agate Line; Cuts and Display, $1 75 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A NEW DISCOVERY!!
PHALON'S
"VITALIA,"
OR,
Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Grey Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaccident matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!
AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,
CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,
517 Broadway, N. Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE
Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE 208 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides. And is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold for $50 or less. Warranted five years. All others are infringements, and the purchaser or user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Circulars free.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

A NOVELTY.—Great Clear Tip. Samples, 50 cents. A. GRANT, Box 5486, N. Y. P. O.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,
MARION, N. J.,
Manufacturers OF ALL the GRADES OF AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,
BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jewels, & Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Positions; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs: and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto maintained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

NEW YORK, JAN. 17, 1870.

☞ WATCH No. 1089 — bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me from December, 1868, to January 17th, 1870; its total variation being only two seconds in the entire time.

L. E. CHITTENDEN, Late Register U. S. Treasury.

GILES, WALES, & CO., 13 Maiden Lane, New York.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

WATCHES manufactured by the
UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

Steinway & Sons,
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES,
Beg to Announce
A GENERAL REDUCTION
in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decrement cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Piano-fortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long-felt and frequently-expressed want, by persons of moderate means, teachers, schools, &c., have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of instrument, termed
The "School" Piano.
A thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in plan, scale, interior mechanism, and workmanship as their highest-specified 7-octave Pianos; the only difference being that this new style of instrument is constructed in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means.
At Exceedingly Moderate Prices.
STEINWAY & SONS also desire to call special attention to their PATENT UPRIGHT PIANOS,
with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are unrivaled in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and having more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.
Price-Lists and Illustrated Catalogues mailed free on application.
EVERY PIANO is WARRANTED for 5 YEARS.
Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,
Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth St.
(Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place), New York.

$250 PER LOT. Advance 100 per cent. annually. B. C. BEARSLEY, 114 Sale St., Chicago, Ill.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.
(Patented June 1, 1869.)
Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French pattern, with wonderful SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY
and CHEAPNESS.
Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.
☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜
SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.
Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any Machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and will not ravel. We pay agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.

CAUTION.—Beware of all Agents selling Machines under the same name as ours, unless they can show a Certificate of agency signed by us. We shall not hold ourselves responsible for worthless Machines sold by other parties, and shall prosecute all parties either selling or using Machines under this name, to the full extent of the law, unless such Machines were obtained from us or our Agents. Do not be imposed upon by parties copying our advertisement and circulars, and offer worthless Machines at a less price.

KNOCH MORGAN'S SONS
SOAP & SAPOLIO
211 WASHINGTON S^T N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's Patent Sewing Machine.
To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well accustomed, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 687.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

"FOR I WAS AHUNGERED, AND YE GAVE ME MEAT."—[FROM A DRAWING BY C. G. BUSH.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1870.

JOSEPH WESLEY HARPER.

IT is not yet a year since it was our melancholy duty to record the sudden death of JAMES HARPER, the senior partner of the house of HARPER & BROTHERS; and to-day we have to announce that of his brother, for forty-five years a partner in the firm—JOSEPH WESLEY HARPER—who died at his residence in Brooklyn on Monday morning, February 14, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. After a long illness, of which the end was sure, and which has been imminent for many weeks, he died as he as gentle as his life, and his memory will be as spotless. Of a nature so guileless, a temper so serene, that his whole career was the fairest illustration of the highest Christian graces, his death-chamber was as cheerful as his steady heart, and foretold the eternal morning for which he waited.

Those who recall Mr. HARPER during his long connection with the house are familiar with the peculiar courtesy, the constant and kindly humor, of his manner; but only those who have been brought into more intimate relations with him fully know the true generosity and nobility of his character, his manly fidelity to his convictions, his exhaustless charity and judging others, his forbearance, sympathy, and wisdom in counsel. Modest and retiring, and of the simplest habits, he avoided wholly every kind of publicity; but his name in his religious connection was universally cherished and beloved, and his open hand was ever ready to provide wide to the widow and the fatherless. Propriety neither spoiled nor deceived him. He was in many respects very unlike any of his race. He was one of the men who sustain and refresh our faith in human nature, and whose loss is not so much an individual sorrow as the withdrawal of a lofty and pure influence from a wide circle.

Nowhere so happy as at home, there, as he would have chosen, it was appointed him to die. For many months, surrounded by the tenderest affection, he has been gradually declining, and every day and hour of suspense only more deeply instructed his character. In that chamber love and faith and hope were a perpetual benediction. On Monday morning, a little after seven, he asked that the window should be opened; then, taking a slight refreshment, he said, "Thank you," and, closing his eyes, fell into unconsciousness. Only what he meant was that Tammany intended to establish a municipal system for the city of New York by which the Democratic party could not be so perfected that the same methods which elected MAYOR HOFFMAN Governor in 1868 should elect Governor HOFFMAN President in 1872. Governor HOFFMAN, having shown in his acquiescence in the monstrous Erie bill of last winter that he was in the habit of signing such schemers, is the chosen candidate of those who propose to manage the country as they manage the Sinbad—a multitude of the most unscrupulous "Hayloft and cheese-press" Democrat, as Tammany calls its rural friends, that "MR. TWEED could do very well by the city of New York, but the United States were too——big for him!" But the gentlemen who "counted in" Mr. HOFFMAN as Governor are of opinion that they can, by proper precautions, also count him in as President, and, when they succeed, they are justly confident that the Governor who obeyed them in signing the Erie bill will not, as President, dare to refuse his aid in still more startling measures.

The proposed charter for the city of New York is the first great movement of the gentlemen toward their object. It vests the control of the city absolutely in the Ring, under whose auspices the appalling naturalization frauds of 1868 were committed, and it leaves the same authority the control of the police. The charter effectually stifles the opposition in the city; and the representatives of at least half the tax-paying property, and certainly three-quarters of the intelligence and good character of the population, are deprived of any part or voice whatever in the municipal management. If under the present system there is corruption, the proposed charter does not suggest a solitary change that is not for the advantage of the Ring which is the source of the corruption. It is a charter that can gratify only the worst element of the Democratic party, and which should alarm every man of every party who values just public confidence as the surest guarantee of order and prosperity.

The daily papers have been busily exposing the character of the charter and its inevitable consequences. The World, which can not be supposed friendly to the work of a Ring which it has denounced, however sorely constrained it may be by party necessity to speak mildly of a most party measure, has paper bosses as curious as the significant omissions of the new instrument. It leaves the treasury exposed. It destroys all the commissions, without a single check for efficiency or integrity. It reverses the deliberate judgment of the most thoughtful citizens of all parties, and opens up to the public gaze which the evil consequences are not to be foreseen.

Yet, bad as the charter is, it is a question whether it will not be carried when it shall be adopted. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the Ring-masters would wish to make as fair an appearance as possible at the beginning of their State supremacy, and that they would offer a plausible plan for what is called the popular government of the city to secure a favorable public impression, and would then proceed to modify it to their purposes. That is what we shall probably see. But the fact that the charter, although excellent, has provoked a great deal of criticism, it will be observed, will move sagacity or the intelligence of those who have made it, and the total subservience of the city to the Ring will be secured. And we repeat again that nothing the paper principle responsible for the spectacle which is offered by the government of this city. An exceptionally large proportion of its population is composed of newly-arrived foreigners, and the least desirable element of the foreign immigration remains in and around the city. It is easy to control the popular system by the worst ward in the city as by a city so exceptionally peopled.

That the charter will be carried—apart—that is to say, Tammany—yield to the pressure of the wood pussy, is to the politician not a doubt. If the power known as Tammany chose to have honest elections, we should have them; but by the expression Tammany certain persons are very well understood. They do not choose. They pander to the basest prejudices of their supporters, and they are thus compelled to shape their policy by the elections which they have kindled. Even the World, which, as the elevated party organ, has not hesitated, under personal provocation, to brand some of the managers by name as corrupt. The same is merely given of these persons possession of such power in the city as had hitherto escaped them; and Governor HOFFMAN, whose political advancement depends upon the favor of Tammany, evidently calls this performance in advance "giving self-government to the people, and restoring the rights of localities."

WHITEWASH.

THE Methodist Book Concern, as is well known, is the awkward title of the great publishing house of that great Christian body, and its publications, periodical and otherwise, with all other companies, or merchants, or institutions, however wary and sagacious, it is liable to be swindled. That should happen, the discredit would not be in the swindle, but in the failure to investigate it fearlessly and to acknowledge it frankly. But the entire property of the Book Concern is the proper business of the denomination whose liberality supports it; and as its financial condition affects all interests in the country, the promptest and widest publicity of the results of an investigation into any alleged infidelity in that body is the most natural information. When, therefore, it was announced during the last summer that there had been fraud in the management of the Concern, the duty of the Book Committee was plain. They owed to the fair fame of their religious denomination, to their own characters, and to the reputation of the honest officers of the Concern, that no management or fraud of any kind should be left in the slightest degree concealed. The delusive hope of "smoothing up" unpleasant facts, of sparing private feeling, or of avoiding public scandal should have prevented the simplest and frankest statement.

On the 23d of November, after forty days of investigation, the Committee announced that there had been "great mismanagement" and "serious losses" in the bindery. There was, however, such an evident reticence in the report, such a subject that the report was even more injurious to the Concern than the original charges. It left the impression that the Concern was probably true, and that there were quite as terrible truths behind. As usual the mist of mystification magnified every thing; and the reputation of the Book Concern has seriously suffered from that reticent, evasive report, which we described at the time as a striking illustration of what such a report ought not to be. So universal and so powerful was this feeling that the Committee were constrained to resume the consideration of the subject; and the majority have now made another report, in which they virtually declare that they were mistaken; that there has been no irregularity or fraud or loss in any department of the Concern, and, of course, that the charges were entirely false. Fortunately the minority of the Committee also present a report, in which the statements of fact, of testimony, of affidavit, not of inference, are totally incompatible with the conclusions of the majority.

Thus it is in evidence that Mr. J. F. PORTER, the son of one of the principal managers, represented himself as paper boss as customer of the purchases of paper for the Concern, and to the Concern as the accredited agent of leading paper houses, when a certain day the Concern was charged by Mr. PORTER $13 50 per ream for paper which he had that very day bought of a paper house at $9 50, and which the paper house states that it would have gladly sold to the Book Concern at the same rate. The minority report proves that since 1869 paper to the value of nearly $700,000 has been bought through this middle-man, whose commission was added to the price of the paper. The books of certain paper houses and of the Concern show that the profits of this middle-man on such purchases of paper between July, 1867, and August, 1868, were about $10,000. The letters of these houses and the order-book of the Concern are in the possession of the Committee, showing that in one instance the middleman's profits were more than thirty per cent. In explanation of these astounding facts it is stated that the purchase of paper through middle-men is a common practice, and that the prices paid were the ordinary prices at the time. But in large establishments the rule is, of course, to buy directly from manufacturers; and even when brokers are employed the commission is seldom more than one per cent.; while as to the assertion about average prices it is enough that the dealers themselves state that they were willingly have sold to the Concern for $10 80 the same paper for which, upon the same day, the Concern was charged by the middle-man $13 50.

Moreover, the superintendent of the printing department of the Concern declared that no middle-man was employed. But it was immediately ascertained that his very last order, amounting to nearly $6000, had passed through the middle-man, Mr. J. F. PORTER; and the paper house which filled that order stated that the Concern was charged by the same person, and showed a list of fifty-one orders, amounting to $105,000, and extending through a period of about four years. This is in evidence, and the superintendent was dismissed. There is no very much proof of the same kind, establishing the fact that during less than two years the Book Concern lost in this way, and upon its transactions with but three or four paper houses, more than $15,000. The testimony in regard to the bindery reveals similar results; but it is unnecessary to pursue the details further.

With this plain and accumulated evidence before them, and undisposed—with the orderbook of the Concern, and the statement of the assistant agent, and the letters of the leading paper houses confirming it—with the fact of fraud so established as any law can be, it is incomprehensible that the majority of the Committee should assert not only that there was no fraud nor corruption, but that the allegation of losses is unsustained. Their report is a serious blow to the welfare of the denomination. The letters and evidence in the minority report are quite enough to convince the public that, for some reason, the truth is withheld, and that this declaration of the majority that the managements of the business has been, and is now, "in a sound and healthy condition, and under such a system of checks and safeguards as guarantees security," is a solemn attempt to conceal the truth. It is true that the General Conference will give this question the most careful consideration, and furnish some satisfactory explanation of the facts in evidence, or the frankest censure of the transactions in question. Nothing but such decisive action will satisfy the public that the fundamental laws of the great religious publishing house are conducted in a manner that will bear investigation; and nothing but such frankness can remove the Book Concern hereafter, as heretofore, to the pride and confidence and support of the Methodists of the United States.

A HARD FATE.

A BILL recently passed the Senate, without debate and without receiving public attention, which the President has just signed, and which ought to be a matter of general interest, as involving the retirement of a class of meritorious servants of the country—the retired army officers. The bill forbids them to be placed upon duty, and consequently very seriously reduces their pay. There are many officers of this class, and some of them have been retired without real reason; so that the effect of this bill is most grievous. An officer, perhaps, who has faithfully served for forty years, may have been wounded in the Mexican war, by losing part of his hand, for instance—a wound which does not in the least unfit him for active duty, as is proved by seventeen or eighteen years of subsequent hard service in the field. Efficient as over, this officer is peremptorily retired. But he is still competent, under the regulations, to serve upon military courts, and so allow active officers to remain with their regiments, as the President and General SHERMAN earnestly wish.

But a great many of these active officers do not earnestly wish it. They would much rather serve the country upon military courts in New York than in garrison at FORT LARAMIE, or some other frontier garrison, or on any body wonder at their choice. They naturally press the President and the Department to reserve the retired officer from this appropriate duty, and to allow the applicants to leave their regiments to discharge it. And this pressure is most urged on the reason for the bill. Its result will be that active officers will be taken from their commands for a service which the retired officers can readily perform, and that the income of the retired officers will be diminished by more than a half.

In announcing their fate to these faithful servants of the country, General SHERMAN can not withhold an expression of sympathy and regret. He says what he must fear not to be true, because he knows the facts: "Doubtless in most, if not in all, cases a respite from unceasing toil and responsibility will be grateful, if not necessary, coming as it does in this involuntary form and without a possibility of implied reproach." It is a hard fate. There are not many of these officers, and they have served long and laboriously for the smallest pay. They can not enter other professions; and elderly men with families, living most economically, must look soberly upon the prospect of losing half of their revenues. They have given to the flag of their country, and they naturally and justly expect a moderate support from that government to the end. But when officers retired, yet not mentally nor bodily disabled, see that the country takes from them the service which they could satisfactorily do, and which would increase their resources and that this is done, not to save money, but to make places for others—they feel bitterly, but too late, that they have served the most ungrateful of masters; and in their embarrassed and straitened age they accuse their officers of the army behold their own sure fate.

ROCHEFORT AND REVOLUTION.

THE warmest friends of liberty and the most zealous opponents of Louis NAPOLEON look without enthusiasm or hope upon Monsieur HENRI ROCHEFORT, and the movements of which he is the exponent. And this is the simple reason that LOUIS NAPOLEON has evidently learned that to save himself he must surrender to a constitutional government. It is because this is the moment of his acknowledged and conspicuous yielding to the pressure of liberal opinion that it is ill-chosen for a revolution. The new system, indeed, as we have more than once remarked, rests upon his word, and his word alone can not be respected. But the necessities of the situation can be respected, and they, as every thoughtful observer is aware, compel the Emperor to accept the new order. It is not, indeed, a consistently liberal system. For instance, the law of the press which was lately promulgated, and under which ROCHEFORT is condemned, is too restrictive; and it would seem, at this distance, to be sound policy for the Government to allow ROCHEFORT to say what he chooses, as it permitted him to return to Paris at his pleasure. Even the errors of a liberal government at this time in France should lean toward liberty, not toward absolutism; and it will be measured by the energy with which it proposes reforms.

The feeling with which events in France are regarded in foreign countries would be different if the Government had made any effort to screen PIERRE BONAPARTE. But it has proceeded exactly as in any other case. The homicide was committed in the arrest of the offender was instantly ordered by the Government. He had surrendered himself, however, and there remained only the examination and trial. In that there must be no delay, and there must be no favor. Before the law PIERRE BONAPARTE is precisely what any other man is. If the Government make France feel this by its conduct, it will be immensely strengthened. With the same steadiness it will meet the law against ROCHEFORT. Seditious writings are forbidden. To an American such a law seems foolish. Perhaps it is; but it is the law; and it is obeyed. The question is not whether ROCHEFORT would not have permitted the offense to pass. But if the Government be decidedly strong, it is a fault of judgment which ought not to be corrected by a revolution.

For a revolution is a very serious matter, and the responsibility of those who begin it is terrible. An appeal to arms is one of the worst of crimes, until it is clear that the consequences are less fearful than those of longer enduring the oppression. That this is the situation in France to-day—whatever it may have been during the absolutism of LOUIS NAPOLEON—who will contend? It may be true that the BONAPARTES have a taste for assassination. It may be true that ROCHEFORT is as good a man as ency of the Ministers. It may be true that VICTOR NOIR was wantonly murdered, and that his story is a pitiful tragedy. This last may be easily believed. All liberal journalists, who are the van-guard of liberty in our time, deplore in his death the fate of a young fellow-soldier. But in revolutionary personal considerations disappear. That an imperial prince kills a liberal writer is in itself no reason for beginning a new and overwhelming civil commotion. But when it is evident that the empire, leaning upon the army, mediates the destruction of the rights of the people, when universal suffrage, speaking the aid and profound conviction of the intelligence of his country, calls it to arms, and offers him only the bullets of the despot, is saluted by the love and gratitude of all generous and honorable men.

Is this the situation in France to-day? If it is, the man who shall lead a revolution will be hailed as a benefactor. If it is not, the man who purposely excites bloodshed must be held guilty of it.

TRADE AS AFFECTED BY THE SITUATION

THE business interests of the United States have been sorely troubled during the last half year. Up to the time of the raid upon Wall Street, in September, there was in all parts of the Union the regularity in trade which arises from the adjustment of prices on a basis supposed to be uniform. The farmer, the merchant, the manufacturer, the banker, or, in a wider way, the producers and consumers, stood on the same level. If prices were high for some articles, as they were equally high for others, there was equality in the long-run, and one interest could not boast of advantage over the other.

Since the affair of September, the effects of which struck terror through the whole country, instead of the uniformity in prices which is essential to solid prosperity, there has been an amount of irregularity hitherto unknown. Cotton remains but slightly disturbed—as no sole which communicates to the agricultural country of which it is the chief production much steadiness. On the other hand, the immense yearly production of the NORTHERN have heavily shrunk in value, with a very depressing effect on all the interests of that quarter.

A winter of unusual mildness has undoubtedly contributed to the depression which originated in the crime of the gamblers in gold. Winter stocks remain on the shelves of distributors undisposed of; and, although spring goods have been displayed for several weeks past, the customer tells the jobber, "I must delay my purchases for spring until the heavy goods are thinned off." Following in the wake of these embarrassments came the pressure of the Treasury upon gold; the uncertainty about questions of currency, taxation, and the tariff; and, last not least, the fact that, while the country is not prevailed; and lastly, and powerfully, the decision with which the Supreme Court of the United States has annihilated the paper issues.

It is one of the remarkable features of this depression that the same amount of paper-money which carried up prices in the proportion of its excess, as compared with the quantity in circulation before the war, still remains in use, and that shrinkage of greenbacks, notwithstanding that no measures for its diminution are on foot. The best observers are astounded at this remarkable exception to the universal law, that prices of articles in ordinary demand, and of ordinary supply, rise and fall according to the scarcity or abundance of money. The inflation produced under MR. CHASE'S administration raised prices inordinately, but uniformly, and it has always been supposed that this would be lowered only by reversing the operation.

We are told that "opinion is power;" and it is true that the belief in public prosperity and well-standing we are still running up an immense score on the other side of the ocean for imports, that we are on the direct road to specie payments. The question interests all of us what foundation there is for this impression.

The topic of the Currency, in combining between eighty and ninety millions of the public debt, has imparted a higher degree of credit in Europe to our loans for bonds than they had reached before. As our whole paper-currency is founded on the credit of the United States, it shares in the credit of this improvement; but although the foreigner holds nearly a thousand millions of this debt, and it is still going forward, we are receiving but little interest that enables us to pay the interest on this tremendous burden. The importation of iron forms an exception to the general rule, and our exports consist of articles which the country consumes from year to year; but it bears but a small proportion to the whole.

MR. BOUTWELL'S statement of the revenues received and estimated for the fiscal year which will end on the 30th of June, 1870, amounts to three hundred and ninety-four millions, eight hundred and thirty-one thousand, six hundred and twenty-two ⁶²⁄₁₀₀ dollars. MR. WELLS states that our annual indebtedness to the foreigner reaches the round hundred millions of dollars per annum. With these enormous receipts from revenue and of goods from abroad, the reduction of our debt to the extent of even one hundred millions per year would be a losing business; and hence it is that the foreigner, who obtains that excess of two hundred and ten millions in bonds annually, makes no complaint of the transaction, and will allow it to go on for the present. If we were drawing gold from his coffers, instead of taking his surplus of goods, a few shipments of it would produce the raising of the rate of interest in England.

Instead of growing stronger in our financial position, we are daily growing weaker and travelling in the opposite direction from specie payments. The delicacy in which this fact is to be false, as will appear when the foreigner, reversing his present policy of encouraging an increase of our indebtedness, shall demand specie payment. That this necessity will arise sooner or later, no doubt. It would require the treasures of India to supply the present extravagance of this country.

The shrinkage in prices is one of the measures which belong to a paper system. ADAM SMITH, near the end of the last century, spoke of the danger of suspending the prosperity of the people upon the "wings of the imagination;" and we are now witnessing one of its realizations.

As part of our difficulty is due to hoards in the South, where the large reserves of the cotton and the absence of banks are favorable; but the time will surely come when the unlimited issue volume of currency at the present day with effects not very different from those produced for several successive years, modified, however, by the action of gold, which will retain much of its present circulation.

The amount the South has withdrawn from us, in the shape of gold, since the close of the war of 1865-69, is estimated by sagacious financiers at fifty millions of legal tenders. The amount of the crop of 1869-70 marketed at present will equal if not larger amount will be required. Although these sums go from one portion of the Union to another, they are not returned to the North. The reserve of national banks remains largely at the commercial centres, and so little of legal tenders that the banks owe their exemption from distress to the confidence which the country has in the solidity of its own strength. All who want legal tenders in considerable sums understand well that the notice is required of the withdrawal of as little in this bank and a little in that may be borrowed for the exigency. It is at this vital point that we are exposed to danger. The effect of the September raid was wide-spread, because its secret was destroyed. A scheme for carrying on the same operation on a few hundreds of millions was broken up. FISK, in his testimony, pointed to the difference between the gambling of BELL & HOUSE and the legitimate dealings. He could manage forty millions of short gold as the Gold Exchange Bank with more ease than from fifteen to twenty.

Topsy, or some other fictitious character, on being asked, in the language common at the South, what raised her, replied, "Nobody raised me, 'cept I wasn't raised, 'spects I growed." It is somewhat so with our banking policy. It waits upon events. It has no fixed principle, with few exceptions, with a view only to the situation day by day, sometimes shaving each other; and this is the system alleged in immense transactions, with the boldness which was a marked feature of the Gold Exchange Bank.

What is wanted is a full and complete agreement between the most prudent managers, or some rule which will govern the action of September, and, if this is possible, more unscrupulous, will strike them at their present weak point and produce sad consequences.

NOTES.

MR. FERNANDO WOOD suggests that Congress, or the American people, should demand the release of the Fenian prisoners; and, if necessary, fail, that the country should appeal to the God of Battles. And on which side would MR. FERNANDO WOOD be found? The last time that the country appealed to the God of Battles, MR. FERNANDO WOOD was found lamenting that he was prevented from sending arms to the enemy.

THE adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment establishes in the State of New York that equality of political rights among all citizens which is the one of the disgraces of the Democratic party in the State of Indiana. And on which side would FERNANDO WOOD be found? The last time that the country appealed to the God of Battles, MR. FERNANDO WOOD was found lamenting that he was prevented from sending arms to the enemy.

THE abolition of the Fifteenth Amendment establishes in the State of New York that equality of political rights among all citizens which is the one of the disgraces of the Democratic party in the State of Indiana. And on which side would FERNANDO WOOD be found? The last time that the country appealed to the God of Battles, MR. FERNANDO WOOD was found lamenting that he was prevented from sending arms to the enemy.

THE shrinkage in prices is one of the measures which belong to a paper system. ADAM SMITH, near the end of the last century, spoke of the danger of suspending the prosperity of the people upon the "wings of the imagination;" and we are now witnessing one of its realizations.

As part of our difficulty is due to hoards in the South, where the large reserves of the cotton and the absence of banks are favorable; but the time will surely come when the unlimited issue volume of currency at the present day with effects not very different from those produced for several successive years, modified, however, by the action of gold, which will retain much of its present circulation.

The amount the South has withdrawn from us, in the shape of gold, since the close of the war of 1865-69, is estimated by sagacious financiers at fifty millions of legal tenders. The amount of the crop of 1869-70 marketed at present will equal if not larger amount will be required. Although these sums go from one portion of the Union to another, they are not returned to the North. The reserve of national banks remains largely at the commercial centres, and so little of legal tenders that the banks owe their exemption from distress to the confidence which the country has in the solidity of its own strength. All who want legal tenders in considerable sums understand well that the notice is required of the withdrawal of as little in this bank and a little in that may be borrowed for the exigency. It is at this vital point that we are exposed to danger. The effect of the September raid was wide-spread, because its secret was destroyed. A scheme for carrying on the same operation on a few hundreds of millions was broken up. FISK, in his testimony, pointed to the difference between the gambling of BELL & HOUSE and the legitimate dealings. He could manage forty millions of short gold as the Gold Exchange Bank with more ease than from fifteen to twenty.

Topsy, or some other fictitious character, on being asked, in the language common at the South, what raised her, replied, "Nobody raised me, 'cept I wasn't raised, 'spects I growed." It is somewhat so with our banking policy. It waits upon events. It has no fixed principle, with few exceptions, with a view only to the situation day by day, sometimes shaving each other; and this is the system alleged in immense transactions, with the boldness which was a marked feature of the Gold Exchange Bank.

What is wanted is a full and complete agreement between the most prudent managers, or some rule which will govern the action of September, and, if this is possible, more unscrupulous, will strike them at their present weak point and produce sad consequences.

NOTES.

MR. FERNANDO WOOD suggests that Congress, or the American people, should demand the release of the Fenian prisoners; and, if necessary, fail, that the country should appeal to the God of Battles. And on which side would MR. FERNANDO WOOD be found? The last time that the country appealed to the God of Battles, MR. FERNANDO WOOD was found lamenting that he was prevented from sending arms to the enemy.

THE adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment establishes in the State of New York that equality of political rights among all citizens which is the one of the disgraces of the Democratic party in the State of Indiana. And on which side would FERNANDO WOOD be found? The last time that the country appealed to the God of Battles, MR. FERNANDO WOOD was found lamenting that he was prevented from sending arms to the enemy.

THE shrinkage in prices is one of the measures which belong to a paper system. ADAM SMITH, near the end of the last century, spoke of the danger of suspending the prosperity of the people upon the "wings of the imagination;" and we are now witnessing one of its realizations.

As part of our difficulty is due to hoards in the South, where the large reserves of the cotton and the absence of banks are favorable; but the time will surely come when the unlimited issue volume of currency at the present day with effects not very different from those produced for several successive years, modified, however, by the action of gold, which will retain much of its present circulation.

The amount the South has withdrawn from us, in the shape of gold, since the close of the war of 1865-69, is estimated by sagacious financiers at fifty millions of legal tenders. The amount of the crop of 1869-70 marketed at present will equal if not larger amount will be required. Although these sums go from one portion of the Union to another, they are not returned to the North. The reserve of national banks remains largely at the commercial centres, and so little of legal tenders that the banks owe their exemption from distress to the confidence which the country has in the solidity of its own strength. All who want legal tenders in considerable sums understand well that the notice is required of the withdrawal of as little in this bank and a little in that may be borrowed for the exigency. It is at this vital point that we are exposed to danger. The effect of the September raid was wide-spread, because its secret was destroyed. A scheme for carrying on the same operation on a few hundreds of millions was broken up. FISK, in his testimony, pointed to the difference between the gambling of BELL & HOUSE and the legitimate dealings. He could manage forty millions of short gold as the Gold Exchange Bank with more ease than from fifteen to twenty.

Topsy, or some other fictitious character, on being asked, in the language common at the South, what raised her, replied, "Nobody raised me, 'cept I wasn't raised, 'spects I growed." It is somewhat so with our banking policy. It waits upon events. It has no fixed principle, with few exceptions, with a view only to the situation day by day, sometimes shaving each other; and this is the system alleged in immense transactions, with the boldness which was a marked feature of the Gold Exchange Bank.

What is wanted is a full and complete agreement between the most prudent managers, or some rule which will govern the action of September, and, if this is possible, more unscrupulous, will strike them at their present weak point and produce sad consequences.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS

February 7.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced to incorporate a company to construct a tunnel from New York city to the New Jersey side. A resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to report the steaming and sailing lines, and one charter each, of American and Asiatic Transatlantic steamships to provide for detailing government vessels to aid the steamships. In the House, MR. JOHN THOMAS, JR. HOOD, a Representative from Ohio, was announced, and seven speeches were made in the usual strain of formal eulogy.

February 8.—In the Senate, the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment by Iowa was announced. A resolution to remove the disabilities of Indian treaties was given notice of. MR. SUMNER moved to refer so much of the message of the President to the Committee on Foreign Relations as relates to the Cuban question, and to provide for facilitating and selling of the Spanish gun-boats, and for the transmission of Cuba.—In the House a resolution was ordered respecting the number of an American citizen in Cuba.

February 10.—In the Senate, the bill for the admission of MISSISSIPPI was taken up. MR. SUMNER debated upon the amendment striking out the prescription of test oaths. MR. CONKLING, MR. MORTON, MR. FRELINGHUYSEN, and others replied, and the latter replied, repeating his charges against MR. JOHNSON. MR. SUMNER made a second speech of a later period.—In the House, most of the session was occupied with discussion of a motion to raise the salaries of members $50,000; but no action was taken upon it.

February 14.—In the Senate, a resolution offered by MR. Sherman, to recognize the Cubans as belligerents, was continued consideration. A bill was passed referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment, and then laid aside for the bill providing for the admission of MISSISSIPPI. MR. SUMNER also introduced another bill, which was referred. In the House, several bills were introduced, one to provide for a further reduction of taxes; another to provide for the better protection of the government in the purchase of supplies. The death of MR. A. F. EVANS, of WISCONSIN, was announced, and the customary eulogies were delivered in his memory.

February 15.—The Senate was not in session.—In the House, the bill to reduce taxation and duties was taken up. An amendment to strike out the appropriation for members of the Legislature, only three members voting for it. An amendment cutting down the tax on tobacco to 24 cents was defeated. It was also rejected after a prolonged debate. The bill was left under consideration, the House finally having been acted on in Committee of the Whole.

NEWS ITEMS.

No business of general interest has been transacted in the New York State Legislature during the week. A large number of bills have been introduced, but none of any public importance.

On the 7th inst. four Americans, citizens of New York, were brought upon the steamer Tybee by a Spaniard, and one of them, Jesse Greenwald, was shot by the Spanish authorities at Santiago de Cuba. The steamer has since been arrested, and being a British vessel, the matter will be left to the British representative. The murder of MR. Greenwald appears to be a most unprovoked one, and the facts have been communicated to our Government. Steps will probably be taken at once to obtain redress from the Spanish authorities at Madrid.

The Connecticut Republican State Convention met at Hartford, February 9, and nominated candidates for State offices. The resolutions adopted congratulate the Southern States and the country on the completion of reconstruction and the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment; favor the speedy payment of the national debt in coin, and denounce repudiation.

The Democratic State Convention of the 22d inst. was promulgated February 8, which, in accordance with the usual custom, met on the 22d inst. The resolutions which were adopted declare the Democracy to be true. Such as have been detailed as professors in colleges, and to promote in that capacity the Democratic party principles. The Democratic party arrangement with the authorities. Democratic party to be true to their private business, and to change their residence, and travel at their pleasure within the United States.

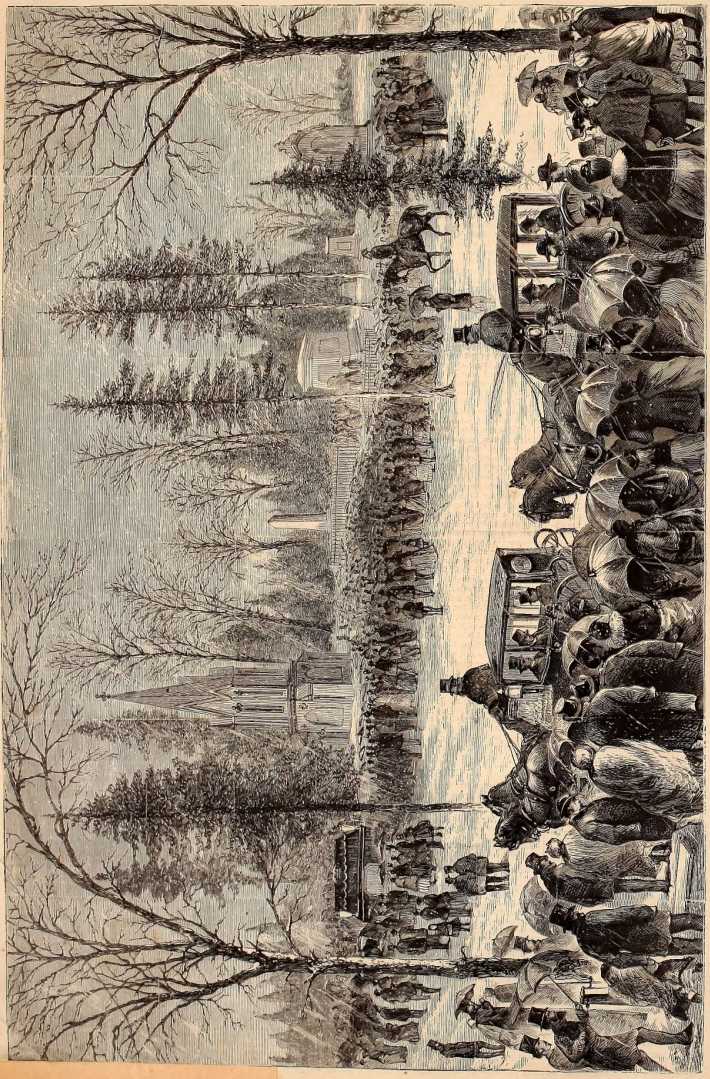
FOREIGN NEWS.

EARLY on the evening of February 7, M. Rochefort was arrested on his way home from the Chamber, after meeting near Belleville. This was the signal for an immediate gathering of his friends in the streets of Paris, and by two o'clock the next morning, under the lead of a man in a red shirt, barricades were erected at that section were barricaded, the people taking omnibuses, carts, and whatever came to hand. The police attempted to carry one of the barricades, but was repulsed, with the loss of one officer killed and three wounded. The other barricades were not defended. The troops concentrated around the Hôtel de Ville, which they pillaged. The troops were then brought forward, and the mob fled in all directions. The streets were cleared, and the barricades destroyed. Later in the day, however, new and more formidable barricades were erected around the Hôtel de Ville, which were carried by the military without firing a shot. The disturbances were suppressed, and the Government believed to be master of the situation. Numerous arrests followed the outbreak. It became so soon as there was any danger, to save his precious locks. Many of the prisoners were soon released, and are now in prison awaiting trial. The Paris journals declare the discovery of a conspiracy against the Emperor.

A new conspiracy has been discovered in Spain. The Queen's throne is by no means safe yet. Spain, however, is still dreaming about an actual monarch occupy.

The sessions of the British Parliament opened February 8, when the given's Speech was read by COMMISSIONER, owing to the interposition of her Majesty. Among the government measures to be brought forward at the present session are the amendment of Irish land system, a bill for the enlargement of the franchise, and a measure for the "more effectual protection of British subjects who desire naturalization in foreign States."

The Spanish Home Secretary has issued a circular, for popular discontent, has recommended the cancelling of all the recent reforms.



BURIAL OF MR. PEABODY'S REMAINS IN HARMONY GROVE CEMETERY.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. W. TAYLOR.—[SEE PAGE 135.]

BURIAL OF MR. PEABODY.

THE burial of MR. PEABODY'S remains took place in Harmony Grove Cemetery, at the town of Peabody, on the 8th of February. The weather in the morning was damp and dull. Snow began falling at nine o'clock; and it was remarked that it stormed when the body was placed on board of the Monarch at Portsmouth, when it was landed at Portland, when the funeral ceremonies took place in that city, and again when the last services were held at Peabody. The stormy weather did not prevent the assembling of an immense crowd of people from far and near to witness the ceremonies. Thousands flocked to Peabody by the early trains, and by the afternoon the train arrived containing PRINCE ARTHUR and suit, Minister THORNTON, the several British naval officers, Governors CLAFLIN of Massachusetts, STEVENS of New Hampshire, CHAMBERLAIN of Maine, numerous military officials, and citizens of distinction, the town was crowded with visitors.

On their arrival at Peabody, Prince ARTHUR and his party were escorted to the residence of Colonel A. A. ABBOTT, Chairman of the Funeral Committee, and thence, with other visitors, proceeded to the Institute, to inspect the room where the body, removed the previous evening to facilitate the arrangements for the services, had been lying in state. About eleven o'clock the body was borne to the village church, a plain country meeting-house, followed by a long procession in which no particular order was observed. The Prince, in the undress uniform of his regiment, rode to the church with uncovered head.

The interior of the church was appropriately draped in mourning. The recess in which the pulpit partly stands was hung in black, with a great white cross in the centre. This cross was capoided by a wide and heavy fold of black, reaching across the summit of the arch, and bordered on either edge with white, long curtain-like folds at the sides completed the design. The casket containing the body was placed on the communion-table, in front of the pulpit. There were large bouquets of flowers laid thereon, one of which, in the form of a crown, will be preserved and forwarded to Queen VICTORIA. A cross of white flowers was suspended in the centre, and the body was guarded by four members of the Sutton Guard. The blinds were closed, and the edifice was lighted by gas. The relatives of the deceased were first seated, in one of the centre front pews. Prince ARTHUR and suit were escorted to seats in the middle of the church, and other distinguished visitors in adjoining pews.

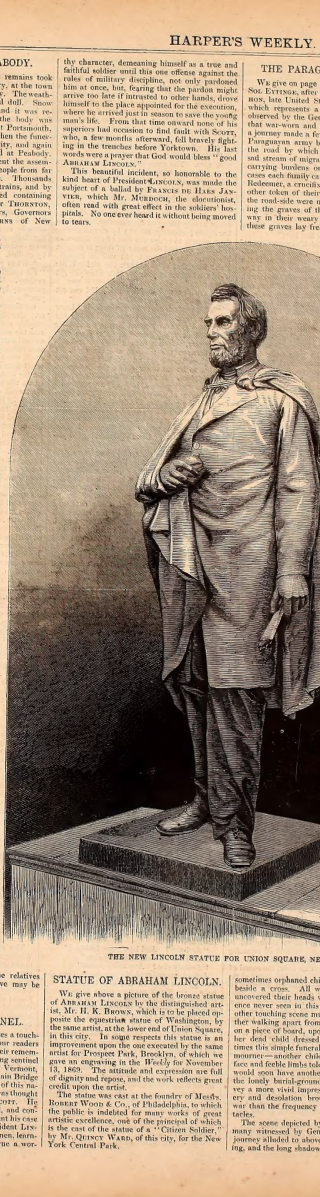
After a voluntary on the organ and other introductory services, Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP pronounced a warm and eloquent eulogy on the life and character of Mr. PEABODY. During the delivery of the eulogy the speaker, who was a personal friend of the deceased, was visibly affected. By two o'clock in the afternoon the services in the church were ended, and the procession was formed to escort the body to the cemetery. By this time the storm had increased in violence, and the final ceremonies were hurried through under circumstances rather unfavorable to the solemnity which should be observed upon funeral occasions. But, notwithstanding the storm, the procession was pronounced a fine display.

The burying-ground, known as "Harmony Grove," is a beautifully-wooded inclosure, situated about half a mile from the church. At the tomb the United States troops, who headed the procession, opened ranks. The casket was deposited in a tomb by the men who removed it, only the pall-bearers leaving their carriages. This ceremony occupied but a few moments, and the procession then returned to Peabody. Our illustration, on page 132, represents the scene in the cemetery. The body will remain in its present resting-place until the relatives agree upon some spot where a grave may be dug for its permanent reception.

THE PARDONED SENTINEL.

OUR engraving on page 136 illustrates a touching incident of the late war, which our readers will not be sorry to have recalled to their remembrance. Early in the spring of 1863 a regiment WILLIAM SCOTT, a native of Vermont, was found asleep on his post at the Chain Bridge near Washington. Several instances of this nature having then recently occurred, it was thought necessary to make an example of SCOTT. He was accordingly tried by court-martial, and condemned to be shot. At the last moment his case was brought to the attention of President LINCOLN, and that most kind-hearted of men, learning that young SCOTT had always borne a worthy character, demeaning himself as a true and faithful soldier until this one offense against the rules of military discipline, not only pardoned him at once, but, fearing that the pardon might arrive too late if intrusted to other hands, drove himself to the place appointed for the execution, where he arrived just in season to save the young man's life. From that time onward none of his superiors had occasion to find fault with SCOTT, who, a few months afterward, fell bravely fighting in the trenches before Yorktown. His last words were a prayer that God would bless "good ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

This beautiful incident, so honorable to the kind heart of President LINCOLN, was made the subject of a ballad by FRANCIS DE HASS JANVIER, which Mr. MURDOCH, the elocutionist, often read with great effect in the soldiers' hospitals. No one ever heard it without being moved to tears.



THE NEW LINCOLN STATUE FOR UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

STATUE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WE give above a picture of the bronze statue of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, by the distinguished artist, Mr. H. K. BROWN, which is to be placed opposite the equestrian statue of Washington, by the same artist, at the lower end of Union Square, in this city. In some respects this statue is an improvement upon the one executed by the same artist for Prospect Park, Brooklyn, of which we gave an engraving in the Weekly for November 13, 1869. The attitude and expression are full of dignity and repose, and the work reflects great credit upon the artist.

The statue was cast at the foundry of Messrs. ROBERT WOOD & CO., of Philadelphia, to which the public is indebted for many works of great artistic excellence, one of the principal of which is the cast of the statue of a "Citizen Soldier," by Mr. QUINCY WARD, of this city, for the New York Central Park.

THE PARAGUAYAN MOTHER.

WE give on page 137 an illustration drawn by SOL EYTINGE, after a sketch by General M'MAHON, late United States Minister to Paraguay, which represents a touching scene, frequently observed by the General in journeying through that war-worn and desolated land. Describing a journey made a few days after a defeat of the Paraguayan army by the allied forces, he says in the road by which he traveled presented one unbroken stream of migrating families, the women all carrying burdens on the head. In almost all cases each family carried with it an image of the Redeemer, a crucifix, a Mater Dolorosa, or some other token of their religious faith. All along the road-side were newly-erected crosses, marking the graves of those who had fallen by the way in their weary pilgrimage. On many of these graves lay fresh garlands of flowers, and sometimes orphaned children were seen kneeling beside a cross. All who passed these crosses uncovered their heads with a feeling and reverence never seen in this country. No war or other touching scene much less frequent—a mother walking apart from all others, and bearing on a piece of board, upon her head, the body of her dead child dressed for the grave. Sometimes this simple funeral was followed by a single mourner—another child—whose pinched, pale face and feeble limbs told plainly that the mother would soon have another sad burden to bear to the lonely burial-ground. Nothing could convey a more vivid impression of the abject misery and desolation brought upon the land by war than the frequency of these mournful spectacles.

The scene depicted by our artist was one of many witnessed by General M'MAHON on the journey alluded to above. It was toward evening, and the long shadows of the mother and the child-mourner tottering after her formed the shape of a cross upon the dusty road—an incident happily preserved in our illustration.

AGE OF ANIMALS.

THE hare, rabbit, and squirrel, if they escape the gun of the sportsman, seldom outlive the seventh year. The average age of the fox is from twelve to fifteen years, of the cat about fifteen, and of the wolf from fifteen to twenty years. The horse, in a domestic state, does not often live longer than from twenty to twenty-five years, and the ass ranges to about the same period. Old age prostrated "Copenhagen," the famous steed of the Duke of Wellington, at twenty-seven years. But the wild horse is supposed to attain a much greater age. The one extraordinary case is on record of even the domestic animal attaining sixty-two years. Digs have been known to live through thirty years, but the average term is much less. The ox rarely seldom exceeds fifteen years. But great longevity is popularly assigned to the stag or red deer; and naturalists are agreed that his term may go beyond forty years—perhaps to half a century. The camel arrives at maturity in five years, lives to forty or fifty, and occasionally becomes a centenarian.

The dog is not so lively as of old in his sixth or seventh year, and has evidently passed the bounds of youth. Gray hairs are born and there upon him at the close of his eighth year, chiefly around his eyes and at the corners of his mouth. Such appearances become more conspicuous to the eleventh or twelfth year, when actual decrepitude usually commences, and increases so rapidly that by the fourteenth year the animal is a burden to himself and a nuisance to others. But dogs have lingered to twenty years.

The average age of sheep does not much exceed ten years; to that period they will usually live, breed, and thrive tolerably well. But there are instances of a much more protracted age. Somerville speaks of a Spanish ram that died at thirteen years old; and a ewe is mentioned that yeaned a pair of lambs when a shearling, had two pairs yearly for fifteen years, and produced single lambs for two years more. Particular sheep are stated to live nearly twenty years—those which the mountain shepherds call "guide-sheep," old wethers which never go out in purpose to direct the bleating flocks in the unfrequented wilds.

Cows have an average age of about fifteen years. Rings on the horns tell the number of their days. At four years old a ring is formed at their roots, and every succeeding year another is added. Thus, by allowing three years before their appearance, and counting the number of rings, the age of the animal is known. It is well for certain members of the human race losing their bloom, who are somewhat sensitive upon the question of age, that there are no definite appearances added with annual precision to their cheeks, revealing to the eye what they keep from the ear.

The bear rarely exceeds twenty years; the rhinoceros has been known to live through that period; and perhaps the lion, though commonly reputed a long-lived animal, does not usually go much beyond it. There are, however, instances of lions reaching to threescore years and ten. Pompey, who died in the Tower of London in 1760, was nearly an octogenarian, or upward of seventy years old. Of all the terrestrial mammalia, the elephant seems to be the longest liver, sometimes passing the century; and a much greater age is reported to have been attained by a distinguished individual. When Alexander the Great invaded the dominions of Porus, one of the rajahs of Upper India, he took a great elephant from the enemy, and dedicated him AJAX, dedicated him to the sun, and let him go with this inscription, "Alexander, the son of Jupiter, dedicated Ajax to the Sun." The animal is said to have been found with the inscription three hundred and fifty years afterward. It need hardly be remarked, to prevent full credence being given to this relation, that it rests upon very dubious authority of ancient times, though still repeated by many respectable modern writers. However, the elephant, if not the king of beasts, is entitled to be considered somewhat of a patriarch among them.

The "wide-ruling eagle," the king of birds, surpasses most of the feathered tribes in his term of life. One kept at Vienna died after a confinement of a hundred and four years. The raven has also the reputation of being a centenarian. On an ancient oak near Selborne a pair fixed their residence for ages—instances of years that it came to be distinguished by the title of the raven-tree. But swans occasionally survive a to a century and a half and even longer. The melody of the dying swan, once popularly believed, is well known to exist only in the mythology of the ancients.

Among fishes, the carp is notorious for the remarkable tenacity with which it clings to life. In the canals of Chantilly, formerly the seat of the Prince of Condé, carps have been kept for more than a hundred years, most of them appearing hoary through old age, and so tame that they came at the call of the keeper to be fed. The pike, from remote antiquity, has been considered a long liver; and modern observation confirms this testimony of the elder Pliny. One ninety years old is mentioned by Bloch in England, and most extraordinary example of its longevity is related by Gesner. In the year 1497 a pike was taken at Thalheim, in Suabia, with a brass ring attached to it, on which was engraved the following inscription in Greek characters: "I am the fish that was first of all put into this lake by the hand of the Governor of the Universe—Frederick II., the 5th of October, 1230." The fish was therefore 267 years old, and is said to have weighed 350 pounds. Its skeleton, nineteen feet in length, was long preserved at Manheim as a great curiosity in natural history. Pike of seventy pounds weight have been taken from some of the Irish lakes, and most obviously have seen many days in comparison with those of their congeners.

The great longevity of the tortoise is one of the best established facts of this nature. One lived upward of a hundred and twenty years in the garden of Lambeth Palace. But another is recorded at Peterborough whose age amounted to not less than two hundred and seventy years. Bishop Marsh's predecessor in the see had remembered it above sixty years, without any sensible change in its weight, and he was the seventh prelate who had worn the mitre since the injury there. The tortoise weighed between thirteen and fourteen pounds, and moved with apparent ease, though pressed with a weight of eighteen stone.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-THIRD.

TRACED.

The chaise rattled out through the gates. The dogs barked furiously. Sir Patrick looked round, and waved his hand as he turned the corner of the road. Blanche was left alone in the yard.

She lingered a little, absently patting the dogs. They had especial claims on her sympathy at that moment; they, too, evidently thought it hard to be left behind at the house, while the round herself. Sir Patrick had left the responsibility of superintending the entertainment to Blanche. There was something to be done yet before the arrangements for treating Anne were complete. Blanche left the yard to do it.

On her way back to the house she met Arnold, dispatched by Lady Lundie in search of her.

The plan of occupation for the afternoon had been settled during Blanche's absence. Some demon had whispered to Lady Lundie to enliven a term for feudal antiquities, and there was no spreading that taste among her guests. She had proposed an excursion to the ruins of a house standing the hills—far to the westward (fortunately for Patrick's chance of escaping discovery) of the hills at Craig Fernie. Most of the guests were to ride, and some to accompany their hostess in the open carriage. Sooner than fall for proselytes, Lady Lundie had unnecessarily remarked the disappearance of certain members of her circle. Mr. Bashwood vanished, nobody knew where. Sir Patrick and Blanche had followed his example. Mr. Playmore had observed, upon this, with some asperity, that if they were all to treat each other in that unceremonious manner, the country gates was turned into a Penitentiary, on the silent system, the first time the house would be full of people who inhabited it. Under these circumstances, Arnold suggested that Blanche would do well to make her excuses on the score of head-quarters, and accept the seat in the carriage which her employer would be sure to offer to her.

"I see in for the feudal antiquities, Blanche," he said, "and we must help each other through as well as we can. If you will go in the carriage, I'll go too."

Blanche shook her head.

"There are serious reasons for my keeping up appearances," she said. "I shall go in the carriage. You mustn't go at all."

Arnold naturally looked a little surprised, and asked to be favored with an explanation.

Blanche took his arm and hugged it close. Now that Anne was lost, Arnold was more precious to her than ever. She gratefully hungered to hear at that moment, from his own lips, how fond he was of her. It mattered nothing that she was already perfectly satisfied on this point. It was so nice (after he had said it five hundred times already!) to make him say it once more!

"Suppose I had no explanation to give?" she said.

"Would you stay behind by yourself to please me?"

"I would do any thing to please you!"

"Do you really love me as much as that?"

They were still in the yard; and the only witnesses present were the dogs. Arnold answered in the language without words—which is nevertheless the most expressive language in use, between men and women, all over the world.

"This is not doing my duty," said Blanche, prudently. "But, oh Arnold, I am so anxious and so miserable! And it is such a consolation to know that you won't turn your back on me, for fun!"

With that preface she told him what had happened in the library. Arnold's instructions relating to the cross-roads, and also to the serious necessity of pursuing the investigation in the direction of Craig Fernie, had relieved from all fear of being sent back to Craig Fernie) undertook to do every thing that Arnold told him, and promised to keep the secret from every body.

They went back to the house, and met with an icy welcome from Lady Lundie. Her lady-ship repeated her remark on the subject of turning Windygates into a Penitentiary. Blanche humbly received Arnold's petition to be excused from going to see the castle—and Arnold followed her. "It doesn't matter—oh, dear me, it doesn't matter!" I can't force my guests to feel an interest in the ruins of the Abbey of Scottish Antiquities. No! no! my dear Blanche!—I won't be the first time, or the last, that I have driven out alone. I don't at all object to being alone. 'My mind to me a kingdom is,' as the song says. Ha! Ha! Arnold's outraged self-importance asserted its violated claims on human respect, until her distressed and medical guest rose to the room and smoothed his hostess's ruffled plumes. The surgeon (he privately declared to Arnold) thought Lady Lundie's temper to go. Smith and Jones (profoundly interested in feudal antiquities) said they would stay behind, in the "cauld" weather than miss this unexpected treat. Ono, Two, and Three caught the infection from their employer, and declined on horseback. Lady Lundie's celebrated "smile" (warranted to remain unaltered on her face for hours together) made its appearance once more. She issued her orders with the most charming amiability, and left the house in the best of humor and high-ship, with the eye to mean economy, which is only to be met with in very high people, and says a shilling in a manner that shows the ruins. With that she went up stairs to array herself for the drive—and Blanche left the house; and was evidently virtuous, fascinating, and accomplished woman, facing her irresistibly in a new Position.

At a private signal from Blanche, Arnold slipped out and rejoined her in the yard, where the grooms crossed the road that led to the railway.

There was a space of open heath on one side of the road, and stone-wall and hedge on the farmhouse inclosure on the other. Arnold sat down on the soft heather—and lit a cigar—and listened to see his way through to the mysterious mystery of Anne's appearance and Anne's flight.

He considered his friend's absence exactly as his friend had anticipated: he could only assume that Geoffrey had gone to keep a private appointment with Anne. His mysterious appearance at Windygates alone, and Miss Silvester's assertion that Anne had left the house before she was aware that she were staying in the house, seemed, under these circumstances, to point to the plain conclusion that Anne had left the house by the fortunately missed each other. But what could be the motive of her flight? Whether she had gone to some other place in which she might meet Geoffrey? or whether she had gone back to the old home? whether she had fled from some sudden impulse of despair?—were questions which Arnold was accustomed to put to himself, and to solve. There was no choice but to wait until an opportunity offered of reporting what had happened to Geoffrey's employer.

After the lapse of half an hour, the sound of approaching hoofs along the road from the station—Sir Patrick, this time, was compelled to drive himself—announced the arrival of the doctor. Arnold crossing the road, he stopped the pony.

"So! so!" said the old gentleman. "You have actually ground. He looked at the stick, and then suddenly pulled it out of the ground and looked at Arnold. "Good-afternoon!" he said, and went on his way again by himself.

Arnold followed, and stopped him. For a moment the two men looked at each other without a word passing on either side. Arnold spoke first.

"You're out of humor, Geoffrey. What has upset you in this way? Have you and Miss Silvester misunderstood each other?"

Geoffrey was silent.

"Have you seen her since she left Windygates?"

No reply.

"Do you know where Miss Silvester is now?"

Still no reply. Still the same stately-insolent defiance of look and manner. Arnold's dark color began to deepen.

"Why don't you answer me?" he said.

"Because I have had enough of it."

"Enough of what?"

"Enough of being worried about Miss Silvester. Miss Silvester is my business—not yours."

"Gently, Geoffrey! Don't forget that I have been mixed up in that business—without seeking it—from the first."

"There's no fear of my forgetting. You have cast it in my teeth often enough."

"Cast it in your teeth?"

"Yes! Am I never to hear the last of my obligations to you? The devil take the obligations! I'm sick of the sound of it."

There was a spirit in Geoffrey—not easily brought to the surface, through the overlying simplicity and good-humor of his ordinary character—which, once roused, was a spirit not readily quelled. Geoffrey had roused it at last.

"When you come to your senses," he said, "I'll remember old times—and receive your apology. Till you do—good-by!" He turned away by himself. "I have no more to say to you."

Geoffrey set his teeth, and came one step nearer. Arnold's eyes met his, with a look which steadily and firmly challenged him—though he was the strongest man of the two—to move the quarrel a step further, if he dared. The one human virtue which Geoffrey respected and understood was the virtue of courage. And there it was before him—the undeniable courage of the weaker man. The callous nerves on the scoundrel on the one tender place in his whole being. He turned, and went on his way.

A jolt by himself, and a head dropped on his breast. The friend who had saved his life—the true friend he had slighted, who had stood out with his earliest and happiest remembrances of old days—had grossly insulted him, and he had let him deliberately, without the slightest expression of regret. Arnold's affectionate nature—simple, loyal, eloquent—rose where Geoffrey's was rounded to the quick. Geoffrey's fast-retreating figure, in the open view before him, became blurred and dim. He put his hand over both his eyes, and hid, with a boyish shame, the hot tears that told of the heartache, and that betrayed the man who shed them.

He was still struggling with the emotion which had overpowered him, when the meeting happened at the place where the roads met.

The four roads pointed at nearly as might be toward the four points of the compass. Arnold was now on the road to the eastward, having advanced in the direction to which Geoffrey between two and three hundred yards from the farm-house inclosure before either of the men had taken his road to the westward, curving away behind the farm, led to the nearest market-town. Arnold's road led to the north to the station. And the road to the north led back to Windygates House.

While Arnold's way still fifty yards from the turning which would take him back to Windygates—with the hot tears were still blinding his eyes—Arnold's eye—the gate of the farm inclosure opened. A light four-wheel chaise came out, driven by a young, ruddy, country lout, by his side. The woman was Anne Silvester, and the man was the owner of the farm.

Instead of taking the way which led to the station, the chaise pursued the westward road to the nearest market-town. Arnold, at the junction, the backs of the persons in the vehicle were necessarily turned on Geoffrey, advancing behind them from the farm-house. He just carelessly noticed the shabby little chaise, and then turned off north on the way to Windygates.

By the time Arnold was composed enough to look round him, the chaise had taken the turning which led to the station, and was out of sight.

Arnold's reflections were of the most painful kind. So, in her sore need, had Anne Silvester won the sympathy which had given her a place by the side of Geoffrey! So, in her need, had took him on his own business to the market-town. And so, for the second time, had she escaped the terrible risk of discovery which threatened her—from Geoffrey, on his way back; from Arnold, at his post. Was it all luck, or was the watch for her appearance at the station.

The afternoon wore on. The servants at Windygates, airing themselves in the grounds—in the absence of their employers—and the gardeners were disturbed, for the moment, by the unexpected return of one of "the gentlefolk." Mr. Bashwood presented himself at the house, alone; went straight to the smoking-room; and calling for another supply of tea for one, settled himself in an arm-chair with the newspaper, and began to smoke.

He soon tired of reading, and fell into thinking of what had happened during the latter part of his journey.

The prospect before him had more than realized the most sanguine anticipations that he could have formed of it. He had braced himself—after what had happened in the library—to face nothing for another night's rest, and to return the outbreak of a nerves—when he came back—to the house. Arnold was away—and there was nothing to fear! Here were three people (Sir Patrick, Arnold, and Blanche) who must at least know that Anne was in some serious trouble—keeping the secret which Anne had left them in the dark; interests were at stake! And, more wonderful still, here was Anne herself—so far from ruin ing a hue and cry after him—actually taking flight, without saying a word that could compromise him with any living soul!

What in the name of wonder did it mean? He did his best to find his way to an explanation of some sort; and he actually contrived to account for the silence of Blanche and her uncle, and Arnold. It was pretty clear that they must have all three combined to keep Lady Lundie in ignorance of her runaway governess's return to the house.

But the secret of Anne's silence completely baffled him.

He was simply incapable of conceiving that the horror of seeing herself set up as an obstacle to Blanche's marriage might have been sufficient to overpower all sense of her own wrongs, and to hurry her away, resolute, in her ignorance of what she to do, never to return again, rather than to let living eyes rest on her in the character of Arnold's wife. "If Anne Sprinkle is not dead, yet," was the final conclusion at which Geoffrey arrived. "If it's her interest to hold her tongue, it's my interest to hold mine, and there's an end of it for the present!"

He put up his feet on a chair, and rested his magnificent muscles after his walk, and filled another pipe, in thorough contentment with himself. No interference to dread from him, no more awkward questions on the terms they were on now to come from Arnold. He looked back at the quarrel on the heath with a certain complacency—he did his friend justice, though they had disagreed. "The would have been better for the fellow had so much pluck in him!" he said to himself as he struck the match and lit his second pipe.

An hour more were on; and Sir Patrick was the next person who returned.

He was thoughtful, but in no sense depressed. Judging by appearances, his errand to Craig Fernie had certainly not ended in disappointment. The old gentleman hummed his favorite little Scotch air—never absently, apparently—as he took his pinch of snuff from the knob of his ivory cane much as usual. He went to the library bell and summoned a servant.

"Any body been here for me?"—"No, Sir Patrick."—"No letters?"—"No, Sir Patrick."—"All very well. Come up stairs to my room, and help me on with my dressing-gown." The man helped him to his dressing-gown and inquired "is Miss Lundie at home?"—"No, Sir Patrick. They're all away with my lady on an excursion."—"Very good. Get me a cup of tea: and while we're about it, bring me a bottle, in case I take a nap." The servant went out. Sir Patrick stretched himself on the sofa. "Ay! ay! a little aching in the back, and a certain stiffness in the leg. I dare say I've walked a bit just as I do. Age, I suppose, in both cases? Well! well! will I ever be old in head or heart. 'The rest' (as Pope says) 'is leather and prunella.'" He returned resignedly to his little Scotch air. The servant came in and set the tea-tray. And then the room was quiet, except for the low humming of insects and the gentle rustling of the creepers at the window. For the moment at least Sir Patrick sipped his coffee, and meditated—by no means in the character of a man who was depressed by any recent disappointment. In five minutes more he was asleep.

A little later, and the party returned from the ruins.

With the one exception of their lady-leader, the whole expedition was depressed—Smith and Jones, in particular, being quite speechless. Lady Lundie alone still met feudal antiquities with a cheerful front. She had chested the man who showed the ruins of his shillings, and she had thoroughly well satisfied with herself. Her voice was flute-like in its melody, and she celebrated "small" had never been in better spirits. "Wasn't it interesting!" said her ladyship, descending from the carriage with ponderous grace, and addressing herself to Geoffrey, inquiringly, on the portico of the house. "You have had a bore, Mr. Delamayn. The next time you want to go for a walk, give your hostess a word of warning, and you won't repent it." Blanche (looking very weary and anxious) questioned her mother. The moment she got in, about Arnold and her uncle. Sir Patrick was invisible up stairs. Lady Lundie's mouth had not come back. It wanted only twenty minutes of dinner-time; and full evening-dress was as much as Mr. Windgrave's wardrobe, nevertheless, still lingered in the hall in the hope of seeing Arnold before he went up stairs. The hope was realized. As the clock struck the quarter he came in. And he, too, was out of spirits like the rest!

"Have you seen her?" asked Blanche.

"No," said Arnold. In the most perfect good faith. "The way she has escaped by is not the way by the cross-roads—I answer for that."

They separated to dress. When they assembled again, in the library, before dinner, Blanche found her way, the moment he entered the room, to Sir Patrick's side.

"News, uncle! I'm dying for news."

"Good news, my dear—so far."

"You have found Anne?"

"Not exactly that."

"You have heard of her at Craig Fernie?"

"I have made some important discoveries at Craig Fernie, Blanche. Hush! here comes your mother. Wait till after dinner, and you may hear more than I can tell you now. There may be news from the north to-morrow!" he added.

The dinner was a wearisome ordeal to at least two other persons present besides Blanche. Arnold, sitting opposite to Geoffrey, without exchanging a word with him, felt the altered relations between his former friend and himself very painfully. Sir Patrick, missing the skilled hand of Hester Detwinglet in every dish that was offered to him, marked the dinner among the wasted opportunities of his life, and resented his sister-in-law's flow of spirits as something simply inhuman under present circumstances. Blanche followed Lady Lundie into the drawing-room in a state of burning impatience for the rising of the gentlemen from their wine. Her step-mother—mapping out a new antiquarian excursion for the next day, and finding Blanche's ears closed to her occasional remarks on botanical Scotland five hundred years since—lamented, with satirical emphasis, the absence of an intelligent companion of her own sex; and stretched her majestic figure on the sofa to wait with an audience worthy of her flowed in from the dining-room. Before very long—so soothing are the influences of the afternoon view of feudal antiquities, taken through the medium of an approving conscience—Lady Lundie's eyes were closed, and Lady Lundie's nose threw poured, at intervals, a sound, deep, like her ladyship's learning: regular, like her ladyship's habits—a sound which made the nightcaps and bedcroses; crooked alike by Nature, the Powder, fresh high and low—the sound (ah, Truth, what enormities find publicity in thy name!)—the sound of a snore.

Free to do as she pleased, Blanche left the echoes of the drawing-room in undisturbed enjoyment of Lady Lundie's infirmity.

She went into the library, and turned over the novels. Went out again, and looked across the hall at the drawing-room door. No! the men never have done talking their politics and drinking their wine? She went up to the west room, and changed her ear-rings, and scolded her maid. Descended once more—and made an alarming discovery in a mirror on the hall table.

Two men were standing there, but in hand, whispering to the butler. The butler, leaving them, went into the dining-room—came out again with Sir Patrick—and said to the two men, "Step this way, gentlemen." The men came out into the light. Murdoch, the station-master; and Duncan, the valet. News of Anne!

"Oh, uncle, let me stay!" pleaded Blanche.

Sir Patrick looked at her. It was impossible to say—as matters stood at that moment—what distressing intelligence the two men might not have brought of the missing woman. Duncan's return, accompanied by the station-master, looked serious. Blanche instantly penetrated the secret of her uncle's hesitation. She turned pale, and caught him by the arm. "Don't send me away," she whispered. "I can bear any thing but suspense."

"Out with it!" said Sir Patrick, holding his nerves steady. "Is she found or not?"

"She's gone by the up-train," said the station-master. "And we know where."

Sir Patrick breathed freely; Blanche's color came back. In different ways, the relief to both of them was equally great.

"You had my orders to follow her," said Sir Patrick to Duncan. "Why have you come back?"

"Your man is not to blame, Sir," interposed the station-master. "I'll answer for the train at Kirkandrew."

Sir Patrick stared, and looked at the station-master. "Ay? ay? The next station—the market-town. Inconceivably stupid of me. I never thought of that."

"I took the liberty of telegraphing your description of the lady to Kirkandrew, Sir Patrick, at your request."

"I stand corrected, Mr. Murdoch. Your head, in this matter, has been the shrewd head of the two. Well?"

"There's the answer, Sir."

Sir Patrick and Blanche read the telegram together.

"Kirkandrew. Up train. 7.40 P.M. Lady as described. No luggage. Bag in her hand. Traveling alone. Ticket—second-class. Place for Edinburgh."

Edinburgh!" repeated Blanche. "Oh, uncle! we shall lose her in a great place like that!"

"We shall not lose her, my dear, and you shall see how. Duncan, get me pen, ink, and paper. Mr. Murdoch, you are going back to the station, I suppose?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"I will give you a telegram, to be sent at once to Edinburgh."

He drew a carefully-worded telegraphic message, and addressed it to The Sheriff of Midlothian.

"The Sheriff is an old friend of mine," he explained to his niece. "And he is now in Edinburgh. Before the train gets in at the terminus he will receive this personal description of Miss Silvester, with my request to have all her movements carefully watched by the police."

The police are entirely at his disposal, and the train will be watched on the platform. "I have asked for an answer by telegraph. Keep a special messenger ready for it at the station, Mr. Murdoch. Duncan, order dinner directly. Blanche, get your supper, and make yourself comfortable. Duncan, a glass of sherry for the drawing-room, and expect us in ten minutes precisely. You will know where your friend is before you go to bed to-night."

With those comforting words he returned to the gentlemen. In ten minutes more they all appeared in the drawing-room at Lady Lundie. She firmly persuaded that she had never closed her eyes—and then again in baronial Scotland five hundred years since.

Blanche, watching her opportunity, caught her uncle at a moment.

"Now for your promise," she said. "You have made some important discoveries at Craig Fernie. What are they?"

Sir Patrick's eye turned toward Geoffrey, leaning in an arm-chair in a corner of the room. He showed a certain disposition to trifle with the curiosity of his niece.

"After the discovery we have already made," he said, "can't you wait, my dear, till we get the telegram from Edinburgh?"

"That is just what it's impossible for me to do! The telegram won't come for hours yet. I want something to go on with in the mean time."

She seated herself on a sofa in the corner opposite Geoffrey, and pointed to the vacant place by her side.

Sir Patrick had promised—Sir Patrick had no choice but to keep his word. After another look at Geoffrey, he took the vacant place by his niece.

HERS OR MINE?

My sweet-heart's eyes, they're bonny and blue,
Ah me!
But he's slow to woo, and he's slow to sue,
Ah me!
Down in the valley, a year ago,
Ah me!
He plucked me a lily as fresh as snow,
Ah me!
And he kissed me as never he'd let me go.
But the lily leaves fell out of my hair,
Ah me!
Or ever his hand had fastened it there,
Ah me!
And a brown bird twittered "Beware! beware!"
Ah me!
We stood together again to-day,
Ah me!
Just where he kissed into Yes my Nay,
Ah me!
He hung his head and had naught to say.
Ah me!
Mignon's eyes have a sunny shine,
Ah me!
And Mignon cheeks are fresher than mine,
Ah me!
For I get paler because I pine.
Ah me!

The dove has forgotten his last-year's nest,
Ah me!
And it's his new love that he loves the best,
Ah me!
My heart lies like a stone in my breast.
HOWARD GLYNDON.

AN INDIAN LEGEND.

WHEN the jolly and barren mountain was first lifted into the sky, and from its elevation looked down on the plains below, and saw the valley and the less elevations covered with verdant and fruitful trees, it sent up to Brahma something like a murmur of complaint: "Why thus barren? Why these scarred and naked sides, exposed to the eye of man?" And Brahma answered, "The very light shall clothe thee, and the shadow of the passing cloud shall be as a garment unto thee. Verdure would be less light. Thou shalt share in the scars of heaven, and the youngest and loveliest of the children of sky shall nestle in thy bosom. Thou belongest half to us." So was the mountain dowered. And so, too, did the legend, when the latter minds of men been dowered in all ages. To lower elevations have been given the pleasant groves of the vine and olive. Light—light alone, and the deep shadow of the passing cloud, these are the gifts of the prophets of the race.

DEATH BY BEHEADING.

THE execution of Traupmann in Paris has revived the old question whether death instantaneously follows upon the severance of the head from the body. Dr. Pinel asserts that decapitation does not immediately affect the brain. The blood which flows from decapitation comes from the large vessels of the neck, and there is hardly any call upon the circulation of the brain. The brain remains distinct, nourished only with the blood retained by the pressure of the air. It is then the intelligence is not lost, and for a moment of separation is exhausted, there commences a state, got of death but of inertia, which lasts up to the moment when the organ, no longer fed, ceases to exist. Dr. Pinel estimates that the brain may exist without in the necessary blood for about an hour after decapitation. The period of inertia would last for about two hours, and the decapitation would not occur before the space of three hours altogether. If, he adds, a human being could analyze at the moment the horror of its situation, it is because it is physically impossible that it should do so, all the nerve which serve for the communication of orders from the brain to the trunk being severed. But there remain the nerves of hearing, of smell, and of sight.

We are told that the face of Charlotte Corday blushed at the moment of her execution. Alexander Samson, an executioner who flourished during the reign of terror, asserted that the head of a priest named Gaultier bit that of a Girondin of the name of Lacaze, which had been put into the same sack. Of course these stories are very popular accounts of phenomena easily accounted for; but the doctors Sigmond and Sue affirm, with confidence, that the felt for twenty minutes after the execution, and cite the following experiments: "Light was thrown suddenly into the rays of the sun, and the eyelids, which had been opened, were immediately shut and the result of an instantaneous flash of terror, which was experimented upon more than a quarter of an hour after having been separated from the body, turned its eyes when asked. Dr. Mœssiger, who has made this subject his special study, cites a curious experiment made on the head of a calf. A calf was hanged in a slaughter-house, in Paris, and its head cut off with a knife, the operation lasting about half a minute. The head was immediately placed upon a table, and in the space of six minutes lost two ounces and a half of blood. During the first minute all the muscles of the face and neck were agitated by rapid and irregular convulsions. During the two following minutes the convulsions assumed a different character. The tongue protruded from the mouth, which opened and closed alternately. The nostrils were dilated in a similar manner to those of an animal breathing with difficulty, the convulsions becoming more violent on pricking the tongue with a needle. On approaching the finger to the eye in the direction of the pupil, at the distance of an inch, the eye closed precipitately, and reopened an instant after, as though it wished to avoid the shock of a foreign body. This experiment was repeated several times, until the eye only closed on the eyelid being touched. At the end of the fourth minute the convulsions had entirely ceased, and were only reserved on the spinal marrow on being pierced at the back of the neck with a dagger; the eye still remained insensible to every thing; and at the end of the sixth minute all was over.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A CANADIAN clergyman not long since was called upon by a Scotch lad, who asked him to read the banns for marrying my body. He replied: "A dutter o' Zion!" said the applicant. "Yes," replied the man being summoned to the door, he was accosted by the same person, "Mon, ye maun read the banns for me married. Very well," said the minister; but perceiving with astonishment that she was alone, he continued, "Where is the man?" "And don't you find the man, and never forget the banns."

"Silence in the court-room there," thundered a police magistrate, the other morning; "the court has already consumed more time unnecessarily without being able to hear a word of the testimony."

"Lemy, you're a pig," said a father to a little five-year-old boy. "No, mother, you're what a pig is, Lemy?" "Yes, Sir; a pig's a hog's little boy."

"Do you believe in second love, Mister M'Quade?" "Do I believe in second love? Faith, I do. I'm sure boys a pound of sugar, isn't it sweet? and when it's gone, does he want another pound, eh? Isn't that sweet too? Trosh, Murphy, I do believe in second love."

A CONSTANT FRIEND.—A life-long Quaker.

SKATING WITH THE GIRLS.

Come, girls, get on your jobbey hats,
Dress in your jobbey suits,
Be sure to lace up snugly
Your jobbey boots and skates,
And we will all go skating,
For all be a splendid night,
The moon will soon be up, my dears,
We'll have a jolly time.

Then soon we're off, a little band
Tucked snugly under each arm,
While all the boys are making love,
And keeping time with us.
Oh! don't you think it's jolly,
Making up your minds to talk,
And going off on moonlight nights,
Skating with the girls?

But when it comes to putting on—
Lord bye me, you'll see
To hold the darling's pretty foot!
You have to kneel down
For oft the skate won't easily fit.
So with many tender words,
How long it takes the putting on
The skates of your girl!

The foot's so small, so very trim,
The heel so high and neat;
Perhaps a glimpse of stockings white,
May cause your heart to beat.
It takes so long to put on skates
Of pretty young girls,
And yet, we wish we always could
Go skating with the girls!

A little girl who was sent out to hunt eggs thought it strange she did not find any, as there were several hens "missing" about the premises.

An absent-minded old bachelor is in the habit, when he comes home to tea, of putting the kettle on the stove, and leaving it there for hours, forgetting to bring it when he would get up and make his tea. The other evening, on getting up to leave the room, he called his landlady, and said to him at the street door, "Mrs. Jones, you've got a kettle on the lamps and got on the stove there, and never discovered his mistake until he began to sing.

At a recent lecture Professor X—— stated that Saturn had a ring of immense size. Mrs. Brisbane, "Is Jerusalem" exclaimed an Irishman who was present, "what is a finger to have?"

The ruling passion was recently exhibited in a remarkable manner on the occasion of a funeral. An old lady was sent for to be washed, and as she sat for the corpse her neighbors were somewhat tardy in appearing at the usual hour. At last Mrs. Brown, the nurse to the building, made up her mind to take a few minutes' time from the sick to attend the funeral.

AN IMPROVED FRACTION.—Breaking your neighbor's windows.

Blank kinds of kisses are mentioned in the Scriptures: the kiss of Salutation, Valediction, Reconciliation, Betrayal, Approbation, Adoration, Treachery, and Affection.

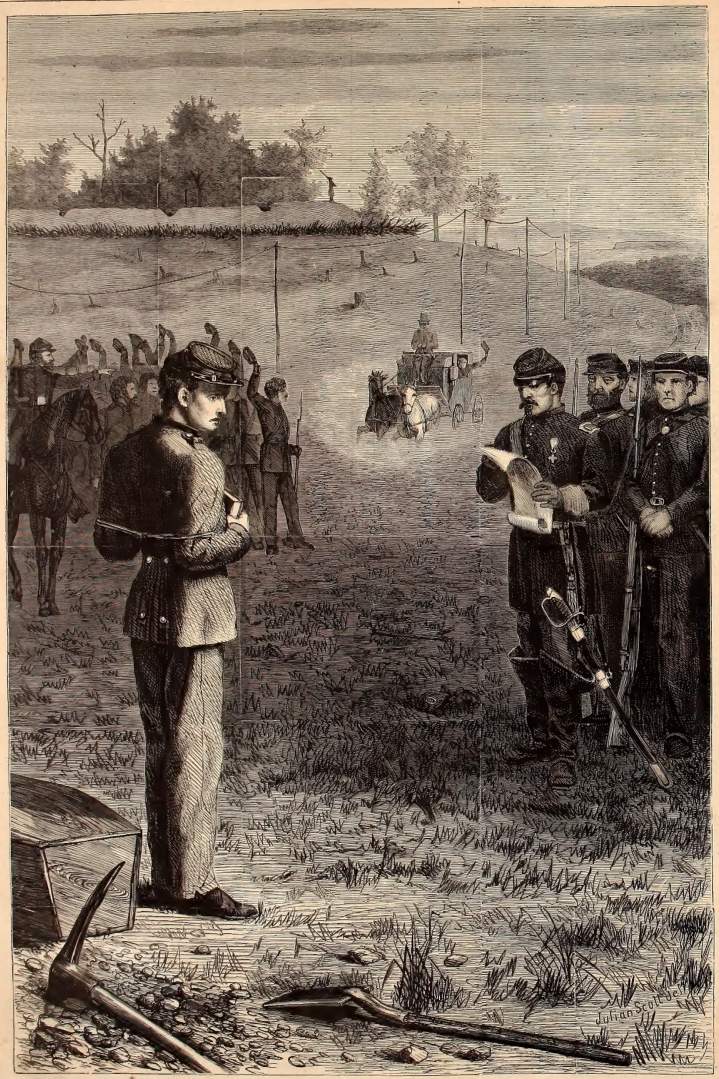
It was said of a very handsome woman, whose feet were unusually small, that she could "stand upon her complete the ordinary system of measurement, by saying that her feet make a good base.

When the great American also, belonging to Mr. Van Rensselaer, of Albany, having been in New York for a short time, in the way of a visit, to consider the care of the gardener or keeper, a gentleman, struck with the beauty of the animal, made many inquiries regarding it. In the course of the passage the inquirer remarked: "I see you have belonged to deer, haven't you, does it not?" "No, Sir; it belongs to the Van Rensselaers, Sir, and has for years."

The clergyman in the country had a stranger preacher for him one day and told him to preach. he said "Well, my brethren, how did you like the sermon to-day?" "I warn, Sir, it was rather ov plain and simple for me," replied the beadle. "I like the sermons that belabours the goolgorest and confounds the enemy; sd, Sir, I never saw one that could come up to yourself at that."

A gallant was lately eating beside his beloved, and being unable to think of any thing to say, asked her why she was like a fallen leaf. "Don't know," said she, with disarming lip, "unless it's because I'm sitting beside a green."

FOOD READER—Being relieved of one's watch.



THE PARDONED SENTINEL.—DRAWN BY JULIAN SCOTT.—[SEE PAGE 133.]

PARAGUAYAN MOTHER BEARING HER DEAD CHILD TO THE GRAVE.—DRAWN BY SOL EYTINGE, FROM A SKETCH BY GENERAL M'MAHON.—[SEE PAGE 132.]

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

BY

I saw you in the glittering crowd,
A well-dressed vision, bright and fair;
I heard your laughter—and no loud—
But then—my thoughts were otherwhere.

In the quick dance my temples brushed
A ringlet of your floating hair;
My careless foot your drapery crushed—
But then—my thoughts were otherwhere.

I heard your brilliant notes in song—
You sang a gay, coquettish air;
I praised you with the pushing throng—
But then—my thoughts were otherwhere.

I mixed not with the numerous train
That sought your lavish smiles to share;
Your presence brought nor joy nor pain,
For my best thoughts were otherwhere.

Lady, your wit is very bright;
Your winsome face is very fair;
You can all earthly sense delight—
But earnest thoughts dwell otherwhere.

Fortune has done her fitting part,
And shrined you in a setting rare;
All gifts each queen sees a true heart—
And mine its mate seeks otherwhere.

SEE.

I saw him in that shifting throng:
Such manly port and motion free
Unto a noble race belong—
But, ah! his heart beats not for me.

Once, in the round, we chanced to pass:
He bowed with gentlest courtesy—
My light robe touched him—but, alas!
I saw his heart beat not for me.

He deems me but the slave of art,
Born-dumb, and acting to be free:
He thinks I have no woman's heart—
And, ah! his heart not for me.

He wrongs me, and he has no skill
Nor care my nobler self to see;
And I, poor fool! dream of him still—
The while his heart beats not for me.

Unworthy thought! Wherefore should I
Thus bend to fate the supplicant knee?
Pride, crush these tears, forbid that sigh,
Because his heart beats not for me!

Perish, vain dream! Once more I hold
The loosened ties of "gaudy free."
Why should my life grow blank and cold
Because one heart beats not for me?

VERONICA

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Nine Books.—Book IV.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TURNING OF THE SCALE.

MR. SIMPSON, MR. Lane, and MR. Lovegrove were assembled in the office of the last-named gentleman. They had been talking together for more than an hour, and, to judge from their countenances, the conversation had not been altogether pleasant. Mr. Simpson, indeed, presented a pasty placidity of face. But Mr. Lovegrove looked angry, and Mr. Lane sulky.

"It is a most extraordinary thing," said Mr. Lovegrove, "that you should have been so lukewarm in the matter, Mr. Lane."

"I don't know what you mean by 'lukewarm.' If I was to consult my own pocket in the matter I might be too wise which side would be best for me," retorted the agent. "But I am not the judge to do that. You discussed points as is of as much consequence to me as to most people. But I go according to law and justice."

"I can't let much you may know about justice," said Mr. Lovegrove, "but I take the liberty of supposing that your knowledge of law is not extensive."

"Well, well," said Mr. Simpson, moving his jaw slowly as he spoke, somewhat in the manner of a cow chewing the cud, "it don't take a very profound knowledge of the law to understand the case before us. I suppose you are satisfied that the ceremony of marriage on board the Fairbird took place?"

Mr. Lovegrove passed his hands irritably through his hair without answering.

"And if every thing hadn't been conducted in an honorable way, why should the will ever have turned up at all?" said Mr. Lane. "It wouldn't have been so difficult to say nothing about it."

Mr. Simpson felt this to be injudicious, and hastened to say, "Oh, my dear Sir, with the parties concerned in this business such a proceeding would have been entirely out of the question."

"Mr. Lane doesn't seem to think so," observed Mr. Lovegrove, dryly.

"No, no, no," proceeded Mr. Simpson; "it is mere waste of time to consider such an hypothesis. Out of the question, entirely out of the question. The will being there, my client's first proceeding was to show it to a respectable and well-known lawyer—your own solicitor, Mr. Lovegrove—and to intrust it to him for safekeeping."

"I don't know what could be fairer or more honorable," put in Mr. Lane.

"And in a matter of course that the proceedings of the lady in question should be fair and honorable."

"Mr. Lane doesn't seem to think so," said Mr. Lovegrove again.

Mr. Simpson interposed to prevent a retort from the agent. "Permit me," said he. "The lady in question was treated in the most heartless and treacherous manner. But my present business is not to insist upon that part of her story. The question is, was the first Lady Tullis living or dead at the time of her second marriage?"

"Sir John supposed her to be alive. That much is clear," said Mr. Lovegrove. "He never intended to make Miss Lecrivant his wife."

"Possibly. But I need not remind you, Mr. Lovegrove, that persons can not play fast and loose with the marriage ceremony to gratify their own convenience or passions."

Mr. Lane opined, under his breath, that it would be a pretty sort of game if they could.

"I have just before you," continued Mr. Simpson, looking as though he were engaged on a translation of a very tough Latin manuscript, "the proofs of the performance of the marriage ceremony between the late Sir John Gale and Miss Lecrivant. You are not at present prepared to bring forward any testimony as to the hour at which Lady Tullis Gale expired?"

"Mr. Frost is of opinion," said Mr. Lovegrove, "that Mrs. Lockwood's testimony, and that of the servant girl, will go for nothing."

Mr. Lovegrove paused in his speech as the door of his office was opened, and one of his clerks appeared.

"I said that you were particularly engaged, Sir," said the young man, "but the gentleman would take no denial. He said that—"

"What do you mean by admitting any one at this moment?" Who is it?"

"Mr. Hugh Lockwood, Sir," answered the clerk, making half his retreat as Hugh pushed past him and entered the room.

There was a momentary silence and pause of expectation.

"Mr. Lockwood," said Mr. Lovegrove, gravely, "if I can serve you here—and without harm for insisting on seeing me. If my clerk did not succeed in making you understand that I was particularly engaged, I must tell you so myself in plain terms."

"I ask pardon of you, and of these gentlemen," said Hugh; "but I think you will excuse me when you know that the business on which I come is pressing. Mr. Simpson you are engaged in discussing."

Hugh's manner was very resolute and quiet. He looked like a man who has recently subdued some strong emotion to his will. Mr. Lane stared at him undisguisedly. Mr. Simpson observed him in his ruminating manner. Mr. Lovegrove made answer, "Mr. Hugh Lockwood you know what is the business we are engaged in discussing."

"If I mistake not, you are discussing the legality of the second marriage of the late Sir John Tullis Gale."

"Quite so," said Mr. Simpson. "Have you any information to give us on the subject?"

"Yes."

"Mr. Lockwood," said Mr. Lovegrove, hastily, "allow me to say one word. This gentleman is here on his own behalf and on the lady who herself Lady Tullis Gale. This gentleman is the acquisted cousin of the world. This gentleman's interest in the matter is not to be taken into account. I am only sorry that I can not add that I am fully empowered to act for Miss Desmond in this matter as I should desire to do. But in the peculiar and painful circumstances of the case I know not how to act. Miss Desmond's nearest guardian—who is co-trustee with me under her mother's will—to come forward and look after her interests. But in so far as legal knowledge and services can avail her, they are entirely at her disposal. Now, believing as I do that the young lady's friend, I strongly advise you to refrain from volunteering any statement on this subject at the present moment. You are, I have no idea of what nature your statement may be. But I assure you that you had better leave the matter in my hands."

"Mr. Lovegrove, you speak in a manner which commands my sincerest respect, and I cordially make Miss Desmond very grateful. But I come here on my own responsibility entirely."

"Indeed, Sir?" said Mr. Simpson, who had listened attentively. "Are you a relative of the young lady?"

Before Hugh could speak Mr. Lane answered in a boisterous voice, "He is the son of the person in whose house Lady T. died."

Mr. Simpson's ruminating jaw moved slowly, but he said nothing.

"I will answer for myself, if you please, Mr. Lane," said Hugh, to whom the agent was slightly known. "Then, turning to Mr. Simpson, he continued: "No, I am not a relative of Miss Maud Desmond, but she is my promised wife. Our engagement was sanctioned by Lady Tullis and by Miss Desmond's guardian."

Mr. Lovegrove made a slight suppressed sound with closed lips, and raised his eyebrows in surprise. "I was not aware of that fact, Mr. Lockwood!" And you have, you say, some information to give respecting the hour at which Lady Tullis died?"

"I have the only information to give which can be of value; for I was the last person who saw the poor lady alive."

The three men looked at each other without speaking. Each person made his face as nearly blank of expression as possible. But there was a slight shade of brushing. Mr. Lovegrove's eyes as he turned them again on Hugh.

"It happened in this way," proceeded Hugh. "I will tell you the circumstances as plainly and shortly as I can. On the night preceding the day she died—"

"That is to say, on the night of the third of March?" asked Mr. Simpson.

"Yes, on the night of the third of March, Lady Tullis had been very ill, and had suffered much from fits of breathing. Dr. Gale found necessary for some one to sit up with her. That had happened once or twice before. But on this occasion she seemed so ill that neither my mother nor Miss Desmond went to bed at all. In the morning, quite early, Lady Tullis fell asleep. And then my mother sent Miss Desmond to rest. She—my mother—went down into the kitchen to prepare some beef-tea, for which the sick woman had asked. The little servant-maid was busy about her household tasks. I had made up my mind not to go to business that morning, and as I was desirous that some one should be within call of Lady Tullis, I took a book and sat in the drawing-room, which opened by a sliding-door into the bedroom."

"This was at what hour?" asked Mr. Simpson.

"I can not say with accuracy. But certainly between seven and eight o'clock. During the first part of the time I sat there my mother came up stairs with the beef-tea, and found Lady Tullis still awake. She seemed so peaceful and tranquil that I persuaded my mother, who was much worn out, to take some rest on the sofa in the drawing-room, saying that I would remain at my post. Well, I sat there a long time—or what seemed a long time. The hands of my watch, and at that period of the day our street is not noisy. There was scarcely a sound to be heard. All at once, as I sat alone in the silence, a strange feeling came over me that I must go into the next room and look at the sleeper. I can not tell why then, and I can not tell why now, but the impulse was irresistible. I got up softly and went to the bedside. And then in an instant I saw that there was death. I had never seen a dead person before, but there was no mistaking that solemn look."

"No mistaking!" echoed Mr. Lovegrove. "How can you know that? Your impression, the mere result of your looking at her, may have been unfounded. She may have been still asleep."

"She was in that sleep that awaits us all, and from which there is no awaking. I stood and contemplated her face for a minute or so. The eyes were shut, the forehead placid; she had not even moved on her pillow. Although I was perfectly convinced that she was dead, I took a little hand-mirror from the toilet-table and held it to her lips. There was not a breath."

"Still," said Mr. Lovegrove, catching a glance that was exchanged between Mr. Lane and Mr. Simpson, "still, you do not know at what hour Lady Tullis died. Your guessing is of no use."

"Wait. It is true I do not know exactly the moment at which Lady Tullis ceased to live; but I know what will suffice, as you will see. I knew that the first thing to be done was to get some one to sit with the corpse and to the door. There was a woman living near at hand, who had occasionally come in to help to nurse our poor friend, and I knew that she would be able to do what was needed. I resolved to go myself and fetch her without disturbing my mother or Maud. I went out of the front-door quietly, sought for, and found the woman's clerks were still about half past nine."

"That," said Mr. Simpson, rising from his chair, "is conclusive. I have evidence to prove beyond a doubt that the ceremony on board the ship was not performed before a quarter to ten at the earliest."

There was a dead pause.

The three men deliberately gathered together his papers. Mr. Lane took up his hat. Mr. Lovegrove rang his bell to chair with his hands thrust deep into his pockets.

"I presume," said Mr. Simpson, "that you perceive the importance which Mr. Lockwood's testimony makes Lady Gale's case? My client is, I assure you, extremely sorry, and will, greatly exercise to it. But if Mr. Lockwood is prepared—as no doubt he is—to repeat upon oath every detail of what he has given us, Lady Elvise Lady Gale, and the next of kin, to resist to the attorney-general's to carry out the provisions of Sir John's last will and testament. I wish you a good-morning, gentlemen."

"Good-morning, Mr. Simpson. I beg to state that if Miss Desmond were my client and I were empowered to act for her, I should not say, indeed, from considering the cause lost. I am not aware what course Miss Desmond will be advised to take. But I would take the liberty to tell you not to be sure of victory even now. And good-morning to you, Mr. Lane," added Lovegrove, in a considerable change from the temperate and courteous tone in which he had addressed the agent. "I shall be very much obliged with you on the prospect of losing your legacy if I were of Mr. Simpson's opinion on this matter. Though you may think I never saw a gentleman let two thousand pounds slide through his fingers with more equanimity, or make less effort to keep them!"

When Messieurs Simpson and Lane had departed, Mr. Lovegrove got up and began pacing about the office. Suddenly he stopped opposite to Hugh, and said abruptly:

"Do you mean to say that Miss Desmond urged you to come and say what you have said this morning against her will?"

"She did, most earnestly."

"And you knowingly made what interests were at stake, were feel enough to do it?"

Mr. Lovegrove, what I said was the truth. It might as well be told first as last."

"No, it might not! And who knows whether it ever would have been told at all? I should have taken a very different tone with this self-styled Lady Gale. I believe if she had been thoroughly frightened and bullied she would not have dared to talk of going to law!"

"But it did not, Sir."

"Well, I would have fought her."

"That is just what Maud desired to avoid."

"Desired to avoid? Desired to— Miss Desmond desired to avoid unnatural war—of inheriting a fine fortune duly and legitimately bequeathed to her?"

"You know what her life has been. You know that Mr. Levincourt and his daughter have been like a father and sister to her from her babyhood. And as to Sir John Gale's money, she says she felt as though it would bring a curse with it."

"Trash! No money brings a curse that is honestly come by."

"This would not have been honestly come by. I believe that Veronica Levincourt can prove herself to have been duly married to Sir John Gale. And it would be inexpressibly painful and shocking to Maud and to others to force her claim into the court of law."

"Well, Mr. Lockwood," said Lovegrove, after a minute or two's silence, "it is clearly no concern of mine. But I am interested in Miss Desmond for auld lang syne. I knew her mother. And she is very much to be thoroughly believe, a very good young lady. Frost-will be sorry too— However, I suppose we can not interfere."

"Mr. Frost will not be surprised: for I mentioned something to him before."

"You did?"

"Yes. Well, now, Mr. Lovegrove, I must trust entirely for the sincerity and kindness with which you espoused Miss Desmond's cause. And I must leave you. Hugh goes away with her guardian the day after tomorrow. And it is her great effort to keep all this painful business from her for the present. He knows nothing of it as yet. He has lived quite secluded in my mother's house since he came up to attend Lady Tullis's funeral."

"Mr. Levincourt does not know—?"

"Not yet. When they are on the country she will tell him as much as is needful."

"I call Miss Desmond's self-appointed me guardian to her daughter, instead of— But it can't be helped. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good! I'll see what I can do to keep the wolf over the course, I suppose. She is clever: or somebody is clever for her. Mr. Lane has been benevolently snatched to the side of the law's law and justice."

"I presume he was convinced that he could not fight for the will against the evidence they brought."

"I presume that Sir Matthew Gale and this lady have been able to convince him that it would be quite as much for his interest as for his two thousand pounds go quietly as to struggle for them. He does not seem to have had any desire to carry out his late patient's wishes."

"I do not believe that desire was possible in the breast of any human being employed by Sir John Tullis Gale!"

"Well, for a man who had his own way, as far as I can learn, all his life, it must be admitted that his power broke down altogether at the last in a very strange—I might almost say a very marvelous—manner."

"That is neither here nor way's such as his was, I don't know that there is much cause to feel surprise at his plans proving barren and futile."

CHAPTER VII.

SUCCESS.

CESARE had understood partially how desirable a thing it was for Veronica to be acknowledged by Sir Matthew Gale. But in his usual and ill-humor he was inclined to be captious and jealous.

"You could receive those men without having Louise in the room?" he said, reproachfully, after the baronet and his lawyer had gone.

"Certainly I could!"

"I suppose if that old blockhead of a Sir Gale were to die alone, you would receive him in the same way?"

"Likely. What then? Don't be absurd, Cesare."

"Ebbene, I think it is absurd, indeed, that I should be left to be the only person debarred from your society in the way I am!"

"Debarred from my society? Dio mio! It seems to me, Cesare, that you are here all day long."

"Oh, I trouble you? I importune you? You have no heart. You do not love me."

"I have given a woman's heart by many, which ended, as all its predecessors had ended, by Cesare's making humble apologies and professions of love to me."

"Ah, Veronica mia," he sighed, "I wish sometimes that there had been less acquisition of this money! You would have married me, and we should have been together all this time. We should have gone to the country house beyond Salerno. How happy it would have been for a little fishing of yours! I should surely had a happy moment since I came here."

"Cesare, that sounds all very fine; but how much does it mean? If you and I had married and staid in Italy, we should have been dining off a dish of macaroni and a melon this time. And how charming for me to be going about in a coupe pretending to be a rich corpse! To pick stuck in my hair, and no shoes or stockings! Neapolitan peasants are very picturesque at the Opera; but I fancy the real life of the real people would not quite suit you. It would not suit me at all events."

"My wife would not have had to live as you say," remonstrated Cesare.

"Oh, sodiamo, caspita mio! I know pretty well what sort of style 'your wife' would have had to live in. And the fact is, Cesare, that we been much worse off than the peasants, because we should have had to appear something different from what we were. Shabby gentility—Oof! it makes me shudder! And as to your not liking England, you know nothing of it yet. If we were rich, Cesare, you would see how the world would be cap in hand to us!"

"I don't think I want the world to be cap in hand to me. I only want you to love me," answered Cesare, pathetically.

Then Veronica gave him her hand and sent him away, alleging that she was tired. In truth, she was tired in spirit. She was getting very weary of Cesare's complaints and lamentations. She had felt herself to be in the position of guiding spirit since their arrival in London. In Naples, where she had, while domineering over him, depended on him for support in many things, she had liked him best. For her own nature was too entirely undisciplined not to be irked by the lack of leading another. She was full of the power of thinking, arranging, and deciding. And there were in her some glimmerings of nobler things, which made her secret herself at times, and consequently seem Cesare for his submissive idolatry of her.

As she had once told Maud, she saw the better and chose the worse. If Cesare would but assume a more manly tone—if he would show a rough and self-asserting—she fancied she should be less disinterested. He complained and grumbled, indeed; but it was in the tone of a child who vents its temper, well knowing all the while that it must finally submit. There was no element of irritation, she dropped some word of the kind to Cesare. And his amazed and sorrowful reception of the idea nearly drove her wild.

"I don't understand you, Veronica," he had said, reproachfully. "It seems to me that we are very ungrateful. No woman was ever loved more truly than I love you. Do you wish for unkindness and tyranny? Who can understand a woman?"

Poor Veronica did not comprehend herself. She could not tell him that his compliance for her whims, his devotion to her wishes, alienated her from him. She could not tell him that his humoring of her haughty temper degraded her in her own estimation. And yet she failed to love Cesare. She was fully minded to become Principessa de Barletti, and the prospect of that long time, was to her fancy like a glimpse of something so terrible that she shut her mind's eyes before it, shuddering.

But she would be true to Cesare. And she would love him. Poor Cesare; he was kind and gentle, and she was really fond of him. She was—and by—so she told herself—she would be able to influence and change him in many things. But nevertheless the thrill which came over her at thought of at every solitary moment of her waking time, was not kind.

She had been much moved when, at Naples, Mr. Frost had made known to her the contents of Sir Julius's will. For a moment she had thought had flushed across her mind that she would give up her own chance of wealth if it were to be put in force in Maud's favor. If she made no sign, the will would be proved and executed in due course. It was by wilful Quixotism, as she told herself in her calmer moments; but it reured to her again and again. It was a noble if truly and honestly for one moment did the idea amount to an intention. The result to herself of carrying it out would be nothingness of pity, poverty. Poverty!—No; that was beyond her strength. Maud, she knew, could be happy without pomp and splendor; happier without them than their possession could ever make her (Veronica). Yet she did not feel comforted even with the pretense that this knowledge influenced her conduct.

"I am no caring hypocrite," she said to herself.

It is a negative merit not seldom assumed by those who find it desirable to feed their egotism at all costs. And the implied assumption is, "You who do not act in accordance with what you must feel—for do not I feel it?—are canting hypocrites."

But despite every thing, there was in Veronica's heart a craving, hungry desire to see Maud. Maud's had ever been the one influence that had awakened whatsoever impulses of good lay dormant in the vixen's daughter. The influence had chafed against that influence it had been dear to her. And Maud alone, of all the beings she had ever known, had loved her unselfishly, and from her heart. She shrunk from the idea of seeing her father as yet. She would have to go to him victorious, assured, bearing a new and illustrious title, whose blaze should efface whatever dimness now overclouded her name. She knew, without reflecting much about it, that by her father much might be forgiven to the Principessa de Barletti which could never have been pardoned to Veronica Levincourt. But with Maud it was different. Any thought of Maud set her dreaming and devised schemes for getting to see her, which schemes, however, never took shape in action.

Last in the agencies of the day on which Sir Matthew Gale had visited her, Mr. Simpson arrived at her hotel. He came to all hants to be the first to communicate to her the news of Hugh Lockwood's statement. And he was followed within a few minutes by Mr. Lane, who was bound on the same errand.

"Upon my word, Veronica, rising in an excited manner, after having heard what they had to tell her, "the cause is won!"

"I believe that I may safely congratulate you, Lady Gale," said Mr. Simpson. "You have assuredly meet with no opposition from Sir John's family?"

"And did Mr. Lockwood give this decisive testimony voluntarily?"

"Oh yes, my lady," said Mr. Lane. "That, I must say, he did. Mr. Lovegrove showed plainly enough which way his feelings jumped in the matter. If it had depended on him we should have had plenty of trouble."

"Mr. Lovegrove was doing what I should have done in his place," said Mr. Simpson, gravely. "He was endeavoring to protect Miss Desmond's interests."

"Well, he might have done that without being so bumptious. If it hadn't been for not wishing to make trouble for my lady and Sir Matthew, I would have given him a good setting down!"

"Ahem! I have a great respect for Mr. Lovegrove," said Mr. Simpson, in the same slow, impressive manner.

During this talk, Veronica was standing at the window, with her back to the two men, and her hands pressed against the panes. The sound ringing of the strange chance that had made Hugh Lockwood the witness of her fate.

There are no limits to the vagaries and self-delusions of indulged vanity, none to its gluttonous appetite. Veronica's nothing was and had not clutch at to feed upon.

Veronica well remembered the evident admiration she had excited in Hugh when they had met at Lowater. And without putting it even mentally into words, she had an idea that he could go forward unasked to give witness in her favor, was in some way due to the resistless attraction of her beauty. What would he think when he learned that she was to be Princess Barletti? The question was one which she dared not contemplate in actions. Mr. Lane's next words, however, rudely disturbed them.

"Young Lockwood certainly did behave very straightforward. I wonder that Mr. Lovegrove didn't lash into him. But I suppose—you compounds by the business, young Lockwood lost more, seeing that he is engaged to the young lady."

Veronica turned round to listen.

"I must be going now, Lady Gale," said Mr. Simpson. "I am sorely wanted to give you the news. There is a great deal to be done yet. Good-day to you, Mr. Lane. Good-day."

"One moment, if you please, Mr. Simpson. Did you say that Mr. Lockwood was engaged?"

"Engaged," put in Mr. Lane. "Yes, my lady; he is engaged to marry Miss Desmond—to be head, you know, of the family, and a very respectable young man," added the agent, with a patronizing air.

Considering to Mr. Lane's surprise, Veronica, after having given her hand to Mr. Simpson to be raised by him, sank down heavily with a haughty bow. And Mr. Lane observed to the lawyer, before they parted company at the hotel door, that "it was plain enough that the lady's self great airs already.

Left alone in the gathering dusk, Veronica began to pace up and down the room, in a restless manner that had recently become habitual with her. She was glad, what did she know else, for. She was Lady Gale. And although the whole of her fortune and Marmont Hall must be lost, she would still be a rich woman—rich even in rich England. She would be reinstated in the world, and that by her own efforts, and not as a mere baronet's lady. All that she had longed for and dreamed of since her childhood seemed to be within her grasp.

Of ten persons who should have seen her, knowing her as she knew herself, probably have concluded that it was on this important revolution of Fortune's wheel she was meditating, as she passed quickly to and fro in the dark, her heavy folds of her long black dress making a monotonous rustling upon the soft floor carpet. But it was not so. How often it happens that the outer and the inner life are thus distinct and different! That which we strive to be noted as that which really most occupies our hearts. There was a great flower of Dead Sea fruit in Fortune's gifts to Veronica. She believed still, as she had believed as fifteen, that to be rich, fashionable, and flattered, would suffice to make her happy. But in these very first moments of her triumph, her instincts and feelings were busy with Maud and Hugh!

All at once she ceased her pacing to and fro, and seating herself before the writing-bureau with writing materials, she dashed off a hurried note. She wrote without pause, almost as though she feared she might forget what she was doing, if she stuid to reflect on it. Having written and sealed the note, which consisted only of a few lines, she gave orders that a messenger should be dispatched with it forthwith.

"Is it to go to-night, my lady?" asked the waiter.

The tidings of Veronica's golden fortunes must, one would have thought, have hovered in the air, or emanated from herself in some way perceptible to the human senses, with us now obsequious.

It is not to be taken to Mr. Lovegrove, the solicitor in Bedford Square. He is easily to be found. There is my card. Give my compliments, and say that I shall be unexpectedly obliged if Mr. Lovegrove will do me the favor to send the number of the houses to the address on this note. Then let the messenger take the note to Grower Street without delay. He had been about to add, to him alone, and go quickly."

The reader may as well see the contents of the note:

"I thank you for what you have done for me to-day. But my thanks are doubtless of small value in your eyes.

"But I have a request—an entreaty to make to you. Let me see Maud. I shall be quite alone all this evening and to-morrow. Others may think me triumphant, but tell Maud—oh! pray tell Maud—that I long and yearn to see her and to hear her voice.

"I only learned to-day that you are to be her husband.

"Veronica Gale."

"I trust to you to speak of this to no one but Maud.

"To Hugh Lockwood, Esq."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Mr. John Ettis, a veteran of the Revolutionary war, was the guest of the House of Representatives a few days ago. Having called on the President, the latter invited him to stay to lunch; but the old gentleman declined, because, he said, he was anxious to see Congress in action. The President ordered one of the messengers at the White House to accompany him to the Capitol. There he was introduced on the floor of the House, on motion of General Banks, and received the congratulations of the members who flocked around him in large numbers, and questioned him about his age and the leading events of his life. Mr. Ellis was born in Bedford County, Pennsylvania, in 1793, and is therefore in his one hundred and eighth year. He served as an aide-de-camp of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. In the battle preceding the surrender he was shot through the back of the head with a spent musket ball, and the indentation which it made is still visible. He was also at the battle of Lundy's Lane, and was considered too old to enter the service as a soldier; but he went in as a messenger, to carry the rations and ammunition to the troops engaged, to keep them from being taken prisoner. Until the present time he has never applied for a pension, but now his age and infirmities have compelled him to do so.

The following burlesque bill of fare was placed before the guests at a wicked dinner which recently took place in London:

"Grub & Lay, 1 Roade, Fleby Traffic Retreat. Flat Fish dressed shareholders fashion. Entrees—Shoeblacking, Sweet Oil, Pickled Pigeons. Gaming Meating Stew, with Bonill: Secretary's Cold Check: Hot Dividend Pudding. Roast Loin of Directors, with Melted Butter. Rotis—Lead Rails done in the Permanent Way. Pidgeon Pig's in Directors. Bake's in Booking Clerk, Hot Axles with Grease à la Dickens. Vegetables—Green Peas, Stewed Cucumber, Turnip and Broken Marrow Beans à la Excursion Train; Silesian Kale, Cut Cash. Sweets—Preserved Ginger, Preserved, Audit Ale, Strong-headed Porter and Sack. Dessert—Stock Exchange."

The Scotsville Breezeau tells of a fearful punishment which befell two cruel children who were amusing themselves by throwing stones at a turkey hen and chicken. They covered it with petroleum and set fire to it. The mother turkey flew in its fright between the leg of one of its tormentors, and the other, in getting to his brother's assistance, was bitten fo the hand. The cries of the children attracted the attention of the mother, who sent for a doctor; but, notwithstanding his attention, the second three days afterward from the effects of the bites of their maddened victim.

A visitor to the lunatic asylum where Barbara Urych, the woman supposed to have lived constantly with and for youngster than she really is. She has a small, merry face, with a retrousse nose, and bright, lively eyes. Her hair, which is abundant, peeped out in every direction from under the bed-clothes. She confessed to having removed her mother incorrectly, (dead a good deal), and occasionally broke out into snatches of hymns and ballads.

A correspondent of a German journal says that the reigning color worn by fashionable people in Paris now is brown. This color goes by the name of "absolument affligeant." The dresses, cloaks, and bonnets are brown, but carriages are painted with this fashionable color, and even the horses' harness generally. Some have taken to, are now ornamented with phoenix ostrich feathers, dyed brown, and brown-colored heads. For mourning, blackskirts or ravens, for half-mourning, swallows or magpies, and for full dress, peacocks. It is considered advisable to dress according to the occasion, and to fit there adornments with an apparatus for imitating the cry of the bird selected for the occasion. It might inconvenience a fashionist is sufficient to set the little machine in motion. It would be unnecessary to take off the hat on meeting a friend: you frown or elevate the brow, the bird screams, and this constitutes a greeting.

Who would live in Russia? It is said that one need only take an evening walk of two or three miles into the environs of Moscow, one of the largest cities of the United States, wherein of late years the light of the flame of half-extinguished coal, moving swiftly among the trees, produces a weird, melancholy howl, like the wail of the wind on a gusty, wintry night, going forward and returning in the still, frosty air. The wolves are as fierce as ever, and nutiring in their depredations.

Senator Sumner has the credit of coining the last new word, "Reconstruction," a word pending genius that relieves his mind in regard to it:

"Reconstruction! What is the novel sound—
From out the mouth of Sumner?
Preponderosity!
And through his beautiful hall,
With great velocity,
Echoed the word from mouth to mouth the word
"Ridiculosity!"
Sure Webster would have dared to write
Never before,
Nor Webster either, murmured they,
Never, never before.
Is there of terms gigantic then
Such a puerility,
That we must coin this fearful one,
Ridiculosity?"

A curious theory, called the "Thermometric Gateway to the Pole," has recently been advanced by Captain Silas Bent, to the American Navy, as the result of thirty years' study and exploration. Supported by technical language, the idea seems to be that there is a continuous warm current or passage which would shorten the distance from New York to San Francisco by sixty days, and from Liverpool to Japan by more than a hundred days. According to this theory the two great currents of the ocean, the Gulf Stream and the Atlantic, with the colleague of the Pacific, the Kuro Sivo, both rivers in the ocean, hastening northward on their journey from the equatorial belt of fire, push their way through the polar ice to their confluence in the sea, making thither a navigable highway. Captain Bent supports his theory by facts, and insists that the Gulf Stream and the Kuro Sivo are the prime and only cause of the open sea about the Pole, with its temperature, as reported expeditions have discovered, so much above that due to the latitude; that the only practicable avenues by which ships can reach that open sea, and thence to the Pole, is by following the warm waters of these streams into that sea; and that to find and follow these streams the water thermometer is the only guide.

The present consumption of wood in the United States is enormous. It is calculated that 180,000 acres of the best timber is cut every year to supply the demand for railway sleepers alone. For railroad buildings, repairs, and cars the annual expenditure in wood is $25,000,000. In a single year the locomotives in the United States consume $50,000,000 worth of wood. There are in the whole country more than 400,000 vehicles in wood, and if the value of their labor is $100 a year, the wood industry of the country represents an amount of nearly $500,000,000 annually.

When the coal mines of our country give out, and all our forests are hewn down, the new method of utilizing solar heat, by the use of Ericsson's caloric, will be called into requisition—if it is not sooner. By a simple contrivance of his, he thinks we may obtain as much power from the sun as from steam.

It is a common remark to a growing child that he "runs up like a weed." Dr. Richard Mansfield, rector of an Episcopal church in Connecticut, once putting a group of the children of his flock, exclaimed, "Why, my dear children, you grow so fast—so weeds! I am scarcely able to recognize you." Then, correcting himself, he said, with the gentle politeness of a Christian gentleman, "Pardon me, I should have said, you have grown so like flowers." Can not every one see how the young face would light up at the pleasant comparison?

A pleasing incident is related of a school in Boston, Pennsylvania, in which the pupils are a large girl, who had always been allowed the privilege of dismissal in advance of the other scholars. Not long ago the school was dismissed, as usual, when the storm was at its height. The girls all kept their seats until the cripple had safely passed out of sight, and then they followed.

A specimen of Russian "Court News," published in the Tumskoy Gazette, may amuse our readers:

"The Emperor Imperial Majesty has left to wake at 7 a. m., and after a frugal breakfast, was graciously pleased to go out for a walk. His majesty was dressed with his suit, a beer, moved apparently by a heavy impulse to the street. On the mind of the Czar not only Russia, immediately came to the spot where his Majesty was the Governor-General Furgelsky, the police of the ruler of millions of beings who idolize him, the head of which is the Czar. It was observed by all of the fierce aspect by which this savage animal is usually characterized when he is about to make a committee of blissful anticipation, as if he were looking forward, with a fierce delight, to the bursting of his victim's breast by his gracious sovereignty. On returning from the walk his majesty was pleased to be in the highest ecstasy into the room, and, having taken off his hat, went home. He then went to bed, and next morning he was graciously pleased to be quite well."

A certain astronomer—name unknown—predicts that by the 31st day of this year he intends to cease all such brilliancy, and so near the earth, that our mights will be in total darkness.

Do our readers know what is the French idea of "a well-bred man?" According to a writer in La National—whose authority may not be unimpeachable—the thing is comprised in the following words: "A well-bred nobleman, visiting an English nobleman in London, will ask him what sort of wine he is accustomed to wine." The English nobleman's butler made a mistake, and brought out sometime after a bottle of sherry with cod-liver oil. This did not prevent the Frenchman from swallowing the liquid presented to him. He was, on the whole, we are told, without a shudder, and said it was indeed excellent.

Women can now acquire a medical degree in France. Mlle. Chenevard, Swedish, and Mlle. Deraismes, Mlle. Garrett passed the fourth examination for the degree of M. D. in Paris on Wednesday. The subject was medical jurisprudence, materia medica, and hygiene.

Many people are afraid to expose their children to the external air, as though it were their worst enemy. But the fact is, they keep them by so doing less than when they are taken out, without great care, they are liable; just the same as they are exposed for a great length of time will make himself sick by eating too much food, and a sumptuous table. Children kept indoors, in rooms frequently overheated and filled with a stagnant, impure air, grow up, if they live at all, pale and sickly, and often grow down at a dark cellar. They resemble the seeds, in the famous parable, that fell by the wayside and were trodden down or by having much root, as soon as the hot sun came they withered and died.

About two years ago Dr. Richardson, of London, while experimenting with electricity, illustrated a portion of his theory so that it was perfectly intelligible. A similar experiment was once performed by the celebrated Dr. Priestley. Quite recently Dr. Thomas Richmond, of Dublin, has carried the matter a little further, has succeeded by the aid of the powerful inductorium of Ruhmkorff in producing artificially a calcium light, and large magnifying lenses, in completely illuming the whole body. With the most successful experiments already made, it would appear that for the illumination of the human body it is not necessary that it should be sufficiently vivid and the lenses sufficiently powerful. If the whole internal machinery of the human organism can be brought directly under the inspection of medical practitioners, a great advance in science and humanity would be incalculable.

Leipzic is the "city of books." In 1867 130,000 cwt. of books were dispatched from the railway station of Leipzic alone. In 1868 2000 new works were published in that city. Forty-seven printing establishments are at work, and employ 3000 hands, consuming 1600 journeymen, 300 apprentices, and 400 women. The number of the booksellers' firms, through business connection with about 3500 houses out of Leipzic. An immense business is also carried on in the sale of "second-hand" books. Moreover Leipzic is the printing centre for nearly all publications, three being twenty-nine publishers in this department. Berlin stands next to Leipzic in publishing importance, and in the former capital it is the number of newspapers and journals issued.

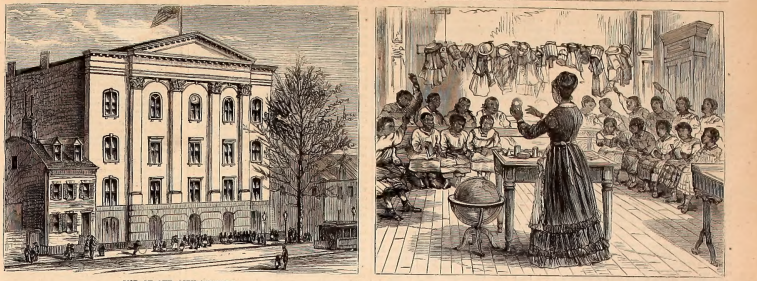
In America it would scarcely be regarded as an evidence of very tender filial affection for a son to read his venerable father a coffin as a birthday gift; but a late visitor to China declares that in that country such a gift is considered the ne plus ultra of courtesy and love. The cheerful gift is received with gladness, paraded ostentatiously in the best chamber, and, until required for its special use, is made a depository for nothing of value. Nothing is more common than for a person who is desirous of a grand funeral to provide his own coffin, according to his own fancy, long before his decease.

"UNION IS STRENGTH."

DISTRIBUTION OF THE SECTARIAN FUND.

SECTARIAN BITTERNESS.

OUR COMMON SCHOOLS AS THEY ARE AND AS THEY MAY BE.—[SEE PAGE 141.]



ONE OF OUR CITY SCHOOLS. COLORED SCHOOL—OBJECT TEACHING.

OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

AN observant stranger passing through the streets of New York city, between the hours of eight and nine in the morning, is attracted by the sight of hundreds of children going in every direction to their respective schools. The general aspect of these children is bright, happy, and intelligent. Let us follow a group of these little folks to their destination, and see how they are occupied when together.

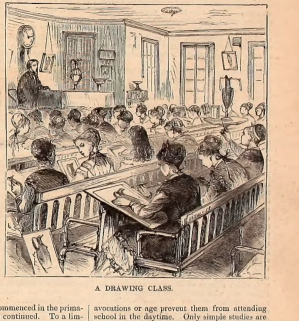
GIRLS' CALISTHENICS.

Instantly, from two side doors, appear two lines of little girls, all keeping perfect step to the music. They march to their assigned places, and stand in front of their seats. Not a word is spoken nor a direction given, but every thing proceeds with order and precision. A special chord on the piano is the signal for being seated, and the change of position takes place with perfect silence and without the least confusion. The music begins again, and another file of little ones marches in, filling up the aisle seats on either side of the room.

The children have no books, but, led by the teacher at the piano, they sing in clear, sweet tones several appropriate songs. A short passage of Scripture is then read, and with folded hands the little ones repeat the Lord's Prayer. After a few moments more spent in singing the marching music is resumed, every child falls into line at the proper time, and thus the little multitude disperse to their respective classrooms. The school we describe is a Primary Department for girls only; but every morning a similar scene may be witnessed in any of the public schools of New York, varying somewhat with the age of the scholars.

The public schools of this city, exclusive of what are called Corporate Schools, are designated as Primary, Grammar, Evening, and Normal Schools. There are at present more than two hundred of these institutions under the charge of the Board of Education, and the average yearly number of pupils receiving instruction in them is two hundred and twenty-five thousand. To instruct all these pupils the services of two thousand five hundred teachers are required, of whom a large proportion are women. A Primary and Grammar School often occupy the same building. Some of the primaries are for boys or girls only, while others are for youth of both sexes. The course of instruction in primary schools is very simple, and carefully adapted to the tender age of those who pursue it. The pupils are divided, according to qualifications, into six grades. In the lowest grades the reading and spelling of familiar words from blackboards and charts; counting and very simple adding by the numerical frame; conversational lessons about common objects, with a view to form habits of accurate observation; familiar instruction in regard to morals and manners.

These are the principal exercises, and it is not intended that any of these shall be continued more than fifteen minutes at a time. As fast as the little pupils improve they are advanced from grade to grade, until they reach the first, or highest. By this time the course of study has been extended by adding the elementary rules of arithmetic, geography, writing and drawing on the slate, advanced object lessons, etc. When these subjects are sufficiently mastered, the pupil is ready for promotion to the Grammar School.



A DRAWING CLASS.

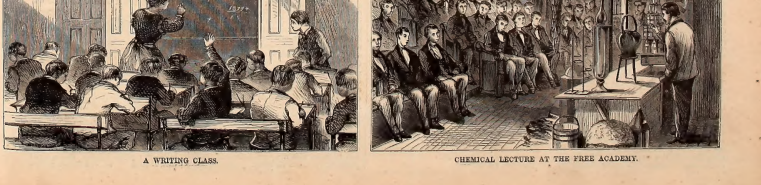
The grammar school course is also divided into several grades, and carries the pupil forward from the point where the primary course terminates to such studies as English grammar, history, astronomy, physical geography, composition, drawing, and bookkeeping—the branches commenced in the primary department being also continued. To a limited extent lessons are assigned in this department to be studied at home, but none are given out until fully explained and illustrated to the class by the teacher.

Beyond the common school course special facilities have just been provided for the further education of girls. Boys of fourteen, who have attended the public schools a requisite length of time, and can pass the requisite examination, may enter the Free College of the City of New York (formerly the Free Academy), and there enjoy the advantages of an extended and thorough course of study; and the Board of Education have recently established a Normal School for girls, corresponding to the Free College, which will afford them facilities for the same thorough course of instruction hitherto enjoyed by boys only.

Auxiliary to these schools are the evening classes, organized for the benefit of those whose avocations or age prevent them from attending school in the daytime. Only simple studies are taught in these classes, but the arrangements are equally adapted to youths and adults. Foreigners desiring to learn English frequently enter these evening classes, of which there are twenty-seven, and during the year they are attended by about twenty thousand pupils.

Adult pupils in these evening classes generally display the most commendable zeal in their studies, and are not ashamed to vie with far

The school building is a neat and substantial structure, four stories high, with a frontage of perhaps a hundred or a hundred and fifty feet. The pupils are flocking into the side doors. The central entrance is for visitors, and leads directly to the reception-room of the Primary Department. The room is as yet almost empty; no pupils are in sight; a few teachers are quietly making preparatory arrangements; while the Principal extends a pleasant greeting to such visitors as come in, and gives them seats. Presently the music teacher strikes a signal note on the piano, and commences playing a lively march.



A WRITING CLASS. CHEMICAL LECTURE AT THE FREE ACADEMY.

younger people. In general, there is no lack of neatness in the appearance of working-men at these schools. A member of the Board of Education, while visiting one of these evening classes recently, in the same general remarks on the propriety of perfect neatness and order, On the conclusion of his remarks a strong-looking young man, who with several others near him bore on their hands and clothes the evidences of toil, rose and apologized for their appearance. "We don't always come to school this way," said he, "but we were at work in the yard pretty late, and had no time to go home for supper even, as we did not want to be late at school; and not expecting any visitors, we made up our minds to come as we were, but the principal knows us, and we knew he would excuse us for coming so." The modesty and zeal of these working-men, and their earnest exertions to obtain an education, are certainly worthy of the highest commendation and encouragement.

To enable working-men and clerks who are occupied during the day to prosecute advanced studies, there has been established an Evening High School for males, where such studies as grammar, mathematics, natural philosophy, engraving, navigation, municipal and constitutional law, phonography, declamation, book-keeping, Latin, French, Spanish, and German are pursued. Students are admitted to this school for the whole or a part of the course, or a single study only, as they desire.

The normal schools are for the instruction of teachers only. These sessions are held on Saturday, and teachers whose acquirements fall below a certain standard are expected to attend until their deficiencies are made up. This secures the services of well-trained and experienced teachers, and is a most important branch of the system.

There are now about one hundred buildings occupied by the public schools of this city. While all of these buildings are convenient and healthful, the newer buildings are a great improvement on those erected in former years. They have been constructed on the best principles of arrangement, fitted with all conveniences for teaching and pupils, supplied with the best kind of furniture, and are warmed and ventilated by the best apparatus. They vary in size, some occupying only two lots, others six or seven. It has been found that large buildings are much more economical and convenient than small ones; and not unfrequently two thousand pupils, and even a larger number, are well accommodated under one roof.

The sketches that illustrate this article will give the reader a very complete idea of the internal arrangements of our common schools. The first gives an exterior view of one of the school buildings; No. 2 shows a lesson in object teaching in a class-room in a primary school; and the interior of the public in the practicing weekly exhibitions of the pupils under the direction of the teachers, which are a source of great interest to parents and friends, and which serve to show the excellent manner in which the system is carried out. The sketches were all taken from actual scenes, and are accurate representations of the originals.

The importance of these schools in a country like ours, whose institutions depend wholly on the intelligence and morality of the people, can not be overestimated. They constitute our chief safeguard against a relapse into the temporal and spiritual bondage from which our fathers rescued this country to avoid. The benefits of these schools are visible all around us. The number of pupils under Instruction is constantly increasing; the annual examinations show the continued maintenance of a creditable degree of efficiency; and the interest of the public in the practical, everyday workings of the system is evidence of the continued confidence and regard with which citizens of all parties and every religious sect, and our partial exception, regard its progress and success. The most competent, experienced, and impartial judges in this country and Europe have, in the most public manner, affixed the stamp of their approbation to our system, and have with one consent expressed the conviction that, in its external and internal administration, it is equaled by no and excelled by few. A short time ago the Rev. JAMES FRASER, one of a Board of Commissioners appointed by the English government to inquire into the common school system of the United States and of Canada, spent several months in making a thorough investigation o. our city schools; and in his report, which was laid before Parliament, expressed his high appreciation of our system and its results. The question of establishing a similar system, for the education of the masses of the English people, is one of the measures probably to be brought before Parliament during its present session. The gentleman who holds the post of "Vice-President of the Committee on Education of the Privy Council," in a recent speech urged the imperative necessity of such a measure. "So convinced is the country," he said, "of the importance of it in the Commons, of the importance and urgency of this question, that no economical, or religious, or irreligious difficulty will be allowed to stand in the way. The public money must not be wasted, no, not one penny of it must be applied to any object, for the purpose of education; but if, indeed, the public money must be spent, no religious difference must stand in the way of the necessary secular education."

While other nations are thus emulating our own in the establishment of a system of popular education, it certainly behooves American citizens to see that nothing is allowed to interfere with the efficiency of our common schools, or lessen their hold upon the confidence of the whole people. The dangers that threaten them in the way of unsectarianism, and the diversion of a large portion of the common school funds for the support of sectarian schools, are happily add only too truthfully foreshadowed in Mr. Kay's admirable composition on page 140, which requires no comment to enforce its warning admonitions.

FOUND IN THE STREET.

"Do you know, Sir, that I am almost starved —that I have had nothing to eat for twenty-four hours?"

The young man started at this unexpected address; then turned, and regarded the speaker with a feeling of sympathy.

The scene was Fifth Avenue, and the time was near midnight.

Horses and carriages were dashing over the pavement, conveying gay parties from theatre or supper.

The air was crisp and chill; the stars shone cheerfully above; the lamps gleamed brilliantly below; yet the young man was thus suddenly accosted, in the most fashionable thoroughfare in New York, by a person who was almost starved, and had eaten nothing for twenty-four hours.

No wonder he turned to look curiously at her!

Caleb, or Cale Gordon, as his intimes called him, was a hard-working young journalist—working hard, but well paid; for he was a vastly clever and rapid writer, and found a ready market for all he wrote; besides being on the regular staff of one morning paper as dramatic and dramatic critic.

The peculiarities of this part of his vocation he had that evening been to the French opera to hear "Genevieve"—had stepped into Delmonico's for a lobster supper, and was now on his way down to the office to write up his evening's work.

He had no one but himself to take care of; made money enough to supply all his wants, including light literature at Delmonico's when he desired them; and knew very little about the poverty and wretchedness of the under-world of the great city of New York.

Therefore he queried, in a tone of surprise, if not locking at the speaker for the question of —"You say you have eaten nothing for twenty-four hours?"

A bit of bread and some coffee last evening, and nothing before that since the day before; and the girl gave a great gulp of something between a sigh and a sob, and turned her face away.

"Bless my soul!" said Caleb; "come right along with me and get something."

You see Caleb was quite gentleman—he had only been in the city about six months, having come well recommended from a country newspaper, or else he would have given the poor creature and sent her on her way—or perhaps something worse might have come of it, who knows? But he took her by the hand and placed it on his arm, and walked her rapidly down a side street, noting, with quiet vision, to have them see an oyster-saloon that kept open all night.

It was not exactly a place to take a lady; but it did not matter to her, for she took her to Delmonico's—besides, they were past it.

She had nothing further; but Caleb noticed that she leaned rather heavily on his arm, and as they passed a street-lamp, and its light fell upon her face, he observed that she was very pale.

He hurried her along, and presently they arrived at the saloon, and were soon seated opposite each other in a small private room, or box, at the extreme end.

Thinking of his little sister, too, he could not help blessing the fact that there was no one in such a strait as this poor creature; and he felt a strange sensation under his watch-pocket, and the arm rose to speak for a moment.

Then he said, kindly and in a low voice, "And now you must tell me how it is that you are brought about, and perhaps I can help you."

But the girl folded her arms on the table, laid her head upon them, and cried—softly, but very bitterly.

"I don't like to see you cry," said Caleb—and his voice was a little tremulous; that was a soft point in Caleb's character; he never liked to see a girl cry.

The girl raised her head, and threw the long, soft, curling hair back from her face, and said—

"You are very, very kind to me, and—I won't cry;" and she didn't; she stopped instantly; and Caleb was convinced at the moment that—

Caleb wasn't far out about her age—probably his master of his little sister had sided him some occult way. She was just about seventeen, and now that she had gained a little color, what beauty of his little sister had sided manifestly pretty, or so, at least, Caleb thought; but so this—to think!

She had pretty, soft, brown curls, and brown hair, and tender violet eyes—very large; and as Caleb looked at Cale, through the mist of her late weeping, he thought he had never seen any half so expressive.

Her figure was trim and neatly clad, but poorly. Her hands were small, but they bore the marks of labor, and the forefinger of her right hand was dotted over with little black specks, as Caleb remembered his mother's to have been when he was a boy at home, and she sat in the arm-chair sewing for him.

Then the late supper came in, and, with an apology, she began to eat.

And how she did eat!

Caleb had never seen any one very hungry before, and his own eyes grew dim as he watched her. And somewhere in the interior of his being he registered a little oath that she should never be hungry again—not if he could help it; and then he thought of his little sister once more.

And at last the supper was eaten (of course, Caleb took nothing, for Delmonico had supplied him); and as she looked up, and he asked her if she would have any thing else, she said; "I am ashamed to confess it, but I am afraid I had I was so hungry;" and then she went to crying again, but still silently. And then, after a little, she began to tell her story.

How she was crying because she had a wicked mother and little brother at home, who were just as hungry as she was, and who would not have any kind friend to give them food; and how she had left them on night with a wicked purpose in her heart, because that she could not bear longer their cries for bread; and how then when she spoke to Caleb her own hunger overcame her—and she was so selfish, so wickedly selfish—and now she must go. But Caleb started up and called back that waiter, and gave him such dry orders very rapidly; and when he went away—for Mr. Gordon had leaned on her shoulder and told her to sit quietly for a few moments, and he would speedily return. And then she sat down like a very child, as she was, and told him the rest of her story. Poor green Caleb had never heard one of those stories!

They had been very poor, she said, ever since her father died, which was when she was about ten years old. Her mother had supported them for a good while with her needle, and then Zoser had died, and taken her name, Josey Carroll—had been able to sew, too; and thus they had managed to live—but that was all. And then her mother had taken sick, and then—the waiter came in with a large, covered basket, which Caleb selected; and after he had paid the bill, tucked Josey under one arm, and they hurried up the stairs and out into the street into the starlight and the glare of street-lamps again.

They took a car, and about twenty minutes later were jolting over the pave up a dark cross yard, into a narrow alley-way, up flights of rickety stairs, and into a room on the top floor of a tumble-down tenement-house, which was Josey's home.

There was no fire in the little stove; a splintering bit of candle burned on a rough pine table; and on the floor, upon a mattress, lay a little boy and girl, in their rags and rags, by huddled the widowed mother and the poor little brothers.

Caleb dropped his basket, and saying that he would be back in a moment, fled to a corner grocery, where he found a boy about closing as he passed.

Fifteen minutes later he was back in the room, with the boy following laden with coal, wood, and candles.

Then he made the fire with his own hands—for he had learned that accomplishment when he was a boy at home—and he saw how.

The candles were lighted, the table was spread, the mother and little boy were seated; and when they were ready at work, and he saw how happy they were, then Caleb broke down.

He went and pressed the widow under and looked out at them; but he didn't see them, for his eyes dropped tears too many to see through.

And presently he was down on his knees with his, and as he turned around Josey said, "Don't cry! you have made us all so happy, and you have saved a little boy's life. Don't cry!"

Caleb pressed her hand; then he looked at his watch, and he must go, but he would first come to them the next morning. And then he shook hands with them all, and went out, while the widow offered prayers of the poor which followed him.

It was nearly daybreak before Caleb had finished his office-work and got home to his boarding-house: but at ten o'clock he was again in the room in the tenement-house together.

It was nicely swept, and a bright fire burning, and the few bits of furniture made to look as neat as circumstances would.

And three smiling faces met Caleb when he entered; and the mother made her poor, pale face man blush for very shame. That was the last day they spent in the tenement-house.

Caleb Gordon had a friend—one to whom he could trust his money on, found them comfortable apartments, where the widow's hunted up some lady friends of his, who gave the widow all the plain sewing she could do, with the aid of a sewing-machine, which Caleb furnished her, and became a profitable position in a public institution; and all was well.

Well, then—that is to say, about six months after, when the public institution gave Josey a new daughter—Caleb took the widow and children—the little brother had been going to school all the time—and went to the country to the old homestead. And when the fortnight's vacation was over Caleb wrote to the directors of the public institution—Josey's position is secure—and one bright summer's morning he tucked Josey under his arm, and presented her to his mother. "Here, mother—also a widow—and Caleb's little sister, and Josey's little brother, and a whole troop of Caleb's uncles and aunts and cousins and friends," strolled quietly down the quiet country road and into the little village church; and there Josey and Caleb were married. And as the two widows had become fast friends they lived together at the old homestead, while Caleb took his little wife—thin and pale no longer, but plump and flushed and happy as any cobin—back to the great city. And surely it is recorded somewhere by the good angel that Caleb never again should see the poverty, or misery, that had taken to wife the poor, little, half-starved girl he had found in the street.

SAFE LIGHT FOR OUR HOMES.

Mr. Epstein, of Boston, sent to a week ago a sample of our Brackets, at least where gas is not used, or if so, at an expense which is a trifle.

We neither make nor sell the Lamp which we command; we refer to PERRYE & HOWE'S Non-explosive Kerosene Lamp, Prof. J. H. SEELYE, of Amherst College, was mainly instrumental in bringing it before the people of New England, because he saw in it a public blessing.

It is perfectly safe. Nothing that can be used for illumination will explode in it, while the light is exceedingly brilliant, steady, and is entirely inodorless as to oil, and the chimney never breaks from heat. It is the only Lamp that will burn without a chimney.

N. B.—General Agents for the United States, are receiving Patentee of a full line of Lamps, Burners of the highest character. The interest of the public in such practical and safe Lamps, is one, therefore all save business competition or profits: it has an importance solitary and unrivaled in its claims to the favor and patronage by the best names in the scientific and literary world. —Congregationalist.

WE SHOULD NOT SWITCH FROM A COUCH which a few hours of Allcock's Porous Plasters will cure. Pliant, comfort, health, are all saved by it.—[Com.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PIMPLES ON THE FACE.

Comedones, Black-Heads, Flesh Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, and Blotched Disfigurations on the Face, accompanied with a disagreeable Humor, are positively cured by Perry's Comedone and Pimple Ointment. It tears the roots of the Pimples from out the pores, exudes morbid Secretions, carries all Eruptions to the Skin, and completely cures the Worst Case.

Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. For sale by all Druggists. Send for Circular.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

Running through the counties of $1000 per mile, guaranteed, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 20th February and August, at the Office of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have Mortgage Security on 280 miles of Road, Track, Trestles, Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York, Trustees. The price which we offer them for sale is the rate of $13,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. The line, connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, is the shortest and best route to Denver and Pikes Peak. The Company have a Capital Stock of $10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 3,000,000 acres, valued, at low rates, at 4,000,000

Lowest estimates, at 1,500,000

Total $15,500,000

Leaving a Margin of ..... Price 90 and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, Government Bonds, and Gold, for sale or exchange. These bonds, being so well secured, and yielding a large income, are desirable investments for safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,

No. 44 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,

No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

GUFFROY'S

Cod-Liver Dragees

(Sugar-Coated Pills of Cod-Liver Extract).

A perfect substitute for Cod-Liver Oil, without its disagreeable properties, and free from all its disagreeable results. Recommended in English, French, and American Hospitals, and highly recommended by the Medical Profession throughout Europe. Send for a pamphlet, which contains many very emphatic testimonials from eminent physicians who have tried them.

WARD, SOUTHERLAND, & CO.,

No. 56 Wall Street, New York.

A box of 240 Dragees, equal to 6 pints Cod-Liver Oil, $2. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

Heavy Rolled-Gold

HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, are manufactured on the most extensive scale by the AMERICAN WATCH CO., warranted for finish and wear equal to the most costly Gold Watches made.

Fac-simile Waltham Patent Levers, $25; Chronometer Balance, $30; Fine Lever Movements, $20; Chronometer Balance, $25; Aluminium Bronze Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $15. Also, Ladies' Watches, Gold Watches, for Dollars' Trade, $60 per dozen. Heavy Rolled-Gold Watches, in handsome styles, $5 each. Sent by Registered C. O. D., with permission to examine, by paying the Express Agent, on delivery. Address

JOHN FOGGAN, Watch Importer and Jobber,

No. 9 Nassau Street, New York.

"I CAUGHT a splendid mess, the rest caught none." EELS used to be celebrated by Izaak Walton as a only "one of many scenes on hunting and fishing contained in the "Hooker's Guide and Brother's Companion." He tells all about hunting, trapping, fishing; how to make canoes, flies, &c., &c. Now-a-days, like many ways, fishing secrets, &c., &c. 19,000 sold already, sells 100 every day, and 1,000 will be sold in one week, and it is worth $10 to any man or boy. Send on your "quarter" to the Sole Publishers,

HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO

CLEANS WINDOWS, PAINTED WOODWORK, KNIVES.

POLISHES TIN WARE, IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 212 Washington Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's A. School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars call, or address,

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

CORNS, Bunions, Ingrowing Nails, &c., cured by Dr. BRIGGS' Remedy. No. 1 for Corns, by mail, 50 cents. Dr. J. BRIGGS, Newark, N. Y.

NOVELTIES IN CARPETS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are now exhibiting,

AT POPULAR PRICES,

the

LARGEST AND MOST SELECT ASSORTMENT OFFERED THIS SEASON OF MOQUETTES, AXMINSTERS, VELVETS,

TAPESTRIES,
ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,
SUPERFINE INGRAINS,
EXTRA QUALITY THREE-PLYS,
&c., &c., &c.

Axminster and Aubusson Carpets, to One Price, with

RICH MEDALLIONS AND BORDERS TO MATCH.

The greater part of the above are CONFINED STYLES and THE FIRST IMPORTED.

☞ Our customers and the public are respectfully invited to examine them.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

$10 SAVED.—"I had it all in a letter sealed, and sent to me per U. S. mail, for $5." Almost the whole of the "Union Square Bonner." I read it, and exclaim, That $10 saved's on, I subscribed for the "Bonner," and have it at 39 Ist." So write us many of our readers. Now, reader, did you never get this? Has no bogus jewelry, sewing-machine, watch, or some other swindler, caught you? Then you are lucky indeed. Do you care to save ten on all the tricks and tempts of swindledom? Read the "Bonner." Every Saturday morning it comes to your door. In it we expose them, give a special detective in N. Y. to each number only. See the January number—now a Fortune number—now the March number, just out. It is a large 40-column, 8-page, Letter-size, illustrated paper, crammed full of real genuine wit, humor, fun, and many moving exposures of exactly. Thousand after thousand of the superb steel plate "Bonner" have gone to thousands of gratified readers all over the Union. Do you not want Longfellow's beautiful lyric of Evangeline?" It is 13½ by 2 feet in size, on elegant plate paper. We will mount it carefully on rollers, and send it to you prepaid. Will give you the "Bonner" for a whole year for only 75 cents—one-half the price of the plate alone. Specimens, 6 cents. Send your address and only 75 cents to STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

ROGERS'

Groups of Statuary.

These groups will be sent, with all the express charges prepaid, to any point east of Indianapolis, on receipt of the price.

Council of War, $25. Taking the Oath, $20. Courtship in Sleepy Hollow, $25, &c.

Send for illustrated catalogue.

Address

JOHN ROGERS,
215 Fifth Ave.,
New York.

PIMPLES.

The undersigned will cheerfully mail (free) to all who wish it, the Recipe and full directions for preparing and using a simple and beautiful Vegetable Balm, that will immediately remove Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, and all eruptions and impurities of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth, and healthy.

He will also send (free) instructions for producing, by very simple means, a luxuriant growth of hair on a bald head or smooth face.

The above can be obtained by return mail, by addressing THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
P. O. Box 5178. 186 Broadway, New York.

With Marshall's, Rist's, and Crandell's IMPROVEMENTS added:

The most complete and best Knitting Machine in the World. We mean what we say, and will forfeit one thousand dollars if what we claim is not true. Send circular and sample stocking, address, enclosing stamp,

1 & 3 Market St., Rochester, N. Y.

☞ No periodical comes to us which is more practical than this.

This endorsement of the Lynn Reporter is given to the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading paper of its class in New England. Give it a trial, as we will prove our assertion.

Terms: Weekly, $3 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year. Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do all his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing all information about these Printing Presses, their specifications, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., 25 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 83 Murray Street, New York.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent to express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N.J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 49 Cliff st. and 50 Frankfort st. New York. ☞ Call or send for Price-List.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw ever offered for general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Send for circular.

LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO.,
50 Read Street, N. Y.

VOL. 3—1870.

The American Eagle,

A FAVORITE LITTLE MONTHLY.

TERMS, TWENTY-FIVE CTS. PER ANNUM.

Send Three Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Address "AMERICAN EAGLE,"
NYACK, NEW YORK.

40,000 Sold.—The wonder of the World. The Only Genuine Patent Time Indicator. 40 Years' Watch." A Perfect Gem. Elegantly cased in Oroide Gold, Engine-turned Compass and Dial, Enamel Dots, Silver and Brass works, glass crystal, size of lady's watch. With second time, warranted five years, a speech and showy case, entirely of metal. This is no toy watch, but a reliable, safety save, guardian. 6000 sold in three weeks. Only $1 each, three for $5, in neat case, mailed free. Trade notified. Address the sole manufacturers, MAGNETIC WATCH CO.,
Hinsdale, N. H.

PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL—1870. Vol. 50. New Series. $3 a year; 30 cts. a No. Specimen, 20 cts. See list of premiums. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.
Jan. and Feb. Nos. now ready.

WATCH Free! and $20 a day sure. No humbug. No gift enterprise. No money wanted in advance. Address HALE & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. Samples free. S. M. Benson & Co., Brattleboro, Vt.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year; for WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, a Post-Office Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to bank bills, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $175; Quarter Page, $75—each insertion; or, for a series, $250, $150, and $100 per page.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 50 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1,50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Influences of Scientific Investigation the Primordial Traditions and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Just Issued.)

2.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Alton Cupples, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. (Just Issued.)

3.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By Prof. Jeremiah Clark Mr.A., Professor of Mathematics in the Naval Academy, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

4.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Bound to the Wheel," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

6.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By William Godwin, Esq., Author of "St. Leon." "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 18mo, Paper, 37 cents.

7.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maccii Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Miles Gloriosus. With Critical and Explanatory. By C. S. Hammunton, M.A., Professor of the English Language and Literature. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

8.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE: Its History and Autobiography. Edited by Charles Mackay. With an Introduction, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Bacon by Basil Montagu. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authorress of "Our Village," &c. Edited by the Rev. Alfred G. Kennedy, B.A. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by the Rev. A. G. R. L'Estrange. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

10.

A NOVEL REPLY. A Novel. By Annie Thomas, Author of "Lucy Crofton," "Cut Adrift," "Denied Yet Reigning for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Illustrated Commentary," &c. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Dore, Delamotte, Durand, and others. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

12.

LIFE'S WORK. By M. Betham Edwards, Author of "Doctor Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By Charles Boner. With Introduction, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "Story of a Little Girl," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

14.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

15.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Revised by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Sheep, $6 00.

16.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By Justin McCarthy, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

17.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, Author of "The Sea and its Wonders," "The Tropical World," "The Subterranean World," &c. With Map, Chromo-Tints, Gilt Edges, and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

18.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 400 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $2 00.

19.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentary. By Lord Lytton. With Latin Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Dillenburger. 12mo, Cloth.

20.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By Dr. Geo. Comfort, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa. 12mo, Cloth or Half Leather, $2 00.

21.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By Reuben Vaux, Author of "Leaving the Land" and "Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

22.

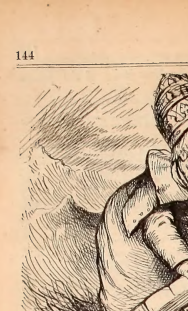
LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By Paul B. Du Chaillu, Author of "Land of the Midnight Sun," "Wild Life under the Equator," "Adventures in Equatorial Africa," "Land of the Gorilla Country," &c. With numerous Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

23.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By John S. C. Abbott, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

24.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the War. Illustrated by Benson J. Lossing. Complete in One Volume, 1064 pages, large 8vo. Price in Cloth, $6 00; Sheep, $6 50; Half Roan, $6 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.



BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,

Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine

MOSAICS,

and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

Steinway & Sons,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

Beg to Announce

A GENERAL REDUCTION

in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Pianofortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long-felt and frequently-expressed want, have prepared a moderate means, teachers, schools, &c., have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of instrument, termed

The "School" Piano.

A thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior mechanism, and workmanship as their highest-priced 7-octave Pianos; the only difference being that less new style of finish ment is constructed in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means.

At Exceedingly Moderate Prices.

STEINWAY & SONS also desire to call special attention to their new

PATENT UPRIGHT PIANOS,

with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Price-Lists and Illustrated Catalogues mailed free on application.

EVERY PIANO is WARRANTED for 5 YEARS.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,

Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth St.

(Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place), New York.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the Great National Illustrated, Rural, Literary, and Family Weekly, steadily maintains its rapid increasing in popularity all over the Continent. It is the Largest, Best, and Cheapest Journal of its Class published—the most complete in Contents, Illustrations, &c., in its styles, in Originality, Style, and Circulation. Now is the Time to Subscribe and Form Clubs! Great Inducements! Only $3 a year; back numbers of the volume (from Jan. 1) supplied, or you can begin any time. Sent in numbers sent, as specimens, for 25 cts., or a single one for 5 cts.

D. D. T. MOORE, 41 Park Row, New York.

ASTHMA! ASTHMA! ASTHMA!

HIENTADS'S ASTHMA REMEDY not only relieves, but permanently cures this dreadful disease. Sold by druggists generally. $2 per Bottle. Send for circulars. HIENTAND & CO., Dayton, Ohio.

$250 CITY LOTS—Advance 100 per cent. annually. E. C. BLAKESLEE, 47 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

Bargains! Bargains!!

In consequence of a CHANGE in OUR FIRM, and Removal in April to 686 Broadway,

Our Entire Stock of $500,000 WORTH OF

CHINA, GLASS, SILVER AND PLATED WARE, CHANDELIERS, GAS FIXTURES, CLOCKS, BRONZES, CUTLERY, &c., &c., will be disposed of, and we offer it at an ENORMOUS SACRIFICE

BELOW COST.

An examination of our PRICES, which are shown in plain figures on the goods, WILL SATISFY buyers that WE ARE IN EARNEST. Every one is invited to call.

After the 1st of May the business will be continued by our successors,

Messrs. NICOL & DAVIDSON,

At 686 BROADWAY.

Our Messrs. E. V. & E. E. Haughwout retiring from the business, either party will sign the name of the present firm in liquidation.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,

488, 490, & 492 Broadway, cor. Broome St.

☞ Orders by mail will be carefully filled, and at our lowest prices.

THE BEST WEEKLY IN AMERICA (according to the testimony of both Press and People) is MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the Largest, Best, and Cheapest Illustrated Newspaper published. Treats ably of all Rural Affairs, Science, Arts, Domestic Economy, &c., and is also an entertaining Literary and Family Paper, with ablest admirers in every State, Canada, &c. Only $3 a year. Back numbers, from Jan. 1 still supplied, or you can begin now. Sent as specimens, for 25 cts., or a single one for 5 cts.

D. D. T. MOORE, 41 Park Row, New York.

STUDDED BOOTS. The Studded Boots are laced by a new lacing fastening from one stud to another. That over one may try them at once, we will send sample pairs at Adams' prices. Every Pair Warranted. Send three cents for descriptive price-list.

STUDS instead of EYELETS. BOSTON SHOE STUD CO., Boston, Mass.

A Novelty.—Grant Clear Tip. Samples, 50 cents. A. GRANT, Box 5840, N. Y. P. O.

SPRING IS COMING, AND NOW IS the Time to Subscribe for MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the Largest, Best, and Cheapest Illustrated Rural and Family Weekly in the World! Every Farmer, Horticulturist, or owner of a Garden, will find it a profitable investment. As an Illustrated Literary and Family Paper, it is superior, and adapted to both Town and Country. Only $3 a year. The free January numbers sent, as specimens, for 25 cts., or a single specimen for 5 cts.

D. D. T. MOORE, 41 Park Row, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED HOME SHUTTLE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any Machine that can sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Beware of all Agents selling Machines under the same or any name, unless they will show a Certificate of agency signed by our Firm. All others are infringing upon our rights, and will be dealt with by prosecution and imprisonment. Grocery Firm.

Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

THE COMBINATION RULE and LEAD-PENCIL.—One of the most novel and useful articles ever offered to the public. No person should be without it.

Sample Pencil sent free on receipt of 25 cents and a 3-cent postage stamp; two for 35 cents.

Manufactured only by E. A. WHITFIELD, 65 Dunne Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON, Manufs'rs of Gentlemen's Merchanism Goods. Stores: 519 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular and Price-List. Repairing and Boiling also done.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and Claverack College. For both Sexes. Opens April 4. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., President, Claverack, N. Y.

Woodward's ARCHITECTURE.

Designs and Hints on Building. With priced catalogue of 81 books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, $3 a cents per annum.

Books sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Harney's Barns, Out-buildings, & Fences.

Just published, with 100 Designs & Plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fences, Stable Fittings, and Furniture,

Ten Dollars.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village and Suburban Houses, with Specifications and Estimates.

Twelve Dollars.

Woodward's Suburban & Country Houses.

70 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses.

188 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Country Homes.

150 Designs. $1 50.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,

191 Broadway, New York.

SHERMAN'S PATENT BRAKE, to prevent Runaway Accidents. Sold on Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines. Sent by mail, postpaid, with Instructions for using, on the receipt of $1 50.

Address as above.

Address WORTH.

SHERMAN PATENT BRAKE COMPANY, Box 2310, Philadelphia, Pa.

SAFE LIGHT FOR OUR HOMES

FARMERS and CANVASSERS can find no more pleasant nor profitable WINTER EMPLOYMENT than to sell the PERKINS & HOUSE PATENT NON-EXPLOSIVE KEROSENE LAMP, constructed on Sir Humphrey Davy's plan. The most eminent scientific men pronounce it

1. ABSOLUTELY SAFE UNDER ALL CIRCUMSTANCES BOTH FROM BREAKING AND EXPLOSION.
2. It gives twice as much light from same sized wick.
3. It uses 30 per cent. less oil.
4. It is economical and durable—lasts a lifetime.
5. It gives no odor in burning, turned nearer to low.
6. The steadiness of the flame is especially wonderful.
7. It is a successful rival of gas at a trifling expense.

We will refund the money on receipt of the Lamp if any one of the above claims proves incorrect.

One Agent sold 79 lamps the first two days in going from house to house.

One old farmer sold 103 lamps in a town containing 112 families, and said, "I have lived to be a blessing to my kind." Good agents clear $12 per day.

For descriptive circular and terms of Agency, address

VOTAW, MONTGOMERY & CO.,

Cleveland, Ohio, and 10 Courtlandt St., New York.

BLISS'S SELECT GARDEN SEEDS.

B. K. BLISS & SON,

Nos. 41 Park Row and 151 Nassau Street, New York.

Importers, Growers, and Dealers in Garden, Field, and Flower Seeds, Horticultural Implements, and Garden Requisites,

Would invite attention to the following Collections of Seeds for the FLOWER AND KITCHEN GARDEN, which have been favorably known in every section of the country for the past sixteen years.

Collections of Flower Seeds by Mail, Postpaid.

The following Collections contain the most showy varieties in our large assortment, with full directions for culture. Each package contains a selection of the different colors and varieties of its species, so that a more display can be made at a much less price than when ordered in separate packets. Those unacquainted with Flowers, as well as the experienced cultivator, may order without fear of disappointment.

COLLECTION	A—contains twenty choice varieties of Annuals	$1 00
"	B—contains twenty choice varieties of Biennials and Perennials	1 00
"	C—contains 10 choice varieties of Greenhouse and Perennials, embracing many of the new and	1 00
"	choicest in cultivation
"	D—contains five very choice varieties, selected from Prize Flowers, of English Pansies, German, Carnation, and Picotee Flakes, Verbenas, Trollope's French Asters, Double Hollyhocks	1 00

Any one contaning 25 will receive the four Collections postage free.

The seeds contained in the above assortments are of our own selection. Purchasers who prefer to make their selections from the Catalogue will be entitled to a discount proportionate to the quantity ordered.

Collections of Kitchen-Garden Seeds by Mail, Postpaid.

A COMPLETE ASSORTMENT OF VEGETABLE SEEDS FOR ONE YEAR'S SUPPLY, FOR A LARGE OR SMALL GARDEN.

The following Collections are made up in the most liberal manner, care being taken to give a sufficient quantity of all the finest varieties and newly introduced vegetables required in the Kitchen Garden.

COLLECTION No. 8 contains 56 varieties	$3 50
" No. 7 contains 40 varieties	2 50
" No. 7 contains 18 varieties (a smaller package)	1 00

The above are prepared expressly for sending by mail, and will be sent, postpaid, upon receipt of prices annexed.

Larger Collections, which can be safely sent by express (freight paid by purchaser) to any part of the country, as follows: No. 1, $20 00; No. 2, $15 00; No. 3, $10 00; No. 4, $6 00.

For a list of varieties in each Collection, see Catalogue.

The Sixteenth Annual Edition of their Illustrated Seed Catalogue and Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden is now ready for distribution.

No pains or expense have been spared, in preparing this edition, to make it the most complete work of the kind ever published in this country.

It contains 120 pages of closely-printed matter, and two hundred choice Engravings of favorite Flowers and Vegetables—a large portion of which are entirely new: also, two beautifully-colored Lithographs of Lilium Auratum and a group of Pansies, and a descriptive list of upward of two thousand Species and Varieties of FLOWER AND VEGETABLE SEEDS, including all the novelties of the past season, with Directions for their Culture. Also a list of upward of Three Hundred Varieties of Greenhouse Plants, and many other Summer-Flowering Bulbs, and much useful information upon the subject of Gardening generally.

A copy will be mailed to all applicants enclosing Twenty-five Cents; our regular customers supplied without charge. Address

B. K. BLISS & SON, P. O. Box 5712, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

PRICE TEN CENTS.

VOL. XIV.—No. 688.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

JOSEPH WESLEY HARPER.

THE life of WESLEY HARPER, as his family and friends called him, was wholly private and domestic. Shy and retiring, he avoided entirely that kind of public service which makes men's names familiar, and for which, indeed, his qualities of mind and heart, but not of temperament, peculiarly fitted him.—He was born on the 25th day of December, 1801, at Newtown, Long Island. His father, for whom he was named, was an earnest Methodist, and, with his own name, gave his son that of WESLEY. From his mother, doubtless, came that kindliness of humor which never forsook him, and which made the last days, like all the days of his life, so cheerful and serene. WESLEY had always a fond remembrance of his early home, and although the domestic discipline in the family of a hard-working Methodist farmer, in the days when that Church was full of the missionary spirit, was probably severe, it was that severity of affection which does not cloud the memory, and for which, indeed, a filial and pious spirit is always grateful. One of WESLEY'S pleasant pictures of his childhood was his lying upon the hay in the field or in the barn, and reading to an old black man, one of his father's workmen.

"It is many a long year since I have seen him," he said; "but I know that I shall see him in heaven."

WESLEY HARPER was the third child of his parents, and was always a delicate boy. His two older brothers, JAMES and JOHN, left their father's house when WESLEY was about ten years of age, and while he was yet a youth they had begun business together as printers and publishers, under the style of J. & J. HARPER. Before he was twenty he was apprenticed, with his younger brother FLETCHER, to the elder brothers, and mastered the trade of printing. He was a skilful proof-reader, and in the course of this duty he became familiar with much of the best English literature, which was carefully read by him in the reprints of the house. As foreman of the composing-room, he was brought into personal contact with men who, in those days of hard drinking, were often turbulent and troublesome; but he had no trouble. He was slight in figure, and had not the remarkable muscular power of his brothers. But he had the force of moral firmness, a singularly persuasive manner, and that unaffected regard for men, independent of their condition, which is instantly felt by them; and these gave him an ascendency in his department which enabled him to keep the peace without harshness or ill-will.

Before 1825 WESLEY and FLETCHER had become partners in the house, and the style was changed to HARPER & BROTHERS. They were all practical printers, and the success of the firm as publishers was already remarkable. Sagacious, untiring, devoted strictly to their business, the operations of the house were constantly extended, and its intercourse by correspondence was most courteous and kindly, for WESLEY was the correspondent and his letters, embracing a wide variety of subjects and addressed to persons of every kind of temperament, were remarkable for the same urbanity of manner and intelligent clearness of statement that marked his personal intercourse. His health was still delicate, and he was carefully temperate in all his habits. But temperance was not a trial, for he had a natural rectitude which seemed to spare him all moral struggles.

The religious influences of his father's house were seed dropped into a kindly soil. The young man early connected himself with the Methodist Church, and in all its multitude of adherents there could be none of a truer humility and a sincerer piety than WESLEY HARPER. He seemed to feel the same affectionate pride in it that GEORGE HERBERT cherished for the Church of England. He was a class-leader, and always a most liberal and devoted member. But the shy humility that was his crowning grace kept him silent and unobtrusive. He did not exhort nor lament himself, but he was a constant and generous supporter of all its enterprises, his devotion was deep but not noisy. His ceaseless charity, his gentleness, his simplicity and friendliness, were his religious graces—his whole life was his great act of worship. The services of his Church and the spirit of its members strongly moved him, and he went often in Brooklyn, where he lived, to share in the worship of the colored brethren, delighting in its fervor and fulness of expression. Doubtless he liked to recognize the divine Fatherhood by identifying himself in religious feeling and aspiration with his human brothers of the lowest estate.

He thanked God that he was a Methodist; but there was probably never a man so affectionately and firmly attached to his own religious denomination who was so truly liberal and free from all taint of bigotry. He held to his own sect, but as one believing that in his Father's house were many mansions. Sectarian arrogance was as impossible to him as social arrogance. If you watched him on Sunday, you saw that he went to the Methodist church. If you watched him every day in the year, you saw that he was a good man.

Soon after joining the firm he married and settled in Brooklyn, and gradually a large family clustered around him. The business prospered. As the correspondent of the house, he was brought in contact with men of every kind, and his acquaintance was very wide. His shrewd observation, his retentive memory, and his general humor made his reminiscences of noted persons very charming. The impression made by him upon all who came to the office was that of an intelligent, courteous, and most unassuming man. But it was well said that if the question were asked, which is the head of the house, which is the HARPER, and who are the brothers? the only accurate answer was, "Either one is HARPER, and all the rest are the brothers."

Such fraternal harmony in business is remarkable. The action of the house was the result of mutual counsel, in which the singularly sound judgment of WESLEY, his knowledge of men, his general intelligence, were indispensable. For, although of the utmost courtesy and manly gentleness, he was a man of clear insight into character, and curiously impatient of pretense. The constant lambent humor that played over the whole surface of his life often touched folly and affectation with a kindly satire that showed how truly they were perceived. WESLEY HARPER'S goodhy was not a sweetness without flavor. No man had a keener eye for the facts of human life and character. He was universally beloved by all those who were employed by the firm; and the secret of their great regard was not merely his kindness of manner, it was his real humanity. He treated them as a man associating with men, not merely as a master with his workmen. He was their confidence, and they discovered that they had found a friend. Every morning he appeared quietly in every department, loitering from case to case, from desk to bench, and group to group, stopping to chat, or to note the "copy," or to look over the proof, or to say, with his mild eye, that there was no lagging or confusion. That tranquil presence will be a remembered benediction in every room. And long before he died one of the oldest and most trusted of the persons employed by the house went to see him, and WESLEY bade him good-by, and begged him, if ever in word or manner he had seemed harsh, to believe that he had not meant unkindly, and to forgive him. "I told him," said the faithful friend afterward, "that I could say any thing to forgive, it was not upon my side." Another said, whose position enabled him to observe closely WESLEY'S character as a business man, "I have known him for forty years, and he is spotless."

THE LATE JOSEPH WESLEY HARPER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GURNEY.]

So the prosperous and pleasant years passed away. He built a spacious house in Brooklyn, full of sunshine front and within. The son who loved him it seemed, as a man's chosen home should, a kind of image of himself. He still went away from it occasionally upon some short voyage for his health, but whenever he returned he again resumed his old familiar daily office. For some time he believed himself to be seriously ill: but it was not until the winter of last year that a sudden and startling attack warned him of his condition, and a subsequent careful investigation confirmed him in it. He could not recover, and that his death might occur at any moment. But whatever inexpressible sorrow this brought to others, WESLEY HARPER tranquilly kept the noiseless tenor of his way. When he was a little better he made short excursions into the country, and came occasionally to the office. He met quietly, conversed with difficulty, and with all the old kindly humor and charity, his interest in the welfare of the house unabated, saying pleasantly, "I don't know how it is gone, how can I be spared?" But he went no more into the book-rooms, and in his heart he knew, as all knew, that his work was done.

Then came the confinement to the house, to the room, to the bed. But in no happy home was there a more cheerful room than the chamber of the dying man. All his friends came to it and went away as with a blessing. To his religious brethren who sought his confidence he spoke with manly humility of his trust in Jesus as God, and of his satisfaction that he had always professed his faith. But this he made clear to those who invited it. Upon no man did WESLEY HARPER ever intrude his inmost, sacred convictions. And he, and from all his friends, it seemed almost to hover between life and death. But he had made every arrangement calmly, and had even named his pall-bearers—four of his friends in the Sands Street Methodist Church, and four of his friends employed by the house, and he affectionately invited all, in every department of the business, to attend his funeral. On Sunday afternoon, the 13th, a friend called, but learning that he was not so well, would not go up-stairs. Mr. HARPER hearing the voice, sent a humorous message of love. On Monday morning, February 14, he seemed to be sleeping when the night's rest. But at about half past seven he asked his sister, who was with him, to raise the window, for he did not breathe freely. She did so, and gave him a little drink. He thanked her, smiled upon her with the old familiar tenderness, and closed his eyes. She saw the change, and stepped into the next room to call the others. But it was too late. With them WESLEY HARPER had died as peacefully as he had lived.

He was buried from the Sands Street Church, with which he had been long associated; and the great congregation, a throng of mourners and sorrowing friends, needed only to remember what he was to feel how truly a good life conquers death; while in their own greater charity and patience and fidelity hereafter those who knew WESLEY HARPER will always find his influence, and perceive that a good man, though dead, yet speaketh.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1870.

THE NEW YORK DEMOCRACY.

THERE is a violent quarrel in the Democratic party in New York. The tyranny and corruption of the Tammany managers have at last produced a reaction, and the New York World cries, down with the King! It declares that the King has debauched the party, and, if not destroyed, that it will ruin it. It professes that unless the power of the King is broken the Democracy will lose the State next fall, and that the King will be as fatal to it in 1870 as the Chicago peace platform was in 1864, or the Tammany reputation platform in 1868. The World says a great many true things of the lamentable and alarming consequences of the supremacy of the King, and summons all honest Democrats to the rescue. It hopes for the cooperation of honest Republicans also; and as the Tribune is doubtful how long the virtue of the World will hold out, it turns and rends Mr. GREELEY by name, rather inconsistently charging him both with corrupt complicity with the King and with favoring its continuance that its enormous offenses may strengthen the Republican party.

But surely the World can not forget that the King has obtained power partly by the strenuous support of the World. It has not forgotten, of course, that one of the most flagrant crimes of the King was the naturalization frauds of 1868, nor that the World sneered at the attempt to expose and defeat them. Neither can it forget that the World forgot that it supported the Chicago candidates placed upon the platform which it now rancidly calls a farce. It zealously sustained the Tammany candidate of 1868 who stood upon the platform of the Convention. These things it did as a matter regular, and in doing them it did the work of the King which controlled its party in the city of New York, and which had nominated Mr. HOFFMAN as Governor.

The World's explanation of this course is, that much as it disliked the King, it believed the success of the Republican party to be a greater mischief than that of the Democratic party with the King attached; but it alleges that it is now possible to detach the King, and consequently it blows its bugle. And for what purpose does it sound the charge? To save the State in the autumn of 1870 and the country in 1872 to the Democratic party. It hopes that the honest Republicans, for the sake of party, will overthrow the King, and restore parity to the elections and decency to the city government. But the Republicans will most assuredly be abortive in the way that it is attempted; and for the simple reason that the Democratic party can not be so detached from the King.

The present Democratic party has been educated in contempt of morals in politics. It has been trained to assert at "meetings" and by no preacher more zealously than the World, and when you exhort people to sneer at what you vaguely call morality, they can scarcely be surprised to find them totally disregarding common honesty. For a generation the Democratic party has been in open revolt against law. The teachers may have meant only State rights, but a party looks through the abstraction to the fact, and the fact was slavery. Nominally, State rights, if you please; it is a very pretty fence, but the thing fenced, we observe, is slavery, and the party which for years the negro decried and derided in every foul and unmanly strain—the World, since it became what it calls Democratic, leading the van—that party has every advocated upon religious and economical grounds. Treason and unspeakable wrong the Democratic leaders tried to hush out of sight, or to hide under what they called the Constitution, and their teaching was the most demoralizing conceivable.

This policy, of course, had its effect. It drove to the Republican party the honest elements in the population, and the party relied upon those elements for its successes. It was natural to suppose that the honest elements, radical to sell black men, it can not be very unchristian and unconstitutional to cheat white men. The Democratic training was sufficient for children. In its chief stronghold, the city of New York, sneering at an honest recognition of the fundamental rights of man, relying upon the ignorance and pandering to the prejudices of the most degraded population, the leaders have constantly confessed their purpose, until their government has become one vast and notorious system of corruption.

The World proposes to break this power by appealing to those who make it. Its theory of the King seems to be that it is strong by Republican support, and that if that is taken away it will cure all. This is to be done, apparently, by abolishing the commissions. But the commissioners were established at the request of members of both parties, who found the condition of affairs in the city under the general plan which the World now labors tenderly to keep. Like FERNANDO WOOD were elected Mayor, and the Mayor appointed the police. The party that had been chained upon negro hating elected a demagogue, and the pace of the city was in his keeping. What reason is there to suppose that that party is less ignorant, less liable to be led by demagogues than before? Why should any one who wants the rule of the King of the Democratic party in this city suppose that they would rather be led by Mr. TILDEN, the World, and the gentlemen of the Manhattan Club, than by Mr. SWEENY and Mr. TWEED? This the World does not show. But until this can be shown, generalizations about the virtue of New York "filched" from the people, and the "rule of the people" as the remedy, is pointless.

The World is the most hopeful practical remedy of the evils of the condition here lies in the hearty co-operation of "the honest Democrats," as the World calls them, with the Republicans. But this is not acceptable to the World. It proposes its change as a party measure. It would destroy the Ring, that the party may not be too heavily "handicapped" in the Presidential race of 1872. It begins, therefore, by repulsing Republican assistance. The work is to be done by "honest Democrats," that the Republicans may be beaten in the State in 1870 and in the country in 1872. If it can push the matter so far as to bring separate candidates into the field, however, it will undoubtedly appeal to Republican support. It will tell us that we can not elect any man of our own in the city, and that an honest Democrat is certainly better than a dishonest one.

So be it; but for ourselves we remember that upon this principle we supported Mr. HOFFMAN for Mayor against FERNANDO WOOD, and were rewarded by the infamous proclamation in regard to the frauds, and by the confirmation of the power of the King, of which Mr. HOFFMAN, as the signature of the monstrous Erie bill shows, is the willing instrument.

And why did this happen? Or why should we suppose it would happen again? Because the ultimate reliance of the leaders of the Democratic party is not on its worst elements. It is typified by that absurd spectacle which was reported last year of Mr. OAKEY HALL, as Mayor of New York, marching in a green sash on St. Patrick's Day to cajole the least intelligent of the Irish, for the more intelligent despised the performance. So with slavery, so with all other sensible citizens. The Ring probably understands the mass of the Democratic voters better than the World, and that mass controls the party. Consequently, if, in full view of the history and training and composition of that party, Republicans are asked to give their votes to Democratic candidates, in the hope of reform, they would give them to those who will plead party necessity and the vague of yielding to those worst elements, as the World did in the Presidential campaigns of 1864 and 1868. The World complains bitterly that Republicans do not help its movement. But if it preferred to keep the Ring in power to save its party, by what logic could it complain of others who do the same thing?

CUBA AND BELLIGERENCY.

SENATOR SHERMAN is a cautious man. When, therefore, he appears as the champion of Cuban recognition, he is believed to have taken up the cause, from his intercourse with other Senators, that they favor it, or that he is persuaded it is the secret wish of the Administration. Senators CARPENTER, HOWE, and MORTON plead for it directly or indirectly. They approach it differently, but their object is evidently the same. All these gentlemen perhaps believe that there is a strong public opinion which demands recognition. And why, they ask, are prohibitions taken. There is very little public interest in the question. The Senators have read the accounts of the Ku Klux meetings in the South. Were they impressed by it as a manifestation of real feeling? Have they read of similar meetings about Cuba? And have they observed that there is a society just formed here, at the very seat of the Cuban Junta, for the purpose of arousing public sympathy and interest for Cuba?

General BANKS has offered a resolution in the House of Representatives requesting the President to maintain a strict neutrality in the Cuban contest. If this means any thing, it means the withdrawal of belligerent rights to the Cubans. And if so, we ask, as we did last summer, why not say frankly what you mean? If gentlemen in the Senate and the House are of opinion that there is such a contest—for a contest nobody denies—as to justify recognition—like that of the responsible insurgent government in Cuba, exercising actual authority, to which we may look in case of trouble—in a word, that the prolonged disturbances in Cuba have become a war of such proportions and with such results that we may honorably and with safety to ourselves take the risk of a war with Spain by recognition, then, by all that is sacred in national honor, let us distinctly acknowledge the belligerent rights of the Cubans in arms.

Senator CARPENTER says that war exists, and that we may not be able to say that the United States, by tendering its good offices, has virtually said so, and thereby has really recognized belligerency. The Senator's argument is, that whenever a government can not keep the peace by civil process, but resorts to its war powers, such a state is war exists. Then, if we send soldiers to Utah, and the Mormons do not yield, the European powers may declare that war exists, and govern themselves accordingly. If there is a war, he says there are belligerents, and no say is only to state a fact. But this is a position which would hardly be gravely urged to its conclusions, for it would carry prolonged domestic insurrection into war, and involve every nation in the disturbance of every other. A belligerent, in an international sense, is a certain number of people fighting, but a certain organized authority attesting itself by its acts. In other words, there is a regular, visible government behind the fighting. Does Senator CARPENTER believe that there is any such belligerent in Cuba?

Unquestionably there is some kind of fighting in Cuba, and an immense lying about it on all sides. Spain has sent soldiers to the island, and has built and equipped gun-boats; and the insurgents, apparently of a guerrilla kind, have met them in one or two battles, but have been generally successfully pursued in the hill country. There is a constitution published, and a form of civil government. Does any body believe that there is any part of the island of Cuba in which justice is administered by judges and courts under that republican authority? Is it not unquestionably the fact that the constitution and the form of government have been improvised for the purpose of presenting to the United States an apparent basis of belligerent recognition, in the hope that by such recognition Cuba might be separated from Spain, and for the purpose of establishing a friendly government, but that the island may be annexed to the United States?

If Congress honestly believes that the Cuban insurgents are in a true and received sense belligerents, let it say so. But let it demand some other evidence than the fact which has been a virtually passive resistance to Spain continued for more than a year. And when it has proclaimed "neutrality," let no more bands of foreign powers do the same when, under Mr. CULLOM'S bill, we send the army to Utah.

NATURALIZATION AND THE REGISTERS.

FRAUDULENT naturalization has become so notorious, especially in the city of New York, the great depôt of immigration, that it is evident the registers ought to be abolished as a farce, or wholly reformed. The Constitution gives Congress power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; but the State courts, over which Congress has no control, naturalize. The result is the pleasing spectacle offered by certain courts in this city just before election. They become mere "mills" for grinding out voters, in a manger of which we exposed the details in the autumn of 1868. One of the most atrocious frauds in naturalization occurred.

The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives have proposed a bill to put an end to these shameful proceedings. They propose that the courts of the United States alone shall be charged with the duty of naturalization; and why should any good citizen object? They are tribunals of the best character, and beyond suspicion of interested administration of the law. The Judges do not, like our Judges, make voters for themselves in making citizens. The act of naturalization of citizenship is essentially a grave one, and should be most carefully guarded. It is enough that it is not so guarded under the present system.

The bill proposed provides that notice of intention must be filed in a United States court and after that declaration of intention a certificate may issue to take effect six months afterward. This secures the substantial intention of any bona fide immigrant. But it has been amusingly attacked, in the most vociferous manner, as "a villainous scheme for weakening the Democratic party" and for the naturalization of the foreigner. If the State of New York, for instance, chooses to make every inhabitant a voter, it is difficult to see how it can be prevented from doing so. But it by no means follows, as the same paper asserts, that Congress can not meddle with the qualifications of voters" for naturalized citizens. It certainly can and would meddle if it chose any thing which made qualifications incompatible with a republican government, which it is bound to secure to every State, and of which it is sufficient judge. It is also well settled that, under the Constitution, even the electors of President and of Congress are not qualified voters, but only such as the State Legislature who landed yesterday to vote for President, and the next State may require a residence of ten years, and covered familiarity with the language of the country.

The value of a registry to an honest election is sufficiently proved by the present hostility of the Ring, and by the party which profits by the Ring. Every voter who respects his own rights and who, honest ourselves, in the end of the people, sees, of course, that nothing is more important than to ascertain who are entitled to vote, and to take care that they, and no others, do vote, and vote but once. Surely it is not asking more than every man who cares for his own rights has a right to grant, that every man's right to vote shall be verified in the most satisfactory manner. The "honest" Legislature of New York, which is considering the charter, will also probably destroy the registry. Meanwhile its chief members declare that "repealing" is another word for "reform," and that the Speaker had been elected by enormous frauds. Let us see, then, with all its fine professions of faith in the people, what the Legislature will do to secure an honest expression of the people's will.

CURRENT COMEDY.

MR. FERNANDO WOOD has recently expressed in Congress his nervous apprehension lest there should be trading in West Point appointments. Nothing but the sternest rectitude in all public affairs will satisfy this statesman. Money-making in politics draws out his most eloquent denunciation, and his gate of political purity is so straight and narrow that we few can enter in thereat. Mr. FERNANDO WOOD's praise of political integrity is the best thing in comedy since Mr. Joseph Surface's commendation of the moral virtues.

But there are comic touches in the SWEENY charter which are almost as exquisite, and they occur, as might be supposed, in the Excise article. Thus the Tammany Ring, through their agents, the Mayor and Aldermen, are to appoint the Board of Excise; and such is the sensitive regard of the charter to the public welfare that it empowers the Board "to grant licenses to any person of good moral character." It does not, indeed, forbid the permission to persons of an immoral turn; but it is easy to see that none will apply. The persons of good moral character who are thus licensed are to be appointed to sell liquor "wherever upon their premises, and are to summon the police, and the offenders are to be removed. But if nothing of the kind be done, why, then the persons of good moral character must be considered "desirables."

Then we come to the purest humor conceivable, the truly genteel comedy. It is expressly forbidden to the aforesaid persons of good moral character or otherwise to sell liquor to an apprentice or to a minor under eighteen, knowing or having probable cause to believe him to be such, without the consent of the apprentice's master or mistress, or of the minor's parent or guardian. What a tender picture does not this provision suggest of the anxious regard of the frequent corners of the avenues and of every other street in town, solemnly requiring his younger customers not to sell rum to any not yet chartered libertines, putting them upon their honor to take back their money if they may not lawfully drink the liquor to any "improper vicinity" which he, in his capacity of person of good moral character, is authorized to sell to those who are unlicensed! But the gem is one of the provisions of the charter which is sure to be universally enforced. It is, perhaps, the most impregnable of the safeguards which the charter erects around the public virtue.

Once more, by another section, the moral persons are authorized to keep their "places" quiet and orderly, and on Sundays closed; for nothing shall be construed as hostile to the entertainment by taverns of the traveling public upon Sunday "in the mode usual therein." What a touching public feeling is expressed! Moreover, at the places in which the moral person resides, and which are to be closed on Sundays, nothing shall be construed as hostile to peaceable ingress and egress—of whom and for what purpose is not stated. It would inspire the complete faith of the reader if it were construed as hostile to the consumption of lager beer sold by moral persons in gardens, provided that the innocent & religious beverage was not consulted by not allowing such gardens within a quarter of a mile of a church!

Surely religious sentiment could ask for no more. If there be any body who does not see that all this shows a resolution to save society from the gulf-stop, to encourage and promote the good moral character, and to foster religion and morality, we doubt, also, if he would be able to appreciate the austere political virtue of the Honorable FERNANDO WOOD.

DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY.

THE Hon. WILLIAM F. ALLEN, Comptroller of the State of New York, is a gentleman of high character, and he owes it to himself as well as to the public an explanation of the fact that, under the laws of the State, he has allowed Mr. FRANK H. SWEENY to retain the sum of $46,726 91 for drawing his check to pay into the State treasury the proportion of the State tax due from the county of New York for 1868, and $36,318 39 for the same service in the following year. When Mr. ALLEN was elected Comptroller a law was passed, with a provision to the county tax levy, that the compensation of the treasurer should be a half of one per cent. upon the money that he actually received, and the same upon that which he paid out, "but not exceeding ten thousand dollars per annum from the county treasurer." This would seem to be plain enough. And in his report Mr. ALLEN says that the practice has been to allow the treasurer one half per cent., not exceeding a specified sum; but he says also that, as the demands have increased, it is doubted whether under the law the county treasurers are entitled to payment from the State treasury, except where, as in one or two cases, there has been special legislative permission; and in this doubt he concurs. How, then, does it happen that Mr. SWEENY has received a sum so enormous?

Upon the plea that by the law he is to have one per cent. upon the whole amount received and paid, and that the law merely limits the amount of his compensation from the county Treasury to ten thousand dollars, leaving, by implication, the rest to be paid from the State treasury! But the law of 1862 provides that the compensation of county treasurers for this service shall not exceed ten thousand dollars; and when Mr. DANIEL DEVLIN, despite the law, insisted upon retaining one per cent., which was formerly allowed, the Court of Appeals decided against him, and maintained the law of 1862. The question, therefore, is, whether, under the law of 1868, allowing a compensation of one per cent., "but not exceeding ten thousand dollars per annum from the county treasury," the treasurer is limited to that amount, or may receive one per cent. of the whole, of which not more than ten thousand must be paid by the county.

A writer in the Evening Post pertinently inquires whether the law act, specifying the limit of the amount to be paid from the county treasury, supersede that of 1863, specifying two thousand dollars as the amount of the account to be paid from the State treasury. And even if it does, may the Chamberlain retain it? Must he not first pay it to the State treasury, and then receive it by a direct appropriation? Moreover, can an act regulating the financial arrangements of a county treasurer have any meaning to take money from the State treasury?

Here are very serious questions. They are of a kind that can only be settled by a clear judicial construction. But Mr. Comptroller ALLEN grants to Mr. PETER B. SWEENY the utmost amount that he could possibly claim. It is important that it is important that the subject should be definitely settled by law. While it is still indefinite, why does he allow such enormous claim? That is the question which the Comptroller ought to answer. Nor is it any explanation to say that they are the decisions created by express legislation," unless he means that the provision of 1868 is an exception of the kind. But that is impossible, that it is not necessarily so, and can not be made so but by judicial interpretation, except by a Comptroller who is not a lawyer. There are few men in the Democratic party of whom no explanation of such a course would be expected by any body; but Mr. ALLEN is not one of them.

THE TAXATION.

THE plan recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives of cutting down the internal revenue to the extent of some thirty millions of dollars may be regarded as the expression of an opinion against Mr. BOUTWELL's funding scheme. The recent loan put upon the European market by Russia, and the rate of interest prevailing in many of the money centres of Europe, have undoubtedly satisfied the Committee that Mr. BOUTWELL's scheme is impracticable. The Russian loan, although bearing 6 per cent. interest, was offered at 480 for each £100, or at less than 5 per cent. It commands already a premium of 2½ per cent., due to the fact that the total of bids was greater by exercise of speculation.

The standing of Russia throughout Europe is good, owing to the punctuality with which she has met her obligations during the past, and to the firmness with which the Emperor is seated in power, to her exemption from the danger of conquest by any foreign power, and to her vast territorial possessions. As our people have been steadily pressing up a debt to Europe for a term of years, an amount which now reaches two hundred and ten millions of dollars per annum, as our indebtedness has been largely improved by cutting down our excess of paper money, and as the amount paid for interest on our bonds held abroad is now about one half the annual score we allow to run up, it can not be said that either our ability or our willingness to stand the burden of our indebtedness has as yet been proved to the satisfaction of capitalists in Europe. All expectation, therefore, of placing a loan and a large one at par or above par current must be treated as the Committee of Ways and Means has determined.

It is undoubtedly true that the Secretary of the Treasury has had assurances that such a loan could be placed abroad if a sufficient discount were allowed, and the bonds were made payable in the money of important European states; but it will be found on investigation that the desire for accommodation has had great influence, and that there would be close scrutiny into our situation on the part of the capitalists who had a demand which would prevent the required subscriptions.

The United States is yet to encounter the severe experience of a financial revulsion on the same incurring a larger debt. When Europe shall refuse to trust us to the extent of our new annual indebtedness, or we ourselves shall abandon the extravagance which occasions this annual charge, we shall be competent to estimate the true effect of debt upon our population. There can be no improvement in our condition until, having passed through this experience, we shall have accommodated our life to the temper and spirit of the people on this subject. Mr. BOUTWELL expects this to be assumed; the creditor requires that it shall be proved.

We have already shown, in previous articles, that the policy pursued by the Treasury of pressing down gold, without at the same time improving our paper-currency in a corresponding degree, has had a powerful effect in lowering the currency price of our exportable products, and that the whole West is suffering from its influence. Cotton has felt the power of the Treasury to some extent, and it will be impossible for the planter to maintain the price of this staple if the rates of gold shall be continued through the spring.

The apparent abundance of gold is due to the fact that, on such succeeding sale, the purchaser takes from the Sub-treasurer a certificate of its deposit in the Treasury instead of moving the gold itself, and hence our banks appear to be loaded with it as well as the Treasury.

These certificates now amount to over fifty millions of dollars, for which there is but little demand except to pay duties; and in the absence of a foreign demand for balances gold remains a drug upon the market, which the Treasury for the moment can beat down at its pleasure. Sales of exchange in Wall Street, founded upon telegraphic sales of bonds in London, were made on Friday, showing that the foreigner is still content to allow his balances to remain unemployed instead of taking them to London, where only 2½ to 3 per cent. interest can now be earned.

It appears, however, from the showing of the London Economist, that there is a perceptible improvement in the industry of England, due to cheaper cotton and to cheap bread, as well as to better rewards for what they manufacture; and it may be that the want of capital in England may be increased. It must be evident, however, that whether the improvement will be sufficient to turn the flow of capital toward Europe or not, it is in the highest degree prudent for us so to be induced by the forbearance of the creditor as to be recklessly increasing our permanent indebtedness.

The state of trade in all parts of the Union excites some anxiety. The West abstains from buying because their full stocks remain on the shelves, and collections have been light. The success of speculation turns upon the points of agriculture; and as they have been very small in the most favored regions, purchases are made only to supply necessities on limited scales. The South and Southwest are represented in the market by a few customers; but they also keep sparingly, for the failure of the great crop of cotton for the remainder of the season. If there were a certainty that the price at which it has been sold by speculators for delivery in the spring could be maintained, the South would be active purchasers of goods; but the doubt produces caution, and it is supposed that cotton goods, and indeed many other articles, would sympathize with the fall if it take place.

The prosperity of the English depends, as their press asserts, upon cheap cotton and breadstuffs. Their whole financial power is based upon their trade advantage, and to depress both articles in the United States. These efforts have been met in the South, for the protection of their great staple, with courage, skill, and, up to a late period, with success. So far as concerns the exports of the North, there were close to abundant harvests, and slaughter was easy, as it was aided by the action of the Treasury.

Had there been steadiness in gold at a premium fixed with due regard to the extent of our paper circulation, the North would have sold its grain to the foreigner, and converted the proceeds into currency at the rate at which the currency circulated when the expense of production was settled; but by reason of the large difference—what having produced when paid gold was 45 per cent. premium, and sold when at 20—enormous losses have been made by the great farming interest, which have been communicated to dealers of every description.

The future of trade for this season depends largely upon the action of the Treasury and of Congress. It is to be hoped that Western members will not urge inflation as a remedy. If the currency shall be made to correspond in quantity with the current price of gold, throughout the whole country, the whole trade and industry of the country, will be revivified.

NOTES.

A VERY shrewd observer writes: "If you see it reported that the Duke of Argyle is to go to America to act as negotiator in the Alabama affair, don't believe it. He would never put to his cane. He is not solid enough for such a position. He would go with good feeling, and with a real wish to settle the matter, but would have no idea of yielding as much as a strong man would be often ready to yield, and his vanity would be constantly on the alert lest he were to be taken in. He is a very good man for a Duke, but he is not an able statesman, and will never hold such a second-rate position at home. He is keen as a Yankee, is, in fine, a sort of American Duke; and to my mind Americanism and Dukedom make a very poor mixture. If it were the Duchess who were to go I should think the best hope. She is altogether a different sort of man. "Le Roi n'a qu'un seul homme—c'est la Reine."

FROM Paris we hear that "the city is beginning to get over the late commotions. The season has thus far been intensely dull; but balls, dinners, and concerts have begun, and there is a huge vista before us. ROCHEFORT is but a pale reflex of the men who led the times of eighty years ago. The ministry had at first a leaning mistaken, but fewer than might be reasonably expected from such very inexperienced men. On the whole, things look encouraging, and seem to indicate that France is gliding, unknowingly, imperceptibly, into so much of a republic as she can manage. The condition of Spain has a singular influence on all thinking men on this side of the Pyrenees. PRIVOST-PARADOL will go to Washington very soon, I think, as Minister. He is rather too Anglican just now, but a year or two in America will give him better ideas both for himself and his countrymen, whom he has such means of addressing as few writers in France possess."

PRIVATE accounts from Cadiz represent that city as full of exiled Cubans. "Cádiz," says a letter, "will, for the Cuba, if every mail steamer from Havana comes as full of the refugees as during the last two months. It is pitiful to see their condition. Ladies and gentlemen, recently of the greatest wealth, are actually begging for a living. As for Spain itself no man can foretell the future for a month. Moreover she is here spending time and money, but all to no purpose. It is evidently more than ever the deep interest felt for him in Spain, and especially in Andalusia, The Republican party was ground in the elections, and will unite with the Unionists. Business is suspended and paralyzed, and many persons are leaving the country, which is really in the hands of ambitious men."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

February 14.—In the Senate, the Mississippi bill was taken up and discussed, and some time spent.—In the House, a very large number of bills were introduced, but none of importance.

February 15.—In the Senate, the bill with reference to the franking privilege was discussed. Mr. SUMNER, in remarks, made a long speech in support of various modifications in the bill as passed by the House, and which he had concluded. The bill on the admission of Mississippi was resumed, but no action was taken.—In the House no business of importance was transacted.

February 16.—In the Senate, the discussions of the day were on the bill for the relief of colored soldiers and for the admission of Mississippi.—In the House, Mr. SPEER, of Georgia, a Republican, was introduced in relation to granting a bounty, for the next three years, on iron built and manufactured in this country from American materials equal to the present duties upon such materials if imported. Resolutions regarding Cuba and the enforcement of the neutrality law were introduced by Mr. BANKS and others.

February 17.—In the Senate, the Mississippi bill was taken up as unfinished business, and at last disposed of. The bill admitting Texas to the Union, the removal of the disabilities of the late rebels, and the bill as it came from the House was passed.—In the House, the bill providing for the payment of polygamy in Utah was taken up and discussed at some length, without action.

February 18.—In the Senate, the ratification of the fifteenth Amendment by Nebraska was announced. Among the bills introduced was one by Mr. CONKLING to encourage the building of a ship-canal around the city, and to provide for the transportation of the mails by the same.—In the House, very little was done, most of the day being taken up with a discussion as to the Mississippi bill.

February 19.—In the Senate, a resolution against the Virginia Legislature, asking for a general removal of political disabilities in the State, was received and laid on the table.—The House occupied the day in a long debate on the Mississippi bill. A bill was introduced to provide stay of execution in certain cases, and to allow writs of relief against the most ignorant decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

CUBA.

In the Senate of the New York Legislature a bill has been introduced to repeal the act to appropriate excise money to sectarian schools. It was referred to the Committee on Education.—Mr. ALLEN, of Kings, left the Court of Special Sessions, the New York Board of Supervisors, and the Metropolitan Police Commission, have also been introduced.

General JOSÉ MARIA AGUERO, who is now in Cuba, is trying to get back to Mexico, where his name is again put forward as the head of a revolutionary party; but the Captain-General, while perfectly willing he should go, will not allow him to remain there to sell for Mexican dollars.

On Sunday evening, February 13, Mr. VOORHIS, a Methodist clergyman of Brooklyn, was shot and killed by one William Chambers while standing at the bar of a liquor saloon. The murderer was entirely unprovoked. Chambers was at once arrested and locked up. The crime caused great excitement among the people of Brooklyn, who assembled in great numbers, declaring that they would take Chambers from the jail and lynching him. A regiment of troops was held in readiness to suppress the mob, but expected no riotous demonstration, which, happily, did not occur.

SAN FRANCISCO has been visited by a number of earthquake, and appears to be rather disappointed that it passed off without serious results.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FEBRUARY 15 Mr. Gladstone introduced in the British House of Commons an important Land-Reform bill for Ireland, which is said to have received support of all the Irish members.

There have been no more riotous demonstrations in Paris, but public tranquility is far from being assured. The prosecutions of the journalists, and several Parisian editors, among them Gustave Flourens, have been sentenced to imprisonment and fine. The Paris correspondent of the Press says that the Emperor has determined to grant the freedom of the press to the Corps Législatif, and to the publication of the reports of debates. It is said that the Emperor's determination to grant this freedom was announced to the Emperor are reported, among them the relinquishment of the power to inaugurate members of municipal societies.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte is to be tried before the High Court of Justice, which is to meet at Tours, March 31. The indictment charges that Prince Pierre by the High Court of Peace is charged with having committed an assault and battery upon VICTOR NOIR, and with complicity rains to supply deficiencies.

The Senate has passed a law, by a vote of sixty-three against two, to abolish the Council of State, unless extenuating circumstances are shown, in which case the sentence can be lessened by two degrees.

Cartist competitors continue to agitate Spain, operating from the territory of France. The Duke of Montpensier again looms above the horizon as a candidate for the throne, and has written a letter in which he declares that "Spain is his country by tradition, adoption, and affection."

An educational Bill for England and Wales has been introduced in the House of Commons, which proposes the establishment, with compulsory rates to supply deficiencies.

The Senate has passed a law, by a vote of sixty-three against two, to abolish the Council of State, unless extenuating circumstances are shown, in which case the sentence can be lessened by two degrees.

Cartist competitors continue to agitate Spain, operating from the territory of France. The Duke of Montpensier again looms above the horizon as a candidate for the throne, and has written a letter in which he declares that "Spain is his country by tradition, adoption, and affection."

An educational Bill for England and Wales has been introduced in the House of Commons, which proposes the establishment, with compulsory rates to supply deficiencies.

BOUNDARY POST BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND RUPERT'S LAND.—[SEE PAGE 149.]

THE CARTHUSIAN CONVENT AT ROME.—[SEE PAGE 151.]

RUPERT'S LAND.

OUR first engraving on page 148 gives a view of the plains near Pembina, in the Red River country, with the boundary post erected there to mark the frontier between the United States and the British territory of Rupert's Land, where the French and Indian half-breed population recently attempted to inaugurate a revolution against the British authorities. The rich prairie is here traversed by a narrow road, which appears in the fore-ground. The sketch also furnishes an illustration of the habits and costumes of the Cree Indians of Rupert's Land. These are represented as walking in procession, headed by the Medicine Man, with the sacred rattle in hand, round an inclosure of willow brunches, within which is celebrated a "Dog Feast," so called from their eating dog-meat on the occasion, and being a mixture of religious ceremony and social mirth. In the half-distance are their tents, made of dressed buffalo leather, with their badges or armorial bearings painted upon them. Beside these stand their carts, made without a particle of iron, and which are very strong, and so light as to be serviceable as rafts when deep water has to be crossed. In the fore-ground is a group of two young Indians in their gala costume, with their dogs, which in winter are used to drag sledges.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

BACKWARD.

"WELL?" whispered Blanche, taking her uncle confidentially by the arm.

"Well," said Sir Patrick, with a spark of his satirical humor flashing out at his niece, "I am going to do a very rash thing. I am going to place a serious trust in the hands of a girl of eighteen."

"The girl's hands will keep it, uncle—though she is only eighteen."

"I must run the risk, my dear; your intimate knowledge of Miss Silvester may be of the greatest assistance to me in the next step I take. You shall know all that I can tell you, by-and-by. I must warn you first. I can only admit you into my confidence by startling you with a great surprise. Do you follow me, so far?"

"Yes! yes!"

"If you fail to control yourself, you place an obstacle in the way of my being of some future use to Miss Silvester. Remember that, and now prepare for the surprise. What did I tell you before dinner?"

"You said you had made discoveries at Craig Fernie. What have you found out?"

"I have found out that there is a certain person who is in full possession of the information which Miss Silvester has concealed from you and from me. The person is within our reach. The person is in this neighborhood. The person is in this room!"

He caught up Blanche's hand, resting on his arm, and pressed it significantly. She looked at him with the cry of surprise suspended on her lips—waited a little with her eyes fixed on Sir Patrick's face—struggled resolutely, and composed herself.

"Point the person out." She said the words with a self-possession which won her uncle's hearty approval. Blanche had done wonders for a girl in her teens.

"Look!" said Sir Patrick; "and tell me what you see."

"I see Lady Lundie, at the other end of the room, with the map of Perthshire and the Roman Antiquities of Scotland on the table. And I see every body but you and me obliged to listen to her."

"Every body?"

Blanche looked carefully round the room, and noticed Geoffrey in the opposite corner; fast asleep by this time in his arm-chair.

"Uncle! you don't mean—?"

"There is the man."

"Mr. Delamayn—!"

"Mr. Delamayn knows every thing."

Blanche held mechanically by her uncle's arm, and looked at the sleeping man as if her eye could never see enough of him.

"You saw me in the library in private consultation with Mr. Delamayn," resumed Sir Patrick. "I have to acknowledge, my dear, that you were quite right in thinking this a suspicious circumstance. And I am now to justify myself for having purposely kept you in the dark up to the present time."

"DO YOU KNOW WHERE ANNE SILVESTER IS THIS MORNING?"

With those introductory words, he briefly reverted to the earlier occurrences of the day, and then added, by way of commentary, a statement of the conclusions which events had suggested to his own mind.

The events, it may be remembered, were three in number. First, Geoffrey's private conference with Sir Patrick on the subject of Irregular Marriages in Scotland. Secondly, Anne Silvester's appearance at Windygates. Thirdly, Anne's flight.

The conclusions which had thereupon suggested themselves to Sir Patrick's mind were six in number.

First, that a connection of some sort might possibly exist between Geoffrey's acknowledged difficulty about his friend, and Miss Silvester's presumed difficulty about herself. Secondly, that Geoffrey had really put to Sir Patrick—not his own case—but the case of a friend. Thirdly, that Geoffrey had some interest (of no harmless kind) in establishing the fact of his friend's marriage. Fourthly, that Anne's anxiety (as described by Blanche) to hear the names of the gentlemen who were staying at Windygates, pointed, in all probability, to Geoffrey. Fifthly, that this fact inference disturbed the second conclusion, and reopened the doubt whether Geoffrey had not been stating his own case, after all, under pretense of stating the case of a friend. Sixthly, that the one way of obtaining any enlightenment on this point, and on all the other points involved in mystery, was to go to Craig Fernie, and consult Mrs. Inchbare's experience during the period of Anne's residence at the inn. Sir Patrick's apology for keeping all this a secret from his niece followed. He had shrunk from agitating her on the subject until he could be sure of proving his suspicions to be true. The proof had now been obtained; and his mind had been opened to Blanche without reserve.

"So much, my dear," proceeded Sir Patrick, "for these necessary explanations which are also the necessary nuisances of human intercourse. You now know as much as I did when I arrived at Craig Fernie—and you are, therefore, in a position to appreciate the value of my discoveries at the inn. Do you understand every thing, so far?"

"Perfectly!"

"Very good. I drove up to the inn; and—behold me closeted with Mrs. Inchbare in her own private parlor! (My reputation may or may not suffer, but Mrs. Inchbare's bones are above suspicion.) It was a long business, Blanche. A more sour-tempered, cunning, and distrustful witness I never examined in all my experience at the Bar. She would have spent the temper of any mortal man but a lawyer. We have such wonderful tempers in our profession; and we are so aggravating when we like! In short, my dear, Mrs. Inchbare was a she-cat, and I was a he-cat—and I clawed the truth out of her at last. The result was well worth arriving at, as you shall see. Mr. Delamayn had described to me certain remarkable circumstances as taking place between a lady and a gentleman at an inn: the object of the parties being to pass themselves off at the time as man and wife. Every one of those circumstances, Blanche, occurred at Craig Fernie, between a lady and a gentleman, on the day when Miss Silvester disappeared from this house. And—wait!—being pressed for her name, after the gentleman had left her behind him at the inn, the name the lady gave was, 'Mrs. Silvester.' What do you think of that?"

"Think! I'm bewildered—I can't realize it."

"It's a startling discovery, my dear child—there is no denying that. Shall I wait a little, and let you recover yourself?"

"No! no! Go on! The gentleman, uncle? The gentleman who was with Anne? Who is he? Not Mr. Delamayn?"

"Not Mr. Delamayn," said Sir Patrick. "If I have proved nothing else, I have proved that."

"What need was there to prove it? Mr. Delamayn went to London on the day of the love-party. And Arnold—"

"And Arnold went with him as far as the second station from this. Quite true! But how was I to know what Mr. Delamayn might have done after Arnold had left him? It could only make sure that he had not gone back privately to the inn, by getting the proof from Mrs. Inchbare."

"How did you get it?"

"I asked her to describe the gentleman who was with Miss Silvester. Mrs. Inchbare's description (vague as you will presently find it to be) completely exonerates that man," said Sir Patrick, pointing to Geoffrey still asleep in his chair. "He is not the person who passed Miss Silvester off as his wife at Craig Fernie. He spoke the truth when he described the case to me as the case of a friend."

"But who is the friend?" persisted Blanche. "That's what I want to know."

"That's what I want to know, too."

"Tell me exactly, uncle, what Mrs. Inchbare said. I have lived with Anne all my life. I must have seen the man somewhere."

"If you can identify him by Mrs. Inchbare's description," returned Sir Patrick, "you will be

COMMANDER THOMAS O. SELFRIDGE, UNITED STATES NAVY.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.—(SEE PAGE 156.)

HON. J. J. WRIGHT, JUDGE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY WEARN AND HIX, COLUMBIA, S. C.—(SEE PAGE 156.)

a great deal cleverer than I am. Here is the picture of the man, as painted by fastidiously: Young; middle-sized; dark hair, eyes, and complexion: nice temper; pleasant way of speaking. Leave out 'young,' and the rest is the exact contrary of Mr. Delamayn. So far, Mrs. Inchbare guides us plainly enough. But how are we to apply her description to the right person? There must be, at the lowest computation, five hundred thousand men in England who are young, middle-sized, dark, nice-tempered, and pleasant spoken. Can the detective police observers that description in every particular."

"And Arnold answers it," said Blanche—as still strange and mysterious in the presence of the clergyman as she had been in the days of her childish ignorance.

"And Arnold answers it," repeated Sir Patrick, quite agreeing with her.

They had barely said those words when Arnold himself appeared, approaching Sir Patrick with a pack of cards in his hand.

There—at the very moment when they had both guessed the truth, without feeling the slightest suspicion of it in their own minds—there stood Hiverycarp, presenting itself unconsciously to eyes incapable of seeing it, in the person of the man who had passed Anne Silvester on to his wife at the Craig Fevvie inn! The terrible caprice of Chance, the merciless irony of Circumstance, could go no further than this. The fates had their feet on the brink of the precipice at that moment. And two of them were standing at an odd coincidence; and one of them was shuffling a pack of cards!

"We have done with the Antiquities at last!" said Arnold; "and we are going to play at Whist. Sir Patrick, will you choose a card?"

"Too soon after dinner, my good fellow, for me. Play the first rubber, and I may give me another chance. By-the-way," he added, "Miss Silvester has been traced to Kirkandrew. How is it that you never saw her on the 5th?"

"She can't have gone my way, Sir Patrick, or I must have met her."

Having justified himself in those terms, he was recalled to the other end of the room by the whist-party, impatient for his cards which he held in his hand.

"What were we talking of when he interrupted us?" said Sir Patrick to Blanche.

"Of the man, uncle, who was with Miss Silvester at the inn."

"It's useless to pursue that inquiry, my dear, with nothing better than Mrs. Inchbare's description to help us."

Blanche looked round at the sleeping Geoffrey.

"And he knows it!" she said. "Geoffrey, sing, uncle, to look at the brute snoring in his chair!"

Sir Patrick held up a warning hand. Before a word more could be said between them they were silenced again by another interruption.

The whist-party comprised Lady Lundie and the surgeon, playing as partners against Smith and Jones, and Arnold behind the sofa looking on, by a lesson in the game. One, Two, and Three, thus left to their own devices, remained thought of the billiard-table; and, detecting Geoffrey asleep in his corner, advanced to disturb by diabolical mischief. "Let's challenge him to a Pool." Geoffrey roused himself, and rubbed his eyes, and said, soothingly, "Not to-night." As he rose, he looked at the opposite corner in which Sir Patrick and his niece were sitting. Blanche's self-possession, resolutely on the strain, glad to preserve it, was not strong enough to keep her eyes from turning toward her lover, with an expression which betrayed the reluctant interest that she now felt in him. He stopped, noticing something entirely new in the way with which the young lady was regarding him.

"Beg your pardon," said Geoffrey. "Do you wish to speak to me?"

Blanche's face flushed all over. Her usual tone came to the rescue.

"Miss Londie and I hope you have slept well, Mr. Delamayn," said Sir Patrick, satirically. "That's all."

"Oh? That's all?" said Geoffrey, still looking at Blanche. "Beg your pardon again. Decued long walk, and decued heavy dinner. Natural consequence—ain't it?"

Sir Patrick eyed him closely. It was plain that he had been honestly puzzled at finding himself an object of special attention on Blanche's part. "See you in the billiard-room?" he said, carelessly; and followed the surgeon out of the room—as usual, without waiting for an answer.

"Mind what you are about," said Sir Patrick to his niece. "That man is quicker than he looks. We commit a serious mistake if we lose him on his guard at starting."

"It isn't his guard, uncle," said Blanche. "But think of his being in Anne's confidence, and of my being shut out of it!"

"In his friends' confidence, you mean, my dear; and (if we only avoid awakening his suspicion) there is no knowing how much he may say or do something which may show us who his friend is."

"But he is going back to his brother's to-morrow—he said so at dinner-time."

"So much the better. He will be out of the way of seeing strange things in a certain young lady's face. His brother's house is within easy reach of this; and in the legal event of the experience tells me that he has not done consulting me yet—and that he will want something more next time. So much for our chance of seeing the light through Mr. Delamayn—if we can't see it in any other way. And that is not our only chance, remember. I have something to tell you about Bishoprigs and the lost letter."

"Is it found?"

"No. I satisfied myself about that—I had it searched for, under my own eye. The letter is stolen, Blanche; and Bishopriggs has got it. I have left a line for him, at Mrs. Inchbare's care. The old rascal is missed already by the visitors at the inn, and he will join the wood he. His mistress is feeling the penalty of having been fool enough to vent her ill-temper on her head-waiter. She lays the whole blame of the quarrel on Miss Silvester, of course. Bishopriggs neglected every body at the inn to wait on Miss Silvester. Bishopriggs was insolent on being remonstrated with, and Miss Silvester encouraged him—and so on. The result will be—now Miss Silvester has gone—that Bishopriggs will return to his former duties, exactly as they were. We are sailing with wind and tide, my dear. Come, and learn to play whist."

She rose to join the card-players. Blanche detained him.

"You haven't told me one thing yet," she said. "Whoever the man may be, is Anne married to him?"

"Whoever the man may be," returned Sir Patrick, "he had better not attempt to marry Anne Silvester."

So the niece unconsciously put the question, and so the uncle unconsciously gave the answer, on which depended the whole happiness of Blanche's life to come. The "man!" How lightly they talked of the "man!" Would nothing happen to rouse the faintest suspicion—in their minds or in Arnold's mind—that Arnold was the "man" himself?

"You mean that she is married?" said Blanche.

"I don't go as far as that."

"You mean she is not married?"

"I don't go so far as that."

"Oh! the liver!"

"Precisely, isn't it, my dear? I can tell you, professionally, that (in my opinion) she has grounds to go on if she claims to be the man's wife. That is what I mean by my answer; and, until we know more, that is all I can say."

"When shall we know more? When shall we get the telegram?"

"Not for some hours yet. Come, and learn to play whist."

I think I would rather talk to Arnold, uncle, if you don't object."

"By all means! But don't talk to him about what I have been telling you to-night. He and Mr. Delamayn are friends, remember; and he might blunder into telling his friend what his friend had better not hear. (Play, sir!) Let me to be instilling these lessons of duplicity into the youthful mind!" A wise person once said that Satan is the father of all lies and deceit. That wise person, my dear, had me in his eye, and was perfectly right.

He mitigated the pain of that confession with a pinch of snuff, and went to the whist-table to play until the end of the rubber gave him a place at the game.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIFTH.

FORWARD.

Blanche found her lover as attentive as usual to her slightest wishes, but in the highest degree good spirits. He pleaded fatigue, after his long watch at the cross-roads, as an excuse for his declining to sit up long on the night of the reconciliation with Geoffrey. He was unwilling to let Blanche suffer a moment longer than was necessary. The hope grew fainter and fainter as the evening advanced. Arnold purposely suggested a visit to the billiard-room, and joined the game with Blanche, to give Geoffrey an opportunity of saying the few words required. Geoffrey could not make them friends again. Geoffrey never spoke the words; he obstinately ignored Arnold's presence in the billiard-room.

At the card-table the whist went on interminably. Lady Lundie, Sir Patrick, and the surgeon, were all inveterate players, every matched. Smith and Jones (joining the game alternately) were not much worse. Arnold was very much to conversation. The same safe and modest superiority of judgment which marked the workings of these two gentlemen in all the affairs of life.

The time wore on to midnight. They went to bed late and they went to bed early in that house. Under that hospitable roof, no intrusive hints, in the form of bells, were ever sounded. Servants themselves with ostentatious virtue on side-tables, hurried the guest to his room; no vile bell rang, to disturb the repose of the whole household, and insisted on his breakfasting at a given hour. Life has many disagreeable things to answer for—table, without gratuitously adding the hardship of absolute government, administered by a clock.

It was quarter past two when Lady Lundie rose blandly from the whist-table, and said that the surgeon's telegram was the only possible pile of going to bed. Sir Patrick and Smith, the surgeon and Jones, agreed on a last rubber. Blanche contrived to meet Arnold's eye—eye was on her; and appeared again in the drawing-room, with Lady Lundie, when the last rubber was finished. Nobody followed the example of the mistress of the house but Arnold. He left the billiard-room with the certainty that it was all over now between Geoffrey and himself. Not even the attraction of Blanche proved strong enough to detain him that night. He went his way to bed.

It was past one o'clock. The final rubber was at an end; the accounts were settled at the card-table; the principal personages in the drawing-room, and Smith and Jones had followed him, when Duncan came in, at last, with the telegram in his hand.

Blanche turned from the broad, calm autumn moonlight which had drawn her to the window, and looked over her uncle's shoulder while he opened the telegram.

She read the first line—and that was enough. The whole scaffolding of hope built round that message fell to the ground in an instant. The train from Kirkandrew had reached Edinburgh at the usual time. Every passenger in it had passed under the eyes of the police; and nothing had been seen of any person who answered the description given of Anne!

Sir Patrick pointed to the two last sentences in the telegram: "Inquiries telegraphed to Falkirk. If with any result, you shall know."

We "must wait for the best, Blanche. They evidently suspect her of having got out at the junction of the two railways for the purpose of giving the telegraph the slip. There is no help for it. Go to bed, child—go to bed."

Blanche kissed her uncle in silence and went away. The bright young face was and with the first hopeless sorrow which the old man had yet seen in it. Her sunny, purring look down dejectedly on his mind when he was up in his room, with the faithful Duncan growling him ready for his bed.

"This is a bad business, Duncan. I don't like to say so to Miss Londie; but I greatly fear the governess has baffled us."

"I seem to suspect Patrick. The poor young lady looks quite heart-broken about it."

"You noticed that too, did you? She has lived all her young days, you see, with Miss Silvester, and there is a very strong attachment between them. I cannot answer, my niece, Duncan. I am afraid this disappointment will have a serious effect on her."

"Indeed, Sir Patrick."

"Yes, my friend, she's young: but the young (when they don't get over any thing) have warm hearts. Winter hasn't stolen on them, Duncan! And time don't keep it."

"I think there's reason to hope, Sir, that Miss Londie may get over it more easily than you suppose."

"What reason, pray?"

"A person in my position can hardly venture to speak positively on a delicate matter of that kind."

Sir Patrick's temper flashed out, half-seriously, half-winsically, as usual.

"Is that a snap at Mo, you old dog? If I am not very much mistaken, your master, who is I Am 2 in the habit of keeping any of my harmless fellow-creatures at a distance? I despise the rant of modern Liberalism; but it's not the less true that I have, all my life, protested against the unconstitutional system of classes in England. We have, in that respect, brag as we may of our national freedom, the most unchristian people in the civilized world."

"I beg your pardon, Sir Patrick—"

"Can't you let me have a little politics at this time of night? It's your fault, Duncan. What's the good been having my stories in my house, because I can't put my night-cap on comfortably till you have brushed my hair? I have a good mind to get rid of you, Duncan. There! there! I'm uneasy about my niece—nervous irritability, my good fellow, that's all. Anything more that you have to say about Miss Londie. And go out with my hair. And don't be a humbug."

"I was going to say, Sir Patrick, that Miss Londie has another interest in her life than to—"

"Than to what, in the name of Miss Silvester ends finally—and I own it begins to look that way—"

"I should hurry my niece's marriage, Sir, and set it their wandering days at rest."

Sir Patrick started under the gentle discipline of the hair-brush. Duncan's hand—

"That's very sensibly put," said the old gentleman. "Duncan! you are, what I call, a well-minded person. Have you thinking of, old Tregenny! If the worst comes to the worst, will you undertake it?"

It was not the first time that Duncan's steady good sense had struck light, under the form of a practical hint, on his master's mind. In this power had he wrought such mischief as the mischief which he had innocently done now. He had sent Sir Patrick on the fatal idea of hurrying and ensuring the marriage of Arnold and Blanche.

"Duncan!" said Sir Patrick, suddenly—now that Anne had apparently obliterated all trace of herself—becoming serious. The one chance on which the discovery of Arnold's position depended, was the chance that accident might reveal the truth in the lapse of time. In this power of circumstances, Sir Patrick now resolved—"if nothing happened to relieve Blanche's anxiety in the course of the week—to advance the celebration of the marriage from the end of the month to the end of the week next ensuing. He then fortnight of the ensuing month. As dates then stood, the change led (so far as free scope for the development of events was concerned) to this serious result. It abridged a lapse of three months into an interval of three weeks.

The next morning came; and Blanche sparked it in a breakfast-meeting, by complaining of the act of impudence, which struck away one more chance of discovering Anne's retreat. Arnold, before the arrival of the Edinburgh telegram on the previous day.

She had passed a sleepless night: fevered in mind and body; thinking, hour after hour, of Anne Silvester. She got up, determined that she let Geoffrey leave the house without risking an other interview with him, and without hearing Anne. It was nothing less than downright treason to Sir Patrick to act on her own responsibility in this way. But what was Blanche to do? She was heartily ashamed of herself for doing it. But the demon that possesses women with a recklessness all their own, at the critical moments of their lives, had got her—and she did it.

Geoffrey had arranged, overnight, to breakfast early, by himself, and to walk the ten miles to his brother's house; sending a servant to fetch his luggage later in the day.

He had got on his hat; he was standing in the hall, with his pocket-book and second self, the pipe—when Blanche suddenly appeared from the morning-room, and placed herself between him and the house door.

"Up early—eh?" said Geoffrey. "I'm off to my brother's."

She made no reply. He looked at her closer. The girl's eyes were trying to read his face, with an utter carelessness of concealment, which forbade (even to his mind) all unworthy interpretation of her motive for stopping him on his way out.

"Any commands for me?" he inquired.

This time she answered him. "I have something to ask you," she said.

He smiled graciously, and opened his tobacco-pouch. He was fat and strong after his night's sleep—healthy and handsome and good-humored. The house-maid had had a peep at him that morning, and had wished—like Desdemona, with a difference—that "Heaven had made all three of them such a man!"

"Well," he said, "what is it?"

She put her question, with a single word of preface—purposely to surprise him.

"Mr. Delamayn," she said, "do you know where Anne Silvester is this morning?"

He was filling his pipe as she spoke, and he dropped some of the tobacco on the floor. Instead of answering before he picked up the tobacco he answered after—in surly self-possession, and in one word—"No."

"Do you know nothing about her?"

He looked himself doggedly to the filling of his pipe. "Nothing."

"On your word of honor, as a gentleman?"

On my word of honor, as a gentleman."

He put back his tobacco-pouch in his pocket. His handkerchief was in the same pocket. His clear blue eyes defied all the girls in England put together to see into his mind. "Have you done, Miss Londie?" he asked, suddenly developing a hardening politeness of tone and manner.

Blanche saw that it was time—now that she had compromised her own interests by her own headlong act. Sir Patrick's warning words came back irresistibly to her mind. It was not too late. "We commit a serious mistake if we lose him on his guard at starting."

There was but one course to take now. "Yes," she said. "I have done."

"My name, you remember, Geoffrey. "You want to know where Miss Silvester is. Why don't you ask her?"

Blanche did all that could be done toward repairing the error that she had committed. She kept Geoffrey as far away as Geoffrey had kept her from the truth.

"I happen to know," she replied, "that Miss Silvester left the place at which she had been staying about the time when you went out walking yesterday. And I thought you might have seen her."

"That's the reason—is it?" said Geoffrey, with a smile.

She smile stung Blanche's sensitive temper to the quick. She made a fierce effort to control herself, before her indignation got the better of her.

"I have no more to say, Mr. Delamayn." With that reply she turned her back on him, and closed the door of the morning-room between them.

Geoffrey descended the house-steps and lit his pipe. He was not at all displeased, on this occasion, to account for what had happened. He assumed at once that Arnold had taken a mean revenge on him after his conduct of the day before, and had told the whole secret of his journal at Craig Fevvie to Blanche. The thing could get next, no doubt, to Sir Patrick's ears; and Sir Patrick would thereupon be probably the first person who revealed to Arnold the position in which he had placed himself with Anne. All right! Sir Patrick would be an excellent witness to appeal to, when the scandal broke out, and when the time came for repudiating Anne's claim to be received in respectable society as a woman who was married already to another man. He finished drawing contentedly at his pipe, and started, at his swinging, steady pace, for his brother's house.

Blanche remained alone in the morning-room. The prospect of getting at the truth, by means of what Geoffrey might let fall, was closed to her when he consulted Sir Patrick, was a prospect that she herself had closed from that moment. She had no choice now but to wait. She had commanded a view of the little side-terrace which had always been the favorite walk of Geoffrey, in his weary eyes and aching heart the poor child looked at the familiar place; and asked herself, with the bitter repentance that comes too late, if she had destroyed the last chance of finding Anne!

She sat passive, for the remainder of the hours of the morning wore on, until the postman came. Before the servant could take the letters from his hand, she was on her feet.

It possible to hope that the bag had brought tidings of Anne—the second letter, at last, which had suddenly on a letter to herself. It bore the Kirkandrew post-mark, and it was addressed to her in Anne's handwriting.

She tore the letter open, and read these lines:

"I have left you—and I am glad of it. Search and reward you! God make you a happy woman in all your life to come! Cruel as you will think me, I am kinder to you than you deserve. Never tell you more. Forgive me, and forget me. Our lives are parted lives from this day."

Going down to breakfast about his usual hour, Sir Patrick missed Blanche, whom he was accustomed to see waiting for him at the table at that time. The room was empty; the other members of the household having all finished their morning meal. Sir Patrick disliked breakfasting alone. He sent Duncan with a message, to be given to Blanche's maid.

The maid appeared in due time. Miss Lindie was unable to leave her room. She sent a letter to her uncle, with her love—and begged he would read it.

Sir Patrick opened the letter and saw what Anne had written to Blanche.

He waited a little, reflecting, with evident pain and anxiety, on what he had read—then opened his own letters, and hurriedly looked at the signatures. There was nothing for him from his friend, the sheriff, at Edinburgh, and no communication from the railway in the shape of a telegram. He had decided, overnight, on waiting till the end of the week before he interfered in the matter of Blanche's marriage. In the events of the morning determined him on not waiting another day. A servant returned to the breakfast-room to pour out his master's coffee. Sir Patrick sent him away again with a second message.

"Do you know where Lady Lundie is, Duncan?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"My compliments to her ladyship. If she is not otherwise engaged, I shall be glad to speak to her privately in an hour's time."

CONVENT AT ROME.

ON page 148 will be found an engraving of the celebrated Carthusian Convent at Itome, in which it is intended to hold the Exhibition of Catholic Art and Industry. The convent was founded on the site of Diocletian's Baths, and the great circular, which is to be appropriated for the purposes of the Exhibition, will be roofed over with glass, and arranged in alleys or passages for the display of the various treasures, consisting of altar ornaments in gold and silver, sculpture, painting, embroidery, mosaic, ivory carving, printing, binding, robes, lace, and indeed all things relating to churches or church decoration. Our engraving represents some of the smaller cloisters of the convent, in that part of the building to which the monks will be confined during the time of the Exhibition, although, doubtless, the curiosity to which all men are subject, added to the opportunity offered, will draw many of them from their seclusion to see how the world of art has advanced since they left the active ways of men. A convent is apparently an inappropriate place for a priestly gravefriend to use for exhibition purposes; but when the sacred character of the Exhibition is taken into account this incongruity disappears; moreover, it will be so arranged that monkish privacy will not be intruded upon by the visitors.

THE YOUNG SCULPTOR.

IN one of the poorest, narrowest streets of a beautiful Roman city lived a young man, and her little son, whom we will call Henri. The boy had no recollection of his father, who had carefully deserted both his wife and child. Their only means of subsistence was what could be obtained by the woman's labor—such household work as could be obtained in the dwellings of the rich. Sometimes she had to walk long distances to and from her employers, and as no murmur ever escaped her lips, save one of regret that her little fair-haired boy had to be left alone in her absence, and that she could not earn money enough to send him to school. Nature, however, had moulded, was teaching him without the help of books or masters, and every where in Florence (the city of flowers) there was more than sufficient to excite the admiration and satisfy the cravings of this child of genius, whose inquiring eyes would always rest on whatever was beautiful, and such was to be met with in every nook and corner of the grand old place. The "pupils and imaginations" of which flooded the whole city at eventide, and lit up the gorgeous palaces and churches that now do him so many glowing pictures, on which his poetical imagination dwelt long after the first impression had passed away.

During his mother's absence, the greater part of his time was spent in the street, which cost grubbing in the street gutters, making odd-looking things of any soft material he could shape to the needful consistency, just as one sees children making sand-houses at the sea-side. These little productions he would set up and admire with their buildings: Henri did nothing of the sort. Every one of those little images was moulded into some copied either from statue or picture, for in that beautiful city every street is a museum. Projections, bosses, lions, all are monuments of real architectural beauty, of a peculiar and distinctive type. For a long time the young boy continued to fashion objects of that sort, until, by a kind of fresh inspiration, he aimed at representing a human figure: the child's instinct seemed to be how to obtain the models from which to work.

At length, a happy thought occurred to him. He had no money, but he could easily reward the sitter by giving him his next meal, or to lose that was as nothing compared to the joy he felt at having some chance Arab who would answer his purpose, who could be induced by no small a gratuity to be the artist's humble studio. In spite of his mother's remonstrances, Henri worked away early and late, every day becoming more passionately attached to his beloved art.

Years sped on without any public recognition of his talent; but his resolute, persevering nature would not allow him to be discouraged. It is true that he was poor; but then he was rich in hope, and sustained by the consciousness of that inward power which is the accompaniment of real genius. He never thought of envying others, but thought only of making himself perfect in what he determined should be the masterpiece of all his hitherto attempted studies; one which was now growing to ample proportions beneath his busy fingers.

At length, his task, or rather labor of love, being complete, he told his mother that he should ask permission to show it at an exhibition of sculpture which was shortly to take place on his native city. He applied for permission, and his request was granted, on condition that the statue should be sent forthwith to the hall of inspection.

"That, gentlemen, is impossible," replied Henri. "I am very poor; and the apartment in which I live is so small that my work could only be removed by taking off the roof."

The men looked at each other in amazement; but there was no mean suspicion or baseness in the youth, that after conferring together for a few moments, they left the young enthusiast at home, to see the marvelous production to which Henri at present declined to give any name. They followed him up the narrow staircase to the little garret, and looked around in vain for the wonder that had been spoken of. They had seen their surprise, and without a word, threw back a baize curtain from the floor, and revealed to them the largest life-size, yet ideal statue ever seen. The gentlemen started back in amazement. So lovely, so divine, His Tamarindo and Lucia Sequsta face, so faultless in form, so wondrously expressive of purity and innocence, that they could not believe it the work of an untutored youth, entirely devoid of art-education, and of the laws of anatomy, which the most critical of modern sculptors could not improve on the figure before them. No: they would not credit it, and screwed their faces into the most anxious inquiries in some terrible crime, for which the victim had served as a model. It was in vain that the young sculptor protested, with tears, his utter innocence, and declared he should be sent to prison, and there await the trial for the murder perpetrated against him. They further desired him at once to name the counsel for his defense. "If he shall appear, perhaps," said the chief of trio, "I can not give his name before."

The young man looked at the calmness and self-possession displayed by Henri, they felt compelled to acquiesce. Either his youth, his beauty, or his astonishing talent, or all three combined—made the judges so far mitigate their sentence as to allow Henri to finish his work, provided the admission of visitors during his imprisonment.

It is needless to dwell on the disappointment to the youth at this terrible blow to his long-cherished hopes—nearly less on the score of account than on that of his good mother, whom he had hoped to piece beyond the need of all further exertion. It was the work of a moment for the read-er to learn that he did not yield himself up to despair. His will was nerved to plan, he tried to devise another subject on which to set superior to the one he had already achieved.

It will readily be understood that the advent of such a trial as that now impending caused no small stir in the city. The hitherto obscure life of the young artist had been known, and he had made about his counsel, very considerably enhanced the anxiety and curiosity of the public. Among these was two distinguished-looking strangers, who chanced to be visiting or sojourning in Florence. One was considerably past middle age; the other (said to be his nephew) was a young man of remarkably handsome countenance and noble figure. No restriction seemed to restrict either of the strangers from the exercise of visits; while to poor Henri, the time thus spent was as gold and sunshine in this otherwise dark period of his life. Greatly to the astonishment of every one, his mother had removed to a handsomer house at the commencement of the year sadness of heart and countenance seemed to have vanished; and there was a gladness in her whole bearing that was the cause of wonder to her had ever before seen. "It is a great mystery, certainly," said the gossips, "that Henri should have such a mother, and about before her son's fate is decided."

At length the all-important day arrived. The judges (who had never seen the prisoner since the day of its arrest) being assembled in the hall of the Academy, desired the prisoner might be brought in. The prone figure was placed on the floor, and covered from head to foot with the cloth of green baize; while at its side, but considerably raised, was another, also covered, which appeared to be the one put as to what cannot he had employed.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am my own counsel. You questioned my ability to give you a representation of 'Death;' here is one of 'Life.' The subject is 'The Resurrection' of Abel by his Brother Cain."

Both coverings were withdrawn. Profound stillness succeeded this declaration, followed by a burst of admiration such as had never before been heard in Florence at any exhibition of artistic talent. Not a dissenting voice was heard to the king, who commanded the statues to be bought, and placed in the Pitti Palace.

It is not possible, gentlemen, for me to other the command of my sovereign," said Henri: "the sculptures are already ordered and have been purchased by the Emperor of Russia. The money I have had for them has paid for my mother's annuity, and placed me forever beyond the reach of want."

The nephew of the Russian embassador, Kisseleff, had served as a model for the arm of "Cain," and those to whom his features were familiar at once recognized the handsome face.

The narrator of this circumstance has seen the statues of "Life" and "Death," which are expressly erected for their reception. The sculptor's name was Dupré, since become one of world-wide celebrity.

THE DARIEN EXPEDITION.

TOWARD the end of last January an expedition, consisting of the gun-boats Wyoming and Guard, each about five hundred tons burden, carrying two 9-inch brondside guns, one 11-inch pivot gun amidships, and a 60-pound rifle, sailed from New York harbor, under command of Commander THOMAS O. SELFRIDGE, U.S.N., for the purpose of co-operating with the government of the Republic of Colombia in the work of ascertaining the most practicable route in the Central Sierras present facilities for the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, by means of which the "abolishing" the Isthmus is almost as old as the discovery of the New World, having been first started by CORTEZ soon after the conquest of Mexico. Since his time no less than twenty-six canals have been projected and partly worked upon by all that unites North and South America, nine of which have engaged the serious attention of scientific men and capitalists. These are as follows: By way of Rio San Carlos and the Gulf de Nicoya; Rio Nuflo, Nicaragua, and Gulf de Nicoya; Rio Sapoa and Bay of Salinas; Rio San Juan del Sur; Rio Frio, Rio Tamarindo and Lake de Nicaragua; Rialjo and Lake Managuas; Bay of Fonseca and Lake Managuas; and the Atrato River, Darien province.

About ten years ago Mr. FREDERICK M. KELLEY published a work, by which the brothers BROTHERS, a pamphlet containing the result of a survey of the Atrato River, flowing southward from the Gulf of Darien, by which the author believed he had proved the possibility of constructing a canal across the Isthmus, from ocean to ocean, without locks. This was to be secured as follows: By deepening and guarding one of the mouths of the Atrato; by using the natural and deep waters of that stream; by deepening and guarding the mouth of the Napipi, its confluence with the Atrato, and turning to account the bed of that river when deepened to a common mean size of 20 feet, by a cut through the valley of the Neyaga for 15 miles; by a tunnel of 1,000 yards; by 100, through solid rock; and by turning to account the valley of a small stream which empties, at a distance of eight miles from the mouth, into Humboldt Bay.

This route has recently attracted the notice of the Colombian republic, and the expedition which has sailed under command of Commander SELFRIDGE is designed to make further and more complete surveys of it.

Commander SELFRIDGE, whose portrait we give on page 149, entered the Naval Academy in 1842, at the age of fifteen, graduating therefrom at the head of an advanced class in the year 1854, three years after his entrance. He served as midshipman in the Independence, on the Pacific station, and after graduation Commander was appointed lieutenant of the Vincennes, in which he made a cruise on the coast of Africa. In 1861 he was promoted to a Lieutenant, and soon after was ordered to the Cumberland, participating in the first struggle of the war at Fort Pickens, Norfolk, Virginia. He commanded the forcestile division of the same name in the battle of Hatteras Inlet, on the forward main deck division in the memorable fight between the Cumberland and Merrimac. Shortly after this struggle he was attached to the staff of Rear-Admiral GOLDSBOROUGH, commanding the North Atlantic blockading squadron of several months, during which time he was engaged as senior officer in several hazardous and important expeditions, at night, to destroy cannon captured by the rebels from the United States Navy-yard. He subsequently served with great credit on the Mississippi and Red River, and in the North Atlantic squadron under Vice-Admiral FARRAGUT. At the bombardment of Fort Fisher he commanded the Huron, and led a division of boats in the assault on the fort.

After the close of the war, Commander SELFRIDGE served in the naval practice squadron, and was for three years on ordnance until appointed to the command of the Darien Exploring Expedition.

JUDGE J. J. WRIGHT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE Honorable J. J. WRIGHT, recently elected a Judge of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, whose portrait we give on page 149, was born in Charleston, Pennsylvania, and is now about thirty-one years of age. When he was about six years old his parents removed to Monroe, Lenawee county, in the State of Michigan, where for several years he attended the district school during the winter months, working for the neighboring farmers the rest of the year. Having saved up a small sum of money, he entered Kalamazoo University, at Kalamazoo, in New York State; and after a thorough course of study graduated from that college where his parents resided, and entered the office of a law firm, where he read law for two years, supporting himself by teaching. He subsequently entered the office of Judge COLLINS, in Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, with whom he read law for another year. Feeling himself qualified for the legal profession, he now applied for admission to the bar, but was met with the existing prejudice against colored men that the Committee refused to examine him.

In April, 1865, he was sent by the American Missionary Society to Beaufort, South Carolina, as a teacher and laborer among the freedmen. He remained in Beaufort until after the Civil Rights Bill had passed, when he returned to Montrose, Pennsylvania, and demanded an examination. The Committee found him qualified, and recommended his admission to the Bar. He was admitted August 18, 1866, being the first and only colored man ever admitted to practice law in Pennsylvania. In April, 1866, he was appointed by Generl O. O. Howard legal adviser for the freedmen in Beaufort, and held in that capacity until he was elected to the Constitutional Convention of South Carolina. He was soon afterward elected Senator from the county of Beaufort, and acted as such until February 1, 1870, when he was elected to the Supreme Bench of the State, and immediately entered upon the discharge of his duties as Judge.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE Hon. WENDELL PHILLIPS, having been appointed United States Minister to Timbuctoo, declines. He says he "abolishing" the Indians is almost as old as the discovery of the New World, having been first started by CORTEZ soon after the conquest of Mexico. Since his time no less than twenty-six canals have been projected and partly worked upon by all that unites North and South America, nine of which have engaged the serious attention of scientific men and capitalists. These are as follows: By way of Rio San Carlos and the Gulf de Nicoya; Rio Nuflo, Nicaragua, and Gulf de Nicoya; Rio Sapoa and Bay of Salinas; Rio San Juan del Sur; Rio Frio, Rio Tamarindo and Lake de Nicaragua; Rialjo and Lake Managuas; Bay of Fonseca and Lake Managuas; and the Atrato River, Darien province.

A City Hall official, on being asked by a stranger if he was Oaky Hall, replied, "No, Sir; I'm an Attorney General."

The following admonition was addressed by a Quaker to a man who was pouring forth a volley of imprecations: "Friend, what is there in care, friend, thou must run thy face against my fist."

"My boy, what does your mother do for a living?" said a little hardcored statist. "She eats cold victuals, Sir."

The speaker who was "drawn out" measured eighteen inches from ear to ear.

If you want cowslips in winter drive your cattle on ice.

A lady who, though in the autumn of life, had not lost the romance of its spring, said to a friend: "I can not imagine what makes my hair turn gray. I remember when it was black as the raven's wing, and I used to be told it was the habit of weeping that made me gray. Do you think?" "I should be afraid, Madam," replied the cautious friend dreamed, dryly, "that is the essence of thyme."

Pickpockets die-pare a crowd.

The man who don't advertise has his store hung around with shingles and pieces of barrel-heads, inscribed with lamplblack, "Rich Peraters," "Korn Whisky," "Sugar," and all kinds of business, and "Kalkes and Kandies for sail here." He says: "There is no use in this newspaper advertising, as a man is smart enough to tend to his own business, and to stand at the door and holler the finest in it."

A Minnesota juror lately addressed a note to the judge, in which he styled him "Onorable jug." Whether he was fined for his cheek or juror was seized right than might seem at first glance.

In a game of cards a good deal depends on good playing, and good playing on good luck.

An incorporated society hired a man to blast a rock, says Mark Twain, and he was punching powder into a hole with a crow-bar, when a premature explosion followed, sending the man and crow-bar out of sight. Both came down all right, and the man went to work again directly. But though he was gone only fifteen minutes they docked him for it.

"Didn't you guarantee, Sir, that this horse would not shy before the fire of an enemy?" "No more he does, Sir." "Then I'll offer him that he shies."

Why are pimples on a drunkard's face like the cuts in a witty London newspaper?—They are illustrations of Punch.

A milkman accosted for the weakness of his milk by saying that the cows got into the Pond.

A MODEL SENSIBLE OPERATION.—To take the check out of a young man, and the jaw out of a woman.

Which is the worst enemy of society—the family that keeps a parrot, or the one whose son is learning to play the bugle?

A Cincinnati woman, in destitute circumstances, has given about every thing but her name to the pawnbroker. With a note saying, she would like a little cash, with high tops, since her daughter wore short dresses.

An old lady receiving a letter she supposed was from one of her sons, requested her daughter to read it. He accordingly began to read: "Dear Mother, I am in prison, and have nothing more to tell you." "It's from Johnny," exclaimed the old lady; "is he always in that house?"

If you can't coax a fish to bite, try your persuasive powers on a cross dog, and you will be sure to succeed.

Who is the most liberal man?—The grocer; he gives almost every thing he has to customers.

A boy eight years old, in one of our public schools, having been told that a reptile "is an animal that creeps," was subsequently examined on the subject, duly, promptly and triumphantly replied, "a baby."

A young lady from a boarding-school having made some improvement in her writing, was asked by a few words to an organ-grinder in her parent account, but declined, and in reciting the following response: "I no speak Inglis."

The fact that Jenny Lind can no longer sing as she used once, is reasonably accounted for by the statement that her little daughter has "inherited her mother's voice."

A few days before Christmas a little Jewish boy said to his mother, "Mamma, what is Christmas?" "Why, my son, it is the day on Saturday in your Sabbath." "Oh, I know," said the boy, "and what is it meant to do with Christmas?" Sow (sobbing). "I don't know—why—the Christians—should—have—all—the—fun."

There is nothing like adversity to bring a man out of his shell and elbows.

"Mother," said Jemima, "Sam wants to come courting me to-night." "Well, what did you tell him?" "Oh, I told him he might come. I felt anxious to see how he would act."

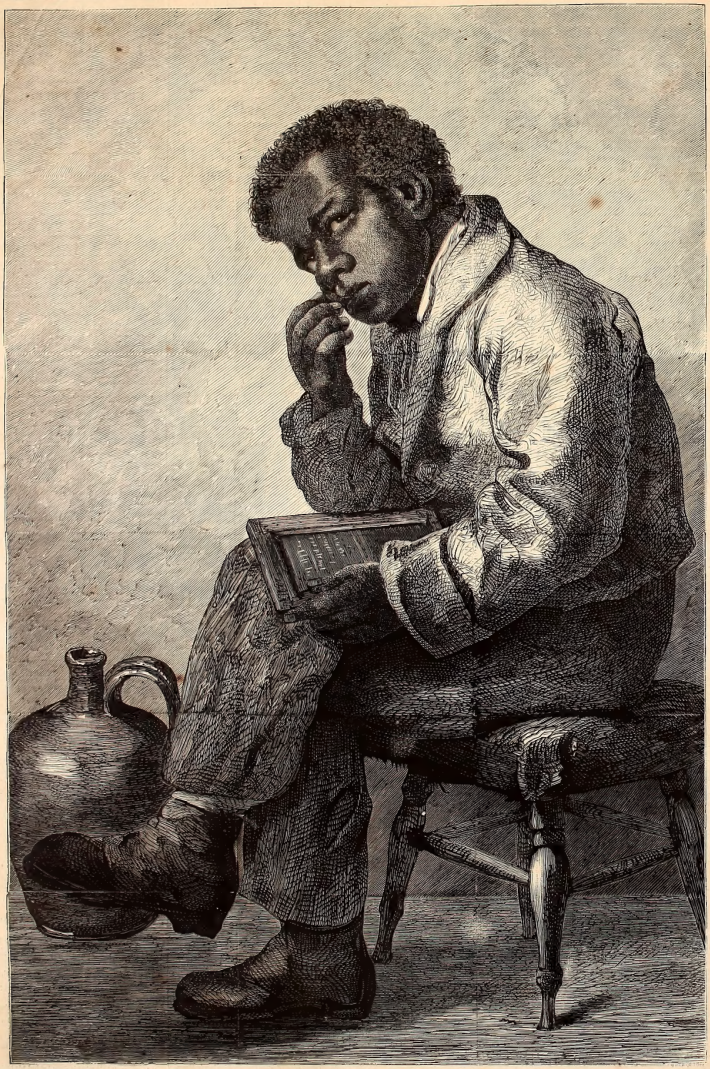
A poor man is to be avoided—he lacks principle.

What portions of the body are the best travelers?—The forearms.

"That's a pretty bird, grandma," said a little boy. "Yes," replied the old dame, "and he never cries." "That's because he's never washed," rejoined the youngster.

"You are a schoolmaster!" said a magistrate the other day, addressing the man at the bar. "Yes, Sir," was the reply, "a horse schoolmaster."

"A man can't help what is done behind his back," as the tramp said when he was kicked out of doors.



"A BROWN STUDY."—BY THE LATE WILLIAM HUNT.—[SEE PAGE 155.]

RUPERT'S LAND.

OUR first Engraving on page 148 gives a view of the plains near Pembina, in the Red River country, with the boundary post erected there to mark the frontier between the United States and the British territory of Rupert's Land, where the French and Indian half-breed population recently attempted to inaugurate a revolution against the British authorities. The rich prairie is here traversed by a narrow road, which appears in the fore-ground. The sketch also furnishes an illustration of the habits and costumes of the Cree Indians of Rupert's Land. These are represented as walking in procession, headed by the Medicine Man, with the sacred rattle in hand, round an inclosure of willow branches, within which is celebrated a "Dog Feast," so called from their eating dog-meat on the occasion, and being a mixture of religious ceremony and social mirth. In the half-distance are their tents, made of dressed buffalo leather, with their lodges or armorial bearings painted upon them. Beside these stand their carts, made without a particle of iron, and which are very strong, and so light as to be serviceable as rafts when deep water has to be crossed. In the fore-ground is a group of two young Indians in their gala costume, with their dogs, which in winter are used to drag sledges.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

BACKWARD.

"WELL?" whispered Blanche, taking her uncle confidentially by the arm.

"Well," said Sir Patrick, with a spark of his satirical humor flashing out at his niece, "I am going to do a very rash thing. I am going to place a serious trust in the hands of a girl of eighteen."

"The girl's hands will keep it, uncle—though she is only eighteen."

"I must run the risk, my dear: your intimate knowledge of Miss Silvester may be of the greatest assistance to me in the next step I take. You shall know all that I can tell you, but I must warn you first. I can only admit you into my confidence by startling you with a great surprise. Do you follow me, so far?"

"Yes; yes!"

"If you fail to control yourself, you place an obstacle in the way of my being of some future use to Miss Silvester. Remember that, and now prepare for the surprise. What did I tell you before dinner?"

"You said you had made discoveries at Craig Fernie. What have you found out?"

"I have found out that there is a certain person who is in full possession of the information which Miss Silvester has concealed from you and from me. The person is within our reach. The person is in this room!"

He caught up Blanche's hand, resting on his arm, and pressed it significantly. She looked at him with the cry of surprise suspended on her lips—waited a little with her eyes fixed on Sir Patrick's face—struggled resolutely, and composed herself.

"Point the person out." She said the words with a self-possession which won her uncle's hearty approval. Blanche had done wonders for a girl in her teens.

"Look!" said Sir Patrick; "and tell me what you see."

"I see Lady Lundie, at the other end of the room, with the map of Perthshire and the Baronial Antiquities of Scotland on the table. And I see every body but you and me obliged to listen to her."

"Every body?"

Blanche looked carefully round the room, and noticed Geoffrey in the opposite corner; fast asleep by this time in his arm-chair.

"Uncle! you don't mean—?"

"There is the man."

"Mr. Delamayn—?"

"Mr. Delamayn knows every thing."

Blanche held mechanically by her uncle's arm, and looked at the sleeping man as if her eyes could never see enough of him.

"You saw me in the library in private consultation with Mr. Delamayn," resumed Sir Patrick. "I have to acknowledge, my dear, that you were quite right in thinking this a suspicious circumstance. And I am now to justify myself for having purposely kept you in the dark up to the present time."

"DO YOU KNOW WHERE ANNE SILVESTER IS THIS MORNING?"

With those introductory words, she briefly reverted to the earlier occurrences of the day, and then added, by way of commentary, a statement of the conclusions which events had suggested to his own mind.

The events, it must be remembered, were three in number. First, Geoffrey's private conference with Sir Patrick on the subject of Irregular Marriages in Scotland. Secondly, Anne Silvester's appearance at Windygates. Thirdly, Anne's flight.

The conclusions which had thereupon suggested themselves to Sir Patrick's mind were six in number.

First, that a connection of some sort might possibly exist between Geoffrey's acknowledged difficulty about his friend, and Miss Silvester's presumed difficulty about herself. Secondly, that Geoffrey had really put to Sir Patrick—not his own case—but the case of a friend. Thirdly, that Geoffrey had some interest (of no harmless kind) in establishing the fact of his friend's marriage. Fourthly, that Anne's anxiety (as described by Blanche) to hear the names of the gentlemen who were staying at Windygates, pointed, in all probability, to Geoffrey. Fifthly, that this last inference disturbed the second conclusion, and reopened the doubt whether Geoffrey had not been stating his own case, after all, under pretense of stating the case of a friend. Sixthly, that the one way of obtaining any enlightenment on this point, and on all the other points involved in mystery, was to go to Craig Fernie, and consult Mrs. Inchbare's experience during the period of Anne's residence at the inn. Sir Patrick's apology for keeping all this a secret from his niece followed. He had shrunk from agitating her on the subject until he could be sure of proving his suspicions to be true. The proof had now been obtained; and his mind had been opened to Blanche without reserve.

"So much, my dear," proceeded Sir Patrick, "for those necessary explanations which are also the necessary nuisances of human intercourse. You now know as much as I did when I arrived at Craig Fernie—and you are, therefore, in a position to appreciate the value of my discoveries at the inn. Do you understand every thing, so far?"

"Perfectly."

"Very good. I drove up to the inn; and—behold! me closeted with Mrs. Inchbare in her own private parlor! (My reputation may or may not suffer, but Mrs. Inchbare's bones are above suspicion.) It was a long business, Blanche. A most sour-tempered, cunning, and distrustful witness I never examined in all my experience at the Bar. She would have upset the temper of any mortal man but a lawyer. We have such wonderful tempers in our profession; and we can be so aggravating when we like! In short, my dear, Mrs. Inchbare was a she-cat, and I was a he-cat—and I clawed the truth out of her at last. The result was well worth arriving at, as you shall see. Mr. Delamayn had described to me certain remarkable circumstances as taking place between a lady and a gentleman at an inn: the object of the parties being to pass themselves off at the time as man and wife. Every one of those circumstances, Blanche, occurred at Craig Fernie, between a lady and a gentleman, on the day when Miss Silvester disappeared from this house. And—wait!—being pressed for her name, after the gentleman had left her behind him at the inn, the name the lady gave was, 'Mrs. Silvester.' What do you think of that?"

"Think! I'm bewildered—I can't realize it."

"It's a startling discovery, my dear child—there is no denying that. Shall I wait a little, and let you recover yourself?"

"No! no! Go on! The gentleman, uncle? The gentleman who was with Anne? Who is he? Not Mr. Delamayn?"

"Not Mr. Delamayn," said Sir Patrick. "If I have proved nothing else, I have proved that."

"What need was there to prove it? Mr. Delamayn went to London on the day of the inn-party. And Arnold—"

"And Arnold went with him as far as the second station from this. Quite true! But how was I to know what Mr. Delamayn might have done after Arnold had left him? I could only make sure that he had not gone back privately to the inn, by getting the proof from Mrs. Inchbare."

"How did you get it?"

"I asked her to describe the gentleman who was with Miss Silvester. Mrs. Inchbare's description (vague as you will presently find it to be) completely exonerates that man," said Sir Patrick, pointing to Geoffrey still asleep in his chair. "He is not the person who passed Miss Silvester off as his wife at Craig Fernie. He spoke the truth when he described the case to me as the case of a friend."

"But who is the friend?" persisted Blanche.

"That's what I want to know."

"That's what I want to know, too."

"Tell me exactly, uncle, what Mrs. Inchbare said. I have lived with Anne all my life. I must have seen the man somewhere."

"If you can identify him by Mrs. Inchbare's description," returned Sir Patrick, "you will be

COMMANDER THOMAS O. SELFRIDGE, UNITED STATES NAVY.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 151.]

HON. J. J. WRIGHT, JUDGE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY WEARN AND ELY, COLUMBIA, S.C.—[SEE PAGE 151.]

a great deal cleverer than I am. Here is the picture of the man, as painted by the landlady: Young; middle-sized; dark hair, eyes, and complexion: nice temper; pleasant way of speaking. Leave out 'young,' and the rest is the exact contrary of Mr. Delamayn. So far, Mrs. Inchbare guides us plainly enough. But how are we to apply her description to the right person? There must be, at the lowest computation, five hundred thousand men in England who are young, middle-sized, dark, good-tempered, and pleasant spoken. One of the footmen here answers that description in every particular.

"And Arnold answers it," said Blanche—as a still stronger instance of the provoking vagueness of the description.

"And Arnold answers it," repeated Sir Patrick, quite agreeing with her.

They had hardly said those words when Arnold himself appeared, approaching Sir Patrick with a pad of cards in his hand.

There—at the very moment when they had both guessed the truth, without feeling the slightest suspicion of it in their own minds—there stood Discovery, presenting itself unconsciously to eyes incapable of seeing it, in the person of the man who had passed Anne Silvester off as his own wife at the Craig Fernie inn! The mere sight of Arnold, the merciless irony of Circumstance, could go no further than this. The three had their feet on the hot iron of the mystery at that moment. And two of them were smiling at an odd coincidence; and one of them was shuffling a pack of cards!

"We have done with the Antiquities at last!" said Arnold; "and we are going to play a rubber, Sir Patrick, will you choose a card?"

"Too soon after dinner, my good fellow, for me. Play the first rubber, and then give me another chance. By-the-way," he added, "Miss Silvester has been touched by the sharpness. How is it that you never saw her go by?"

"She can't have gone my way, Sir Patrick, or I must have met her."

Having justified himself in those terms, he was recalled to the matter of the cards by the impatient partner, impatient for the cards which he had in his hand.

"What were we talking of when he interrupted us?" said Sir Patrick to Blanche.

"Of the man, uncle, who was with Miss Silvester at the inn."

"It's useless to pursue that inquiry, my dear, with nothing better than Mrs. Inchbare's description to help us."

Blanche looked round at the sleeping Geoffrey.

"And he knows!" she said. "It's maddening, uncle, to look at the brute snoring in his chair!"

Sir Patrick held up a warning hand. Before a word more could be said between them they were silenced again by another interruption.

The whist-party comprised Lady Lundie and the surgeon, playing as partners against Smith and Jones. Arnold sat behind the surgeon, taking a lesson in whist. One, two, three, rubbers, under the all-sufficing apology of "Pool." Geoffrey roused himself, and rubbed his eyes, and said, drowsily, "All right." As he rose, he looked at the opposite corner in which Sir Patrick and his nephew were sitting. Blanche's self-possession, resolutely as she struggled to preserve it, was not strong enough to keep her eyes from turning towards Geoffrey, with an expression which betrayed the reluctant interest that she now felt in him. She stopped, noticing something entirely new in the look with which the young lady was regarding him.

"Forget your partner, said Geoffrey. "Do you wish to speak to me?"

Blanche's face flushed all over. Her uncle came to the rescue.

"Miss Lundie and I hope you have slept well, Mr. Delamayn," said Sir Patrick, jocosely. "That's all."

"Oh? That's all?" said Geoffrey, still looking at Blanche. "Beg your pardon again. Fancied long walk, and heated heavy dinner. Natural consequences—nap."

Sir Patrick eyed him closely. It was plain that he had been bewildered and disturbed by Blanche's self an object of special attention on Blanche's part. "See you in the billiard-room?" he said, carelessly, and closed his conversation with her in the room—as usual, without waiting for an answer.

"Mind what you are about," said Sir Patrick to his niece. "That man is quicker than he looks. We cannot be serious inside of him, for him on his guard at starting."

"It is whispering time, uncle," said Blanche. "But think of his being in Anne's confidence, and of my being shut out of it!"

"In his friend's confidence, you mean, my dear; and (if we only avoid awakening his suspicion) there is no knowing how far you may or do something which may show us who his friend is."

"But he is going back to his brother's to-morrow—he said so at dinner-time."

"So much the better. He will be out of the way of seeing strange things in a certain young lady's face. His brother's house is within easy reach of this; and his legal adviser, with the experience tells me that he has not done consulting me yet—and that he will let out something more next time. So much for our chance of seeing the light through Mr. Delamayn—if we can't see it in my other way. And, that is not our only chance, remember. I have something to tell you about Bishopriggs and the lean letter."

"Is it found?"

"No. I satisfied myself about that—I had it searched for, under my own eye. The letter is stolen, Blanche; and Bishopriggs has got it. I have left a line for him to-night. Leave that to me. The old rascal is missed already by the visitors at the inn, just as I told you he would be. His mistress is feeling the penalty of having been fool enough to vent her ill-temper on her head-waiter. She lays the whole blame of the quarrel on Miss Silvester, of course. Bishopriggs neglected every body at the inn to wait on Miss Silvester. Bishopriggs was insolent on being remonstrated with, and Miss Silvester encouraged him—and so on. The result will be—except Miss Silvester herself—that Bishopriggs will return to Craig Fernie before the autumn is over. We are getting rid of him on his own side, my dear. Come, and learn to play whist."

He rose to join the card-players. Blanche detained him.

"You haven't told me one thing yet," she said, "Is Anne to marry Mr. Arnold, or is she married to him?"

"Whoever the man may be," returned Sir Patrick, "I am bad better not attempt to marry any body else."

So the matter unconsciously put the question, and so the uncle unconsciously gave the answer, on which depended the whole happiness of Blanche's life to come. "I am married. How slightly they both talked of the "man!" Would nothing happen to make the fatal mistake dawn in their minds or in Arnold's mind—that Arnold was the "man" himself?

"You must not go while he married?" said Blanche.

"I don't go as far as that."

"You mean that she is not married?"

"I don't go so far as that."

"Oh! the riddle!"

"Provoking, isn't it, my dear? I can tell you, positively, that in my opinion—and on the grounds to go on if she claims to be the man's wife. That is what I meant by my answer; and, mind—I say that is all I can say at present."

"When shall we know more? When shall we get the misprint?"

"Not for some hours yet. Come, and learn to play whist."

"Until I would rather talk to Arnold, uncle, if you don't mind."

"By all means! But don't talk to him about what I have been telling you to-night. He and Mr. Delamayn are old associates, remember; and he might think it his duty to his friend what his friend had better not know. Sad (isn't it?) for me to be instilling these lessons of duplicity into the youthful mind of my favorite niece," said, "The older a man gets the worse he gets.' That wise proverb is my text, but in his eye, and was perfectly right."

He instigated the pair of fast confederates by a pinch of snuff, and went to the whist-table to wait until the end of the rubber gave him a place at the game.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIFTH.

FORWARD.

BLANCHE found her self more attentive as usual to her slightest wish, but not in his customary good spirits. He pleaded fatigue, after his long march at the race-course, as an excuse for his depression. As long as there was any hope of a reconciliation with Anne, he was not disposed to tell Blanche what had happened that afternoon. The hope grew fainter and fainter as the evening advanced, and Arnold's unexplained absence a visit to the billiard-room, and joined the game, with Blanche, in the drawing-room, contented itself by saying the few gracious words which would have made them friends again. Geoffrey never spoke the words; he quietly ignored Arnold's presence in the room.

At the card-table the whist went on interminably. Lady Lundie, Sir Patrick, and the surgeon, were all inveterate players, evenly matched. Smith and Jones (neither of them particularly expert) were aids to whist, exactly as they were aids to conversation. The social ebb and flow of mediocrity of style distinguished the proceedings of these two gentlemen in all the affairs of life.

The time crept on to midnight. The rubber ended late and they rose late at Windygates House. Under that hospitable roof, no intrusive hints, in the shape of flat candlesticks, reminded the revelers with ostentatious virtue on side-tables, carried by grinning servants. The night of the autumn (as originally contemplated) to the first fortnight of the ensuing month. As dates then stood, the closing night for as free range for the development of accident was concerned) to this occasion would be abridged a large fifth months into an interval of three weeks.

The next morning came; and Blanche marked it as a memorable morning, by committing an act of imprudence, the consequences of which, of the chances of discovery that had existed, before the arrival of the Edinburgh telegram on the previous day.

She had passed a sleepless night; fevered in mind and body; thinking, hour after hour, of nothing but Anne, and of what she could endure at no longer. Her power to control herself was completely exhausted; her own impatience was to her as they pleased. She got up, determined not to let Geoffrey leave the house without risking an effort to make a reveal what he knew about Anne. It was nothing less than downright treason to Sir Patrick's plans, to take independent activity in this way. She knew it was wrong; she was heartily ashamed of herself for doing it. But the demon that possesses women with a recklessness all their own, at the critical moments of their lives, had got her—and she did it.

Geoffrey had arranged, overnight, to breakfast early, by himself, and to walk the ten miles to his brother's house; sending a servant to fetch his luggage later in the day.

He had got his task to do, he was standing in the hall, searching his pocket for his second self, the pipe—when Blanche suddenly appeared from the morning-room, and placed herself between him and the house.

"Upon—oh?" said Geoffrey. "I'm off to my brother's."

She made no reply. He looked at her closer. The girl's eyes were trying to read his face, with an utter carelessness of concealment, which found no answer in his mind; all unwonted interpretation of her motive for stopping him on his way out.

"Any commands for me?" he inquired.

This time she answered him. "I have something to ask you," she said.

He smiled graciously, and opened his tobacco-pouch. He was fresh and strong after last night's sleep—healthy and handsome and good-humored. The house-maids had had a peep at him that morning, and had said wished Miss Dunbarton was, with a difference—that "Heaven had made all three and them such a man."

"Well," he said, "what is it?"

She put her question, without a single word of preface—supposed by contrast with him.

"Mr. Delamayn," she said, "do you know where Anne Silvester is this morning?"

He was filling his pipe as she spoke, and he dropped some of the tobacco on the floor. Instead of answering before he picked up the tobacco he answered after—in surly self-possession, and in one word—"No."

"Do you know nothing about her?"

He devoted himself doggedly to the filling of his pipe. "Nothing."

"On your word of honor, as a gentleman?"

"On your word of honor, as a gentleman."

He put back his tobacco-pouch in his pocket. His handsome face was as hard as stone. His clear blue eyes looked all the colder in England put together to see into his mind. "Have you done, Miss Lundie?" he asked, suddenly changing to a mastering politeness of tone and manner.

Blanche saw that it was hopeless—saw that she had overestimated her own influence by her own headlong act. Sir Patrick's warning words came back reproachfully to her now when it was too late. She stood aside in silence, and allowed him to put him on his guard at starting."

There was but one course to take now. "Yes," she said. "I have done."

"My turn now," rejoined Geoffrey. "You want to know where Miss Silvester is. Why do you ask Me?"

Blanche did all that could be done toward repairing the error that she had committed. She kept Geoffrey as far away as Geoffrey had kept Anne from Arnold.

"I happen to know," she replied, "that Miss Silvester left the place at which she had been staying about the time when we went out walking yesterday. And I thought you might have seen her."

"Oh? That's the reason—is it?" said Geoffrey, with a smile.

The tone in which Blanche's sensitive temper to the quick. She made a final effort to control herself, before her indignation got the better of her.

"I have no more to say, Mr. Delamayn. With that reply, I will leave you to finish on him, and closed the door of the morning-room between them.

Geoffrey descended the house-steps and lit his pipe. He was not at the slightest loss, on this occasion, to account for what had happened. He assumed at once that Arnold had taken a mean revenge on him after his conduct of the day before, and had told the whole story of his arrival at Craig Fernie to Blanche. The thing would get next, no doubt, to Sir Patrick's ears; and Sir Patrick would thereupon be probably the first person who revealed to Arnold the position in which he had placed himself with Anne. All right! Sir Patrick would be an excellent witness to appeal to, when the scandal broke out; and when the time came for repudiating Anne's claim on him as the barefaced impostor of a woman who was married to another man, he pulled away unconcernedly at his pipe, and stared at his swinging, steady pace, for his brother's house.

Blanche remained alone in the morning-room. She expected Arnold to appear at the first hint by means of what Geoffrey might say on the next occasion when he encountered Sir Patrick. After a prospect that she herself had closed from that moment. She sat down in despair by the window. It commanded a view of the little avenue which had been Anne's favorite walk at Windygates. With weary eyes and aching heart the poor child looked at the familiar place; and asked herself, with the bitter repentance that comes too late, if she had deserved all the cruel chances of Anne?

She sat passively at the window, while the hours of the morning wore on, until the postman came. Among the letters was one which the letter-bag she was in the hall to receive it. Was it possible to hope that the letter bore the initials of Anne? She sorted the letters; and lightsad suddenly on a letter to herself. It bore the Kirkandrew postmark, and was addressed to her in Anne's handwriting.

She tore the letter open, and read these lines:

"I have left you forever, Blanche. God bless and reward you! God make you a happy woman! I have no love to count on, but you will think me, love, I have never been so truly your sister as I am at this moment. I can say no more—I can never tell you more. Forgive me, and forget me. Our ii es are parted lives from this day."

Going down to breakfast about his usual hour, Sir Patrick missed Blanche, whom he was accustomed to see waiting for him at the table at that time. The room was empty; the other members of the household having all finished their morning meal. Sir Patrick disliked breakfasting alone. He sent Duncan with a message, to be given to Blanche's maid.

The maid appeared in due time. Miss Lundie was unable to leave her room. She sent a letter to her uncle, with her love—and begged he would read it.

Sir Patrick opened the letter and saw what Anne had written to Blanche.

He wished a little, reflecting, with evident pain and anxiety, on what he had read—then opened his own letters, and hurriedly looked at the signatures. There was nothing for him from his friend, the sheriff, at Edinburgh, and no communication from the family lawyer, by way of a telegram. He had decided, overnight, on waiting till the end of the week before he interfered, in the matter of Blanche's marriage. The events of the morning determined him on not wasting another day. He returned to the breakfast-room to pour out his master's coffee. Sir Patrick sent him away again with a second message.

"Do you know where Lady Lundie is, Duncan?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"My compliments to her ladyship. If she is not otherwise engaged, I shall be glad to speak to her privately in an hour's time."

CONVENT AT ROME.

On page 148 will be found an engraving of the celebrated Carthusian Convent at Rome, in which it is intended to hold the Exhibition of Catholic Art and Industry. The convent was founded under the site of Diocletian's Baths, and the great cloister, which is to be appropriated for the purposes of the Exhibition, has a roofed over with glass, and arranged in alleys or passages for the display of the various treasures. Screening of silver ornaments in gold and silver, sculpture, painting, architecture, mosaic, ivory carving, embroidery, basket-work, lace, and similar things relating to churches or church decoration. Our engraving represents one of the smaller cloisters of the convent, in that part of the building to which the monks will be confined during the time of the Exhibition, although, however, the curiosity to which all men are subject, added to the opportunity offered, will cause many of them from their seclusion to see how the world of art has advanced since they left the active ways of men. A convent is apparently an inconvenient place for a priestly government to use for exhibition purposes; but when the sacredness character of the Exhibition is taken into account this incongruity disappears; moreover, it will be no arrangement in which privacy will not be intruded upon by the visitors.

THE YOUNG SCULPTOR.

In one of the poorest, narrowest streets of a beautiful foreign city lived a woman and her little son, whom we will call Pietro. The boy had no recollection of his father, who had cruelly deserted his wife and child. The only means of subsistence was what could be obtained by the woman's labor—such household work as could be obtained in the dwellings of the rich. Sometimes she had to walk long distances to and from her employers, but no labor nor fatigue could keep her, save one of regret that her little fair-haired boy had to be left alone in her absence, and that she could not have money enough to send him to school. Nature, however, all unaided, was teaching him without the help of books or masters, and every where in Florence (the city of flowers) there was more than sufficient to excite the admiration and satisfy the cravings of this child of genius, whose inquiring eyes would always rest on whatever was beautiful, and seek not to be met with in every nook and corner of the grand old place. The "purple and intermingled shadows" that flooded the whole city at eventide, and lit up the gorgeous palaces and churches fair, made for him so many glowing pictures, and the poetical imagination dwelt long after the first impression had passed away.

During his mother's absence, the greater part of his time was spent in what we should call grubbing in the street gutters, making odd carving things of any soft material he could shape to the needed consistency, such as the easy clinging mud-and-houses at the sea-side. These little juveniles generally set up and then demolish their buildings; Henri did nothing of the kind. Every one of those little lumps was moulded into some form copied either from nature or art, for in that beautiful city every street is a museum. Projections, bosses, finials, all are specimens of real architectural beauty, of a pleasing and distinctive type. For a long time the young boy continued to fashion objects of this sort, guided by a kind of fresh inspiration, he aimed at representing the human form: the only difficulty seemed to be how to obtain the models from which to work.

At length, a happy thought occurred to him. He had no money, but he could easily reward the sitter by giving him his next meal, and to less that was nothing compared to the joy he felt at having some chance Arab who would answer his purpose, and who could be enticed by so small a payment to the artist's humble studio. In spite of his mother's remonstrances, Henri worked away early and late, and found growing more passionately attached to his beloved art.

Years sped on without any public recognition of his talent; but his resolute, persevering nature would not allow him to be discouraged. It is true that he was poor; but then he was rich in hope, and sustained by the consciousness of that inward power which is the consummation of real genius. He never dreamed of envying others, but thought only of making himself perfect in what he determined should be the masterpiece of all his hitherto attempted studies; one which was now growing to ample proportions beneath busy fingers.

At length, his task, or rather labor of love, being complete, he told his mother that he should ask permission to shew it at an exhibition of sculpture which was shortly to take place in his native city. He applied for permission; and his request was granted, on condition that the statue should be sent forthwith to the hall of inspection.

"That, gentlemen, is impossible," replied Henri. "I am very poor; and the apartment in which I live is so small that the boy's model can only be removed by taking off the roof."

The men looked at each other in amazement; but there was so much simplicity and honesty in the youth, that after conferring together for a few moments, they proposed to accompany him home, to see the marvelous production to which Henri at present confined to the limits of his little garret, and looked with narrow staircase to the little garret, and looked around in vain for the object they had come to see. Henri saw their surprise, and without a word, threw back a baize curtain from the floor, and revealed to them the boy, life-like as a murdered man. The gentlemen started back in amazement. So lovely, so deadly, were the lineaments of that exquisite face, so faultless in form, so wondrously expressive of purity and innocence, that they could not believe it the work of an untaught youth, entirely devoid of art-education, and of the laws of anatomy, which the student must submitted were perfectly unassailable in the figure before them. No; they would not credit it, and they declared that the boy had been imprisoned in some terrible crime, for which the victim had served as a model. So certain that the statue was incomplete, they insisted, explained; they were inexorable, and declared he should be sent to prison, unless proof that the statue was complete could against him. They further desired him at once to name the counsel for his defense, as he had but a few days to prepare for the day of trial; I can not give his name before."

Amazed beyond measure at the calmness and self-possession displayed by Henri, they felt compelled to acquiesce. Either his youth, his boldness, or his confidence in his art, all three combined—made the judges so far mitigate their severity as to grant him the time he required for the admission of visitors during his imprisonment.

It is needless to dwell on the disappointment in the youth at this terrible blow to his longcherished desires—the grief of his mother at the fate that was on that of his good mother, whom he had hoped to place beyond the need of all further earthly cares. It is better perhaps for us to learn that he did not yield himself up to despair. His will was strong, and he found in it a source more than equal if not superior to the one he had already achieved.

It is still hotly discussed whether the advent of such a trial as that now impending caused no special stir in the city. The hitherto obscure life of the young sculptor was about to be made abuse his counsel, very considerably exercised the anxiety and curiosity of the public. Many, unable to restrain their impatience, visited him in prison—some, doubtless, impelled by curiosity, others by a more benevolent motive. Among these were two distinguished looking individuals, who stood at the door of the prisoning in Florence. One was considerably past middle age; the other (said to be his nephew) was a young man of remarkably handsome countenance and noble figure. No restriction seemed to be put either on their visits or conversation, for they were, in no poor Henri, the time thus spent was so gold and sunshine in this otherwise dark abode of his misery, desired the prisoner might be brought in. The prone figure was placed on the bench, concealed by a covering of the cloth of green baize; while at its side, but considerably raised, was another, also covered. The question was now put as to what counsel he had employed.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am my own counsel. You questioned my ability to give you a representation of 'Death' in every of Life.' My subject is, 'Life' as told by his Creator Cain.'

Both cowlings were withdrawn. Profound silence succeeded this declaration, followed by a burst of admiration such as had never before been heard in Florence in the memory of man-story. Foremost of his admirers were his former accusers. The news was instantly carried to the King, who commanded the statues to be bought, and placed in the Pitti Palace.

"It is not necessary for me to rise to cheer the command of my sovereign," said Henri; "the sculptures are no longer my property. I purchased by the Emperor of Russia. The money I have had for them has paid for my mother's pension abode, and placed me forever beyond the reach of want."

The nephew of the Russian embassador, Kissoff, had served as a model for the arm of "Cain;" and those to whom his features were familiar at once recognized the handsome face.

The narrator of this circumstance has seen the statues at St. Petersburg, in a building expressly erected to receive them. The sculptor's name was Dupré, since become one of world-wide celebrity.

THE DARIEN EXPEDITION.

TOWARD the end of last January an expedition, consisting of the gun-boats Nyanie and the Guard, each about five hundred tons burden, carrying two 11-inch smoothbore guns, one 11-inch pivot gun amidships, and a 30-pound rifle, sailed from New York harbor, under command of Lieutenant-Commander Alex. G. Selfridge, for the purpose of co-operating with the government of the Republic of Columbia in the work of ascertaining whether the depressions in the Central Sierras present facilities for the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien. The project for "abolishing" the Isthmus, and thus shortening the distance to the New World, having been first started by Cortez soon after the conquest of Mexico. Since his time many have been the surveys made with projected across the narrow strip of land that unites Central with South America, nine of which were engaged the serious attention of scientific men and capitalists. These are as follows: By the Rio Napipi, Gulf of Darien; by the Gulf de Necoya; by Rio Nifo, Tempisque, and Gulf de Nicoya; Rio Sapoa and Bay of Salinas; Rio San Juan del Norte; Rio Tamarinda and Lake Managua; Rio and Lake Managua; and by the Atrato and Truando rivers.

About ten years ago Mr. Frederick M. Kelly, of Philadelphia, through Messrs. Harper & Brothers, a pamphlet containing the result of a survey of the Atrato River, flowing eastward into the Gulf of Darien, by which the author believed he had proved the possibility of constructing a ship canal across the Isthmus, from ocean to ocean, without locks. This was to be secured as follows: By a canal from the mouth one of the mouths of the Atrato; by using the tranquil and deep waters of that stream; by deepening the mouth of the Truando; by a canal to connect with the Atrato, and turning to account the bed of the Truando, supposed to a common elevation of 30 feet; by an open cut through the valley of the Navpa for 13 miles; by a tunnel of 3 miles, 1,000 feet long, through said ridge; and by turning to account the valley of a small stream which empties, at 100 feet above the level of the sea, into Humboldt Bay.

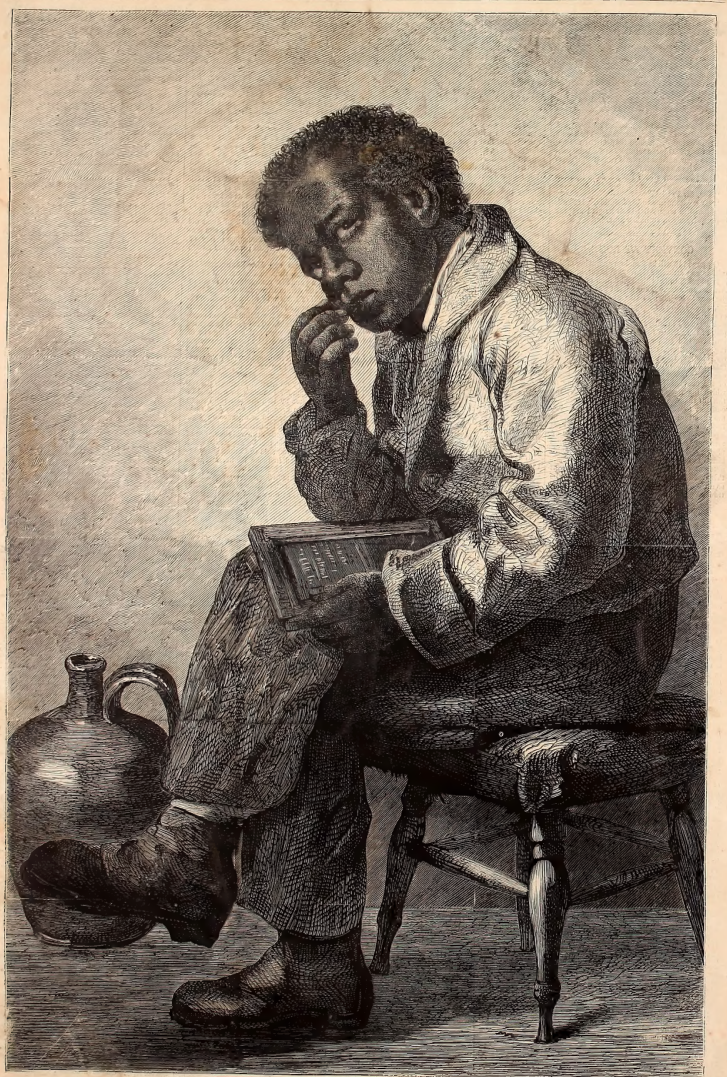
This route has recently attracted the notice of the Columbian government, and the expedition of 1870 has sailed under command of Commander Selfridge is designed to make further and more complete surveys of the localities.

Commander Selfridge, whose portrait we give this week, first entered the Naval Academy in October, 1851, at the age of fifteen, graduating therefrom at the head of an advanced class of ten, in the year 1854, three years after his entrance. He served as midshipman in the Independence, on the Pacific station, and after passing his examination was appointed Master of the Fincennes, in which he made a cruise on the coast of Africa. In 1860 he was promoted to a Lieutenant, and soon after was ordered to the Cumberland, participating in the first battle of the war of the rebellion at Norfolk, Virginia. He commanded the forecastle division of that vessel in the fight with the Merrimac, and the forward main deck division in the memorable fight between the Merrimac and the Monitor.

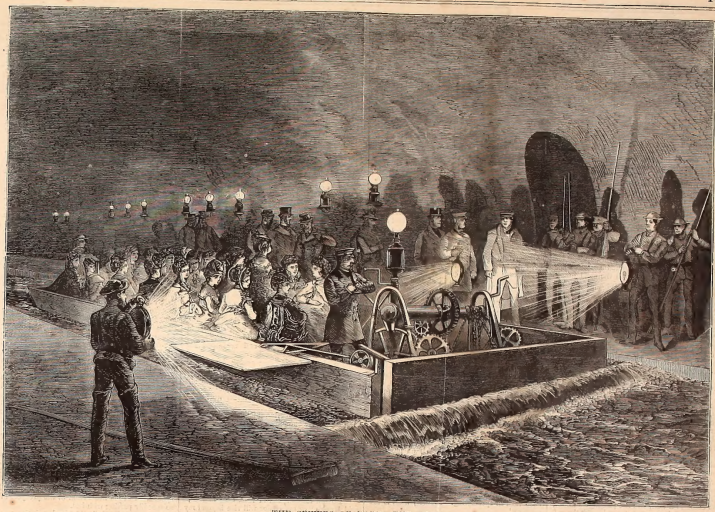
Later in a short respite he was attached to the staff of Rear-Admiral Goldsborough, commanding the North Atlantic squadron, for a period of several months, during which time he was engaged as senior officer in several expeditions, but was soon ordered to the command of the Darien Exploring Expedition.

JUDGE J. J. WRIGHT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE Honorable J. J. Wright, recently elected to a seat in the Supreme Court of South Carolina, whose portrait we give on page 149, was born in Charleston, South Carolina, and is now about thirty-one years of age. When he was about six years old his parents removed to Kingstree, Williamsburg County, in the same State, where for several years he attended the district school during the winter months. At the age for the neighboring farmers the rest of the year. Having saved up a small sum of money he entered the academy at Cheraw, South Carolina, in New York State; and after a thorough course of study there returned to his native place, and in



"A BROWN STUDY."—BY THE LATE WILLIAM HUNT.—[SEE PAGE 155.]



THE SEWERS OF PARIS—THE BOAT.

THE SEWERS OF PARIS.

AMONG the first sights which a stranger in Paris wants to visit are the gigantic collecting-sewers beneath the city, constructed on the recommendation and under the superintendence of M. HAUSSMANN, late Prefect of the Seine. The main artery of these extensive subways on the northern bank of the river is between three and four miles in length, and extends from the Place de la Concorde to Asnières, near to which well-known suburb the principal southern artery, after crossing the Seine in a monster tube close to the Pont d'Alma, will eventually form a junction with it. Besides these principal arteries, which have a height of close upon fifteen feet and a width of about eighteen feet, including a pathway on each side nearly three feet wide, there are thirty miles of secondary galleries of somewhat smaller dimensions, in addition to an intricate net-work comprising nearly six hundred miles of sewers proper. The principal purpose served by these extensive subways is the drainage of the streets and the carrying off the refuse water and the rainfall from the houses; cesspools which require to be periodically emptied being still the rule in the French capital.

THE SEWERS OF PARIS—THE WAGON.

It is only on certain days of the year that these magnificent sewers are thrown open to sightseers. On such occasions, as shown in our engravings on page 153, they are splendidly lighted up with thousands of lamps, each provided with a silver reflector. Tickets, previously obtained from the proper authority, indicate the time and place of embarkation, and precisely at the hour specified the large iron trap-door in the centre of the pavement is raised, and the assembled crowd descends some dozen steps into the subterranean city, where Overhead is a vaulted roof, intersected at right angles with countless telegraph wires inclosed in gutta-percha tubes, and running where they have a large black pipe about a foot and a half in diameter, which supplies the city of Paris with water. Rows of lamps that give a clear and fuster in the distance, light up the vaulted gallery and cast their reflections in the black, turbid waters at our feet, where, in a large boat, capable of holding some fourteen or sixteen people, is floating. The ladies of the party are handed in, and the boat, which is provided with a movable crosseat, shaped fin, pierced with holes to allow of the water flowing through, and which, on being let down, fits exactly to the rounded bottom of the sewer and rests before it all the solid refuse, matter that may chance to have accumulated, moves along on its course until a particular point is reached. Here the voyagers disembark, and, with their male companions, who have followed them on foot, take their seats in a number of small carriages, likewise provided with fans, and at the wheels of which are strong rubber bands of the same material as the broad bands which form the sewer's flooring sound. Occasionally, at a transverse point conductor, passengers must duck their heads as they pass through the great transverse iron sanctions which cross and recross the roofs of the galleries. Suddenly a sharp turn is made, and a silver-plated flood of light in front of them is discerned. The cars soon come to a halt, and the passengers alight, and in a few minutes find themselves, at the end of their journey, on the quay facing the towers of the Conciergerie.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book VII.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONFESSION.

HUGH did not communicate to his mother the fact of his interview with Mr. Frost until after his visit to Mr. Lovegrove's office, when he had formed her of both circumstances at the same time. He could not refrain from saying a word about her leaving Mr. Bevis's house in Gordon Street a secret from him.

"I was so surprised, mother," he said. "It seemed so unlike you. But I suppose he persuaded you in some way that it would be right not to trouble him by having come to consult him."

"Was I bound to speak of it, Hugh—before Maud, too, and Mr. Lovegrove?"

"No, of course not bound. But it would have seemed more natural if you had mentioned it quietly to me."

Mrs. Lockwood was silent.

"Look here, mother dear," said Hugh, after a short silence, "I am not good at hiding what I feel. I was a little hurt and vexed when Mr. Frost told me that you and he had arranged to discuss my feeling for Maud long before you had ever said a word to me on that subject. Was not the truth is out?"

"He—Mr. Frost—told you that, Hugh?"

"Well, he did not say it verbatim or literatim, as I have said it; but he certainly gave me to understand that was the case."

"I meant for the best, Hugh."

"Meant for the best! Dearest mother, I don't suspect you of meaning that! But let that man come between you and me, mother dear."

"I thought you liked Mr. Frost, Hugh."

"So I did. He was my father's friend. I have known him all my life. But lately there has been something about him that—that—no, that is too strong a word—there has been something about him that seems to put me on my guard. I hate to have to be on my guard!"

"It is a very good attitude to face the world with."

"Ah, mother, you know we might have some discussion on that score. But, at this time, I am not the posture I like—or, indeed, that I am able—to assume toward my friends. With mistrust affection vanishes."

Mrs. Lockwood winced, and turned her pale face from her son.

"But, mother," he proceeded, "I have another piece of news to add—a disagreeable piece of news; but you must try not to take it too much to heart."

Then he told her of the disappointing letter he had received from Herbert Smowe. This, however, did not seem to grieve her so much as he had expected. In truth, she could not help faintly hoping that it might give her anxieties a reprieve by putting off on a while Hugh's endeavor to make a start for himself. But he did not leave her long in this delusion.

"I must try to borrow the money elsewhere," said he. "The opportunity of buying that connection is too good a one to be lost without an effort."

"Did he not say something—did not Mr. Frost make you an offer of a desirable position elsewhere?" asked Mrs. Lockwood, hesitatingly.

"Oh, I cannot be surprised that he can find during his mysterious visit? Well, mother, I am not mysterious, and I was about to tell you that he did make me an offer on the part of this new company in which he is interested. But—"

"But you refused it?"

Hugh explained to his mother that in order not to appear obstinate and ungracious, he had taken two days to consider of the proposition. But he added that his mind was already made up on the subject.

"The truth is," he said, "that I mistrust the whole business. There are rumors afloat about the company that would make a prudent man think twice before he had any thing to do with it."

"But you would be a paid employé. You would run no risk."

"I should be losing my time and getting neither cash nor credit."

"Is it really thought so ill of, this undertaking?"

"In our office it is spoken of as a very unsafe concern. Mr. Lovegrove thinks: if things had gone well in the English money-market the thereupon Establishment might have turned up trumps. But as it is—unprincipled gambling on a great scale, and with other folks' money! One of our company's best clients houses such as we have had lately would involve the company in ruin. But you need not look so anxious, mother dear. Our unambitious little craft is out of such deep waters, and will keep well in shore."

"Do you suppose, Hugh," asked Mrs. Lockwood, in her usual deliberate calm tones, but which cloaked a terrible anxiety, "you have you any reason for supposing that Mr. Frost has ventured money on the company?"

"His own money you mean?—for of course he has ventured other peoples' if he puts the thing to every one else as he has to me. I can not say. People are beginning to say that he is not so solid a man as he was supposed to be. But seven knows these things get about—that he has a very extravagant wife, and that he has a rich client to humor. What makes you ask the matter?"

Hugh suddenly checked his speech to ask this question for Mrs. Lockwood had dropped her head on her hands, and the tears were running down her face.

"Mother! Darling mother, do speak to me! For God's sake tell me what is the matter! Is it my fault? Have I erred or said any thing to vex you?"

She took her head silently; but the tears gathered and fell more quickly and copiously at every moment.

"Hugh," she faltered out at last, "I tried to do right."

"Tried to do right! You have done right—always right. You are the best woman in the world."

"Don't, Hugh! Don't talk so! It goes to my heart to hear you when I know how your tone would change if I told you all."

"To tell me what?" asked Hugh, almost breathless with surprise and apprehension.

"Hugh, Hugh, you would never love me if I were to confess some great fault to you. Heaven knows I am not the man; your love is so mingled with pride!"

"Some great fault!" echoed Hugh.

"There! There! You look on your face like your father!"

The woman bowed her face yet lower, and hid it in her hands, while her delicate frame shook with sobs. For a few minutes, which seemed interminable to Hugh, the only sound was silent, and looking, as she had said, very stern, His struggle with himself was undergoing a painful ordeal which was not expressed in the set lines of his strong young face. At length he went to her side, and took her hand, and took her hand.

"Mother," he said, "nothing can blot out all the years of love and care and tenderness you have given to me. I can not believe that you have been guilty of any wrong. Your sensitive conscience exaggerates its importance no doubt. But"—here he took her hand and laid it down on his knee—"but whatever it may be, if you will confide in me, I shall never cease to love you. Do you not trust your mother? Nothing can alter that."

"Oh, my boy!" she cried, and threw her arms round his neck as he knelt beside her.

Then in a moment the weary secret of years came out. But all the while Hugh kept the miserable story of her youth to the time of her marriage, and the subsequent persecution from which Mr. Frost had relieved her, and the price she had to pay for that relief. As she spoke, looking her son in the face, and resting her head on his shoulder, she wondered at herself, for having endured the torments of hearing her history locked in all these years, and at the unpresension she had felt at the thought of the confession which seemed so easy, sweet, and natural.

Hugh heard her without speaking, only now and then pressing the hand he held in his to give her courage when she faltered.

"Oh, mother, you have suffered in your life!" That was his first thought when she ceased to speak. His next thought he was fain to utter, although it sounded like a reproach.

"If you had but trusted my father! He loved you so truly.

"Ah, Hugh, if I had, but it was so terrible to me to risk losing his love. And he often said—as you have been used to say after him—that he could never reinstate in his heart any one who had once been guilty of deliberate deception. You can not know, you strong upright natures, how the weak are bent and warped. You can not—or so I ferved—make allowance for temptation, or give credit for all the hard struggle and combat that has sometimes in defeat at last."

Hugh could not quite easily get over the revelation his mother had made. He had struggled with himself to be gentle with her; he would not add to her grief by look or gesture, if he could help it. But he knew that all was not as it had been between them. He knew that he could never again feel the absolute proud trust in his mother which had been a joy to him for so many years. Disappointment, mistake, and pity remained. But the past was past, and irrevocable. The pain of this knowledge settled as a spur to his resentment against Mr. Frost.

"You have the paper acknowledging this man's debt to you, Maud," said Hugh. "It will be a difficult to make him disgorge. He to patronize me, and help me, and offer me this and that, when an act of common honesty would have put me in a position to help myself years ago!"

"Hugh, dear, you know that you hinted at just now has been in my mind for some time past, although I dared not allude to it. I must tell you that I have not been able to make immediate restitution of the money due to you."

"Restitution! Nonsense! I shall give him the choice, though I feel that even so I am in some degree compounding with knavery."

Mrs. Lockwood looked and unclasped her hands nervously.

"He always found some excuse for putting me off all these years," she said.

"He shall not put me off, I promise him."

"Oh, my son, I trust through my cowardice you should lose all that your poor father worked so hard to leave you!"

"We will hope better, mother dear. This man must have enough to pay me what he owes. It is a great debt, but not so much as rich man. He has been in a fine position for years, and the name of his firm is flourishing. I'll speak about—about the will, and Maud's inheritance?" stammered Mrs. Lockwood.

The change in her manner had given place to a timid hesitation in addressing Hugh that was almost pathetic.

"I will not speak of that, dear mother," said Hugh, "or my choler will rise beyond my control. Maud's affairs are in a comparatively soundcrel. He was—I am sure of it now,—suspected it often—trying to sound me as to the probability of Maud being induced to bear false witness."

"Oh, Hugh!"

"He thought it might be highly convenient for him, and might ease his pocket and his conscience, (forgive me, I see he is not troubled with) if I—It won't bear thinking of."

"Hugh, dear, be merciful to him! And may there not be some excuse—?"

"Excuse!" echoed Hugh.

But mother shrank back silently at the fierce tone of his voice. He walked to the door, and had almost passed out of the room, when she called him, but in so low and hesitating a tone that he stood uncertain whether she had spoken or not.

"Did you call me, mother?" he asked.

"You never left me before without a word or a kiss, Hugh, since you were a toddling child."

He came back at once, and took her in his arms, and kissed her fondly, fondly. But after he was gone, she sat and cried bitterly. A strange kind of repentance grew up in her mind that would not permit her to call the evil done as for the tardy confession of it. Yet it had seemed, so long as the confession was yet unspoken, as if even while she was speaking it, as if it must take a load from her heart.

"If I had held my tongue," she thought, "my son would have loved me and trusted me still. He is all I have in the world, Hugh, but I should find some change in him, my boy whom I love better than my life! What signified the money? Hugh has his love. He knew nothing of it, and he would not have grieved for it. What phantom of duty was it that hovered and hurried me into doing this thing?"

She forgot, in the poignant pain of her mortified love and pride, the considerable bonus that secrecy had cost her. Her soul was tossed to and fro by many emotions before her mental agitations were ended. The untoward teachings of her youth were bearing bitter fruit. She did not lack courage, but she could endure, and endured much, with fortitude and energy. But the phantom of duty was a thing that she had not had balanced her sufferings against her faults all her life long. She had been prone to demand perfect justice from all and to think herself exempted it out rightly to others. There had been an secret satisfaction mingled with double the heartbreaking troubles of her younger days, in the conviction that they were undeserved. Pride had always a hold on her sting of injustice, and for the stroke of merited calamity humility alone brings healing.

Zillah thought that she had paid her price of suffering. She had fated the pain of confessing to her son that she had sinned. And yet the peace which that pain was meant to purchase did not descend upon her heart. She had not learned even yet—that no human sacrifice can bribe the past to hide its face and be silent. We must learn to look upon it quite irrevocable without rancor: thus, and thus only, does its stern spikes become heal to us a sweetness and a wisdom of its own.

CHAPTER IX.

CONFIDENCE.

It was past six o'clock on that same spring evening when Veronica's note was delivered at Gower Street. Hugh had just quitted his mother, after the interview recorded in the preceding chapter, and was crossing the little entrance hall when the messenger arrived.

"Are you Mr. Hugh Lockwood, Sir?" asked the man. "I was told to give the letter into his own hands."

Hugh assured the messenger that he was right; and began to read the note as he stood there, with some anxiety. When he had glanced quickly through the note he turned to the messenger.

"Are you to wait for an answer?" he said.

"No, Sir; I had no instructions about that."

"Very good. I will send or bring the reply. Tell Lady Gale that her note has been safely received."

He then the man was gone Hugh ran up to his own room to read the letter again, and to consider its contents. What should he do? That he must tell Maud of it was clear to him. He did not think he should justified in withholding it from her. But how should he advise her to act? He cogitated for some time without coming to any conclusion, and at last went in search of her, determined to let himself be greatly guided by her manner of receiving that which he had to tell.

He found Maud in the little drawing-room on the first floor in long conference by Lady Telis. She was selecting and packing some music to take away with her; for she was to spend many hour among the shipbay in two days. Mrs. Shearsbown had invited her to stay at Lowstar House during the time that Maud had declared that she could not leave Mr. Levincourt for the first week or so of his return home. Afterward she had promised to divide her time as nearly as might be between Lowster and the vicarage.

"What are you doing there, Maud? You look as pale as a spirit in the twilight," said Hugh, entering the room.

"Am I indeed what spirits have no occasion for—packing up," she answered. "Luggage is, however, a matter of very limited mortality, which is which it is vain to rebel."

"It is a condition of mortality which you of the spiritual world share with great fortitude, I have always heard. Perhaps there may be something of the marry-spirit in the universe—something of the sort which one sees women drag about piles of portmanteaus and bandboxes!"

Hugh spoke lightly and gaily, as he had asked spoken. But his heart sank at the prospect of so speedily parting with her.

"Lady Telis," said Maud, pointing to a pocket of unbound music she had put aside, "those are to be for Mrs. Shearsbown. The rest—Beethoven's sonatas, Haydn's, Hummel's, and a few of the songs I shall take with me. I have packed up the cantata of Kerebeth that I used to play with Mr. Plew—poor Mr. Plew!"

She smiled, but a tear was in her eye, which her head took a little. Presently she went on: "I have chosen all the old things that Uncle Charles is fond of, for he said the other day that he never had any music now. Music was always one of his great pleasures."

"I have not heard you play or sing for some time, Maud."

"Not since—not since dear Aunt Hilda died. I have not cared to make music for my own sake. But I shall be thankful if I can cheer Uncle Charles at times."

Hugh drew near her, and looked down proudly on the golden-haired head bending over the music. "And must I lose you, my own love?" he said.

"Oh, Hugh! No; that you must not. Don't be too sorry, you poor boy. Remember how I shall be counting you all my home—yes, all the time, every hour that we are parted."

She put up her hands on his shoulders, and held her cheek against his, and spoke with fond simplicity.

"Ah, my own, best darling! Always unselfish, always encouraging, always brave. What troubles can hurt me that leave me your love? My heart has no room for other pain than guilt—unless when I think of you, Maud."

"Are there any troubles, Hugh?" she asked, quickly, holding him away from her, and looking up into his face. "If you really think me brave, you will let me know the troubles. It is my right, you know."

"There are no troubles—no real troubles. But I will tell you every thing, and take counsel of my wise little wife. First, I must tell you that I carried out right this day. I don't start, darling. I went to Mr. Lovegrove's office, where I found Mr. Simpson, the solicitor employed by—by the other side, and Lane, the agent. I told them what I had to say, as briefly as possible, just as you bade me."

"Oh, I am so grateful to you, Hugh. And the result? Tell me in a word."

"I have no doubt Veronica's claim will be established. Indeed, I believe that it may be said to be so already."

"Thank God!"

"I will give you the details of my interview later, if you care to hear them. But now I have something else to say to you. Sit down by me here on the couch. I have much more—You tremble! Your little hands are cold! Maud, my darling, there is nothing to fear!"

"No, dear Hugh. I do not fear. I fear nothing as long as you hold my hand in yours. But I—I—"

"You have been agitated and excited too much lately. I know it, dearest. I hate to distress you. But I am sure you would not be right to conceal this thing from you."

"Thank you, Hugh."

"I got this note on my return home. I left you see to read it by this light?" She took the small, perfumed note to the window, and read it through eagerly. While she was reading Hugh kept silence, and watched her with tender anxiety. In a minute she turned her face toward him and held out her hand.

"When may I go? You will take me, Hugh? Let us lose no time."

"You wish to go, then?"

"Wish to go! Oh yes, yes, Hugh. Dear Hugh, you will not oppose it?"

"I will not oppose it, Maud, if you tell me, after a little reflection, that you seriously wish to go."

"I think I ought to see her."

"She does not deserve it of you."

"Dear Hugh, she has done wrong. She deceived her father, and was cruelly deceived in her turn. I know there is nothing so abominable to you as insincerity."

Hugh thought of his own many speeches to that effect, and how all his mother's moral dissertation; and so thinking, he winced a little and turned away his head.

"You are accustomed to expect moral strength and rectitude, from having the example of your mother always before your eyes. But ought we to set our faces against the weak who wish to return to the right?"

"I know not what proof of such a wish has been given by—Lady Cosie."

"Dearest Hugh, if she were all heartless and selfish, she would not long to see me in the hour of her triumph."

"She was so word of her father."

Maud's face fell a little, and she bent her head thoughtfully.

"Does that show much heart?" continued Hugh.

"Perhaps—I think—I do believe that she is more afraid of him than she is of me. And that would not be unnatural, Hugh. Indeed, I do not defend, nor even excuse, Veronica. But if, now—having seen to what misery, for herself and others, selfishness and vanity, and worldliness have led—she is wavering at a turning-point in her life, when a kind hand, a loving word, may have power to strengthen her in better things, ought I not to give them to her if I can?"

"I said Hugh, slowly, "you must do so without repugnance, without doing violence to your own feelings, perhaps."

"I can, indeed, Hugh! Ah, you, who have been blessed with a good and wise mother, can not guess how much of what is good in Veronica is due to early indulgence. Poor Aunt Stella was kind; but she could neither guide nor rule such a nature as Veronica's. And then, Hugh, don't give me credit for more than I deserve—I say to her, too. She was my sister for so many years. And I loved her—I have always loved her. Let me go!"

She debated where and how this was to be.

"I hate the idea of your going to see her unknown to Mr. Levincourt," said Hugh. "I believe he will be justly hurt and angered when he hears of it. If you have any influence with her, you must try to induce her to make some advances to her father. It is her barest duty. And—forgive my dearest," as he spoke he drew her fondly to his side as though to encourage her against the gravity of his words, and the serious resolution in his face, "I object to me, Maud. You must make this lady understand that your path in life and hers will henceforward be widely different. It must be so. Were we to plan the contrary, circumstances would still be too strong for us. She will be a lady, May my Maudie, shall be only just not very poor. She will live in any cities; we in an obscure provincial nook. The old atmosphere of evil will in all probability surround Lady Sale, would not suit my life; and our climate would be too bleak for her."

"I will do what you tell me, Hugh. Must I go? To-night?"

"She says in her note that she will be at home all to-morrow."

"Yes; but she also says 'this evening.' And, besides, to-morrow will be my last day with you!"

"Thanks, darling. Well, Maud, if you are prepared—if you are strong enough—we will go to-night."

Hugh went down stairs, and informed his mother that he and Maud were going out for a walk, but would return to supper.

It was not unusual for them to take an evening walk together, after the business of the day was over for Hugh.

"Are you going to the park, Hugh?" asked Mrs. Lockwood.

"No, mother."

At another time she would have questioned him further. But now there was a sore feeling at her heart which made her silent. Was he growing less kind, less confiding already? Were these the first-fruits of her miserable weakness in confessing what she might still have kept? She was too proud, or too prudent—perhaps at the bottom of her heart too just—to show any temper or suspicion. She merely bade him see that Maud was well wrapped up, as the evenings were still chilly.

And then, when the street door had closed upon them, she sat and watched them moving down the long dreary street from behind the concealment of the wire blind in her little parlor, with a yearning sense of unhappiness.

Arrived at the bottom of the street, Hugh called a cab. "You must drive to the place, my pet," he said, putting Maud into the vehicle. "It is a long way; and you must not be tired or harassed when you reach the hotel."

"Oh, where is it, Hugh? How odd that I never thought of asking! But I put my hand into yours and come with you, much as a little child follows its nurse. Sometimes I feel—you won't laugh, Hugh?"

"I shall not laugh, Maudie. I am in no laughing mood. I may smile, perhaps. But smiles and tears are sometimes near akin, you know."

"Well, then, I feel very often when I am with you, as I have never felt with any one except my mother. I can remember the perfect security, the sense of repose and trust I had in her presence. It was so sure of her love. It came down like the dew from heaven. I needed to make no effort, to say no word. I was a tiny child when I lost her, but I was never forgotten that feeling. And since, since I have loved you, Hugh, it seems to me as though it had come back to me in all its peace and sweetness."

"My own treasure!"

They sat silent with their hands locked in each other's until they had nearly reached the place they were bound for. Then Hugh said, "We are nearly at our destination, Maud. I shall leave you after I have seen you safely in the hall. It is now half-past seven. At nine o'clock I will come back for you. You will be ready?"

"Yes, Hugh."

"God bless you, my dearest. I shall be glad when this interview is over. My precious child, my dear sudden gusts and storms shake you to much!"

"Oh," she answered, smiling into his face though with a trembling lip, "there are lulls of a tempest, my darling children to it. And they are elastic, the poor slight things. It is the strong stiff stubborn ones that gets broken."

"Am I stiff and stubborn, Maudie?"

"No; you are strong and good, and I am so grateful to you!"

He inquired in the hall of the hotel for Lady Gale, and found that directions had been given to admit Maud wherever she might present herself.

"Miss Desmond?" said the porter. "Lady Gale begs you will go up stairs. This way, if you please."

The man directed a waiter to conduct Miss Desmond to Lady Gale's apartment. Hugh gave her a parting kiss in the hall, and Maud, pressed, "At nine, Maud," and stood watching her until her slight figure had disappeared, passing lightly and noiselessly up the thickly-carpeted stairs.

ABSENCE.

THE April sunshine, soft and fair,
Touches the meadows everywhere;
Wild violets seem the warm still air;
But ever through the bright spring hours,
The sunshine cannot warm the flowers,
My spirit hungers to be fed.
And finds for lovely dear daily bread,
Yearning, beloved, for thee!

The day wears on, the evening long
Comes up across the misty lea;
I watch the stars as one by one
They glimmer out: my eyes are wet;
My heart is filled with sweet regret,
Haunting it like a sad refrain;
I can not still this restless pain,
Thinking, beloved, of thee!

The twilight deepens; brooding sleep
Shadows the green earth tenderly;
The home lights burn in quiet peace;
The peace of heaven seems strangely near;
I kneel beneath the moonbeams clear,
And soft upon my troubled breast
Comes down a blessed sense of rest,
Praying, beloved, for thee!

"A BROWN STUDY."

THE interesting engraving from a painting by the late WILLIAM HUNT, which we print on page 152, is a pleasant illustration of the peculiarly gentle humor of that artist's genius, with which this great master of water-color art delighted to make laugh from lowly human life. If he painted an "interior" it was generally some unpretending farm-house or cottage-chamber, and his figures were those of rustic children of orders of the homeliest type—plow-boys, farm-house beauties, school boys and girls. He produced several groups of rustic children, one of which now in the Ellison Collection in the South Kensington Museum, is the most famous. The little mulatto is not made to look more ridiculous or less intelligent as he bends over the sum written down on the slate by the white boy. The white boy's head call attention to the artistic treatment of the subject—the delicious expression of the little fellow's face, as, unconsciously biting his pencil, he rolls up his eyes in a brown study of the sum that he has set. This picture might have been studied in one of our own schools for freedmen's children in the South.

THE HAIR.

THE quality and color of the hair was a subject of speculative theory for the ancients. Long hair was considered indicative of pusillanimity and cowardice. Thus Homer's Greeks were ridiculed as "long-haired Achæans." Strength was the attribute of a full head of hair. Hence Samson's strength was supposed to be in his locks, and Delilah was found to lead to grave abuses and evils. Within about three years more than 12,000 infants were known upon the hospital. Parish officers stripped their workhouses of juvenile inmates, and sent them to the hospital. Brutal husbands robbed helpless wives of their bed-ground children, and sent them to the hospital. Men and women turned the country out up a new trade, the carrying of babies at so much a head up to the hospital. Never was there a greater set of varieties of the enormities resulting from this practice. Those concerned in it sought to conceal it from the provisions for indiscriminate admission, and the institution now considered under the regulations that,

"The committee shall be satisfied of the previous existence of the child, and of the settlement of the parent in every child proposed for admission, and that the father of the child is living, or has deserted the mother of the child; and that the reception of the child will in all probability be the means of saving the mother from the course of vicious and the way of an honest livelihood."

Many of the cases which defeated the utility of the free education system in the country, however, doubtless exist in far less force in this country than in England.

Along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad more agates are found in great abundance. The best are often fifty yards wide and one hundred long, and are usually one or two feet under the surface. They are covered between and underneath large smooth pebbles. Some of these pebbles are of the most beautiful of vines, pine trees, cedar forests, trains of cars, and figures of every imaginable shape. The hunt after agates is exciting.

Lansenne, on Lake Geneva, has had a shower of nuts. To be sure, it lasted only a couple of minutes, but millions of nuts fell, covering the streets so that it was not possible to walk without crushing them.

Maize is not likely to lack for timber at present. The State Government had to cause plantations to be fifty cents an acre, and even that can be "worked out," if they choose, on the new roads.

Minnesota does not need lie-machines. Nature can assign an, at least, approximate cause.

A terrible accident recently occurred at the Worcester depôt in Boston. A train had just arrived, and before it stopped a man rose from his two seats, jumped upon the platform, stepping in the direction opposite to the motion of the cars. She fell back upon the track and was killed by the wheels under the dust in a few hours. There is always a risk in getting off a car while in motion; but a passenger of comparatively safe if great care be taken to jump or step forward. It is most dangerous to jump or step in the opposite direction.

Harvard University has eleven hundred and seven students, forty-nine professors, and forty-two other teachers. Fourteen of the latter are women.

The pyramids will never cease to give rise to curious speculations. Sir John Herschel calculates that the great pyramid contains 85,736,000 pounds. But this gives a larger estimate of 6,000,000 tons. According to Perring, the present quantity of masonry is 3,316,000 cubic yards, or 6,000,000 cubic feet.

The Pope is a great smoker, invariably taking a cigar after every meal. The Holy Father once visited the manufactory which is to be his future home. Being told that a great part of the work was done by the girls of the establishment, he was more solicitous for their good looks than good character, he exclaimed, "Conduct me, then, to these servants of God!" He was presented with several thousand of the best cigars.

The hotel-keepers who recently met in convention in Cincinnati were for procuring on an even more sensible terms than the ice companies supply it will that second-rate article. Not one-half of the ice sold in Paris is artificially made; and it is predicted that, five years hence, half the ice used in the United States will be made by machinery. Improvements have recently been made in the apparatus, and we understand that one machine can make from fifty to five hundred pounds per hour, according to tropical climates, or in countries bordering thereon. The materials used in the manufacture of the ice are water, sperits of ammonia, steam, and salt. Ammonia possesses the peculiar property of parting with its ammoniacal gas when heated, and of reabsorbing it most powerfully when cooled again: the gas has the property of becoming liquefied by pressure; the liquefied gas becomes heat at the same time and communicates this heat to the surrounding vessel; and when returning to the gaseous state, the pressure being removed, it will absorb this heat, and then cool the surrounding vessel, which in turn may exert cool freezing action on water. If a liquid is forced to become a vapor without giving it special heat, it will, in the process of evaporation, absorb the required heat forcibly from the surrounding bodies, and produce sensible cold. Without entering into the details of the process, we may state that ice is now being successfully manufactured in Philadelphia by the use of liquid ammonia. Many other liquids have been applied to this purpose. Dr. Van der Weyde, of New York, has invented an ice machine in which chloroform or cryogene is used. This substance possesses many advantages over others, being a cheap product obtainable in the distillation of petroleum, and is exceedingly cheap. It is also very volatile, and by peculiar lubricating processes protect the metals with which it comes in contact from corrosion, which is a great advantage. The price of one of Van der Weyde's machines, capable of producing ten tons of ice per day, is, including the engine and boiler, about $5000, while a machine capable of the same capacity costs $25,000. The price of the ice made by Dr. Van der Weyde's machine is guaranteed, 37 to $8 per ton, by the former than $2 to $4.

We understand that Professor Agassiz has been seriously ill—a consequence of nervous prostration and sleeplessness. His physician prescribes perfect rest, consequently there will probably be no public lectures from him for some time.

A correspondent of the London Times at Rome says that it is often impossible to ascertain the substance of the medicines made in the Gymnesian Islands, or even to learn on which side they are delivered. "With the closest attention an Italian has great difficulty in understanding a Greek or a Spaniard, and vice versa. In that vast hall seven hundred Fathers can do little more than listen to the rolling of each other's words. What are the wild waves saying?" As much sense could be made out of a number of Babels.

What must be the patience of Japanese novel readers? A Japanese novelist, named Kioug to Bakin, has been at work upon one book of fiction for forty years, and has only just completed it. The work of light literature extends to a hundred and six volumes, and has occupied a good half of the author's life in the composition.

Are our poets wealthy, and is it the gift of poesy to bring the precious gold as well as fame? Well, "they say" is not always to be relied upon, but Bryant is reputed worth $800,000, made chiefly not by poetry, but by journalism. Longfellow is reputed at $500,000, the gift of his father-in-law, Nathan Appleton. Holmes is rated at $100,000, hereditary property, increased by teaching and literature; Whittier at $50,000, inherited and earned by the popular pen; Bayard Taylor at over $75,000, earned by poetry, travel, lore, lecturing, and literature; Lowell is said to be worth $50,000 or $60,000, hereditary and acquired in his professorship at Harvard College.

Admiral Edward Wallis Hoare, the oldest officer in the Royal Navy of Great Britain, recently died at Upton, near Slough. Late of Wylde, he was 94 years old, and entered the navy in 1790 as a volunteer.

The curious discovery has been made by an English surgeon that monkeys can not be poisoned with strychnine. They can eat it in a straight-forward, impunity. Monkeys, then, are slightly different from men.

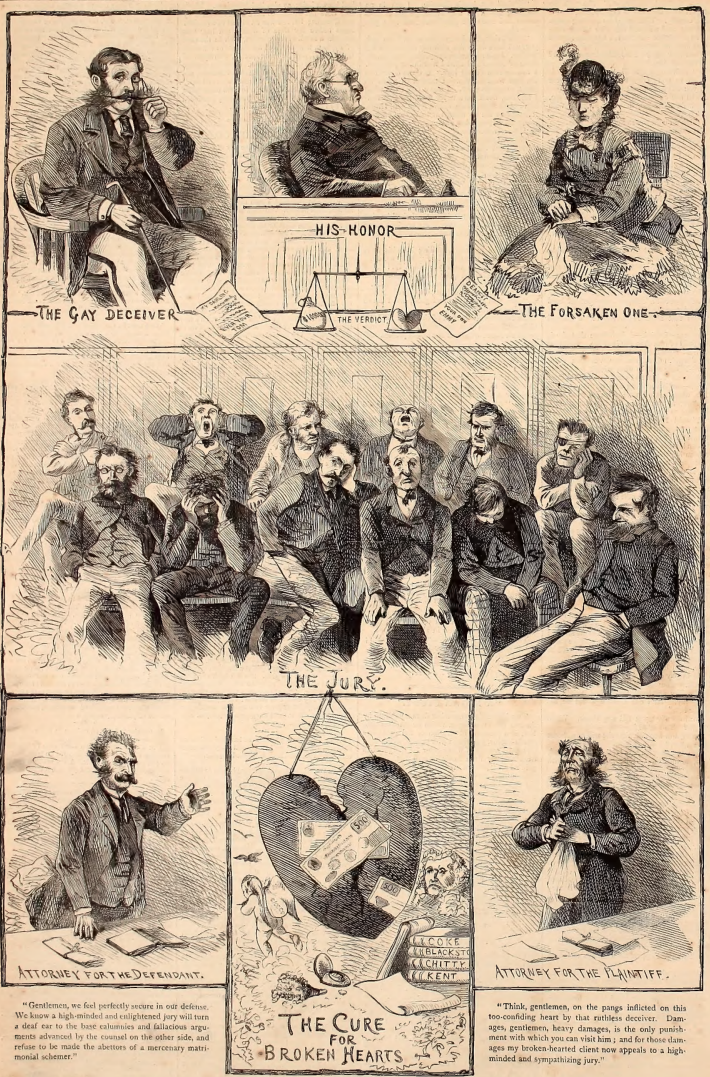
An English engineer, living on the shores of the Adriatic, has just submitted to the Lords of the Admiralty a deadly torpedo. The inventor declines to point to the nature of the motive power, or the depositary of his own secret. The torpedo is in the shape of a huge fish, floating like a porpoise, and is run under the surface of the water, the fore-part filled with explosive matter, and the motive power in the after-part, provided by compressed air. This vessel is like a sword-fish, with not only a snout in front, but with two projecting fins on the sides and rising up vertically. Charged with dynamite or nitro-glycerine, the torpedo can be steered by the wheels inside the great iron-built vessel; and can be made to run forward under the bottom of a ship, or straight on for a curved line. With such engines of destruction, naval battles will be surprisingly horrible.

M. Olivier is believed to have in contemplation a measure which will have the effect to repress duelling in Paris. Instead of a short time of imprisonment, he will fine them $100,000 for the benefit of the poor on principals and seconds. A few sentences of this kind rightly enforced would produce a most salutary effect.

It is curious to notice what various forms Parisian journals adopt when they come to the Emperor. The Journal des Débats describes him as H. M. the Emperor; Constitutionnel, His Majesty the Emperor; Pays, His Majesty; Petite Presse, His Majesty; Napoleon III.; Clarke, Napoleon; Abeel, the Executive; Paspel, Cortet; Marseillaise, Sardanapalus, Herod, and Heliogabalus.

Professor Blot is looking around for a larger kitchen, as his present apartment is not extensive enough for daily Brooklyn. Many families are waiting inquisitively to make the practical experiment of having their cooking done in the room in which they eat answer. His culinary establishment is a marvel of neatness and order.

We note that an establishment on the same general plan has been opened in Boston, and will exist on extensive scale in Boston. It is located in Washington Street, near the old Brattle-street Church, and its doors are thick all over the city, and more are being put up daily. Orders from those houses are collected twice a day, and a wagon is employed to have them set punctually answered. There is a special bill of fare for each day of the week, but customers are not tied to any thing that he chooses, on any day of the week, by giving notice early enough, and the orders may cover a dinner of several courses for a party of any size, down to the simple lunch of a man at his place of business. The prices charged seem quite reasonable.

A new dispensary has been opened on Broadway, between Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth streets, for the gratuitous treatment of diseases of the throat and chest. Dr. Sturgis, who has acquired a high reputation for skill in such diseases, is the attending physician, the institution having been established by his influence.


"Gentlemen, we feel perfectly secure in our defense. We know a high-minded and enlightened jury will turn a deaf ear to the base calumnies and fallacious arguments advanced by the counsel on the other side, and refuse to be made the abettors of a mercenary matrimonial schemer."

"Think, gentlemen, on the pangs inflicted on this too-confiding heart by that ruthless deceiver. Damages, gentlemen, heavy damages, is the only punishment with which you can visit him; and for those damages my broken-hearted client now appeals to a high-minded and sympathizing jury."

BREACH OF PROMISE—HOW TO REPAIR BROKEN HEARTS.—[FROM A SKETCH BY PARK BENJAMIN.]

THE SEWERS OF PARIS—THE BOAT.

THE SEWERS OF PARIS.

AMONG the first sights which a stranger in Paris wants to visit are the gigantic collecting-sewers beneath the city, constructed on the recommendation and under the superintendence of M. HAUSSMANN, late Prefect of the Seine. The main artery of these extensive subways on the northern bank of the river is between three and four miles in length, and extends from the Place de la Concorde to Asnières, near to which well-known suburb the principal southern artery, after crossing the Seine in a monster tube close to the Pont d'Alma, will eventually form a junction with it. Besides these principal arteries, which have a height of close upon fifteen feet and a width of about eighteen feet, including a pathway on each side nearly three feet wide, there are thirty miles of secondary galleries of somewhat smaller dimensions, in addition to an intricate net-work comprising nearly six hundred miles of sewers proper. The principal purpose served by these extensive subways is the drainage of the streets and the carrying off the refuse water and the rainfall from the houses; cesspools which require to be periodically emptied being still the rule in the French capital.

THE SEWERS OF PARIS—THE WAGON.

It is only on certain days of the year that these magnificent sewers are thrown open to nightseers. On such occasions, as shown in our engravings on page 153, they are splendidly lighted up with thousands of lamps, each provided with a silver reflector. Tickets, previously obtained from the proper authority, indicate the time and place of rendezvous, and precisely at the hour specified the large iron trap-door in the centre of the pavement is raised, and the assembled party proceed to descend some dozen steep steps conducting to the sewers. Overhead is a vaulted roof, intersected in all directions with countless telegraph wires inclosed in gutta-percha tubes, and running along the sides of the walls pegs about a foot and a half in diameter, which supplies the city of Paris with water. Rows of lamps line every further side of these subterranean, light up the vaulted gallery and cast their reflections on the black, turbid waters at our feet, whereon a large boat, capable of holding some fourteen or sixteen people, is floating. The ladies of the party are handed in and the boat, which is provided with a movable crescentshaped fin, is moved with the utmost ease of the water flowing through, and which, on being let down, fits exactly to the rounded bottom of the sewer and pushes before it all the solid refuse matter that may chance to have accumulated, moved along in its course until a receptacle point is reached. Here the voyagers disembark, and, with their male companions, who have followed them on foot, take their seats in a number of small carriages, likewise provided with fans, and the wheels of which run along a channel at the edges of the pathways which bound the sewers on each side. Each of these vehicles carries a lighted lamp in front of it, and is provided with a conductor. Signal is given by sound of trumpet of the whole being given, and off the carriages start, propelled forward by four men running at the sides of them, at the rate of something like six miles an hour. Blue tablets, with white letters, indicate, from time to time, the particular points of the city the party are traversing, and every now and then the cars shoot past some rushing cascade of dirty water tumbling into the sewer with a loud sound. Occasionally, at a signal from their conductor, passengers must duck their heads as they pass beneath the great transverse iron stanchions which cross and recross the roofs of the galleries. Suddenly a sharp turn is made, and a silver-gray shaft of light in front of them is discerned. The cars soon come to a halt, and the passengers alight, and in a few minutes find themselves, at the end of their journey, on the quay facing the towers of the Conciergerie.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book IV.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONFESSION.

Hugh did not communicate to the matter the fact of his interview with Mr. Frost until after his visit to Mr. Levegere's office, when he informed her of both circumstances at the same time. He could not refrain from saying a word about her having kept Mr. Frost's visit to Cower Street a secret from him.

"I was no surprised, mother," he said. "It seemed so unlike you. But I suppose he persuaded you in some way that it would be right not to mention his having come to our house."

"Was I bound to speak of it, Hugh—before Maud, Ina, and Mr. Levercourt?"

"No, of course not bound. But it would have seemed more natural if you had mentioned it quietly to me."

Mrs. Lockwood was silent.

"Look here, mother dear," said Hugh, after a short silence, "I am not good at hiding what I feel. I am sorry to be hurt and wounded by Mr. Frost told me that you and he had privately discussed my feeling for Maud long before you had ever said a word to me on that subject. Now the truth is out"

"Is—Mr. Frost—told you that, Hugh?"

"Well, he did not say it verbatim et literatim, as I have said it: but he certainly gave me to understand that such was the case."

"I meant for the best, Hugh."

"Meant for the best! Dearest mother, you don't suppose I doubt that? But don't let that man come between you and me, mother dear."

"I thought—I said—Mr. Frost, Hugh."

"So I did. He was my father's friend. I have known him all my life. He naturally would has been something about him that revolts—no, that is too strong a word—there has been something about him that seems to put me on my guard. I hate to have to be on my guard!"

"It is a very good attitude to face the world with."

"Ah, mother, you know we might have some discussion on that score. But, at all events, it is not the posture I like—or, indeed, that I am able—to assume toward my friends. With mistrust affection vanishes."

Mrs. Lockwood winced, and turned her pale face from her son.

"But, mother," he proceeded, "I have another piece of news to add—a disagreeable piece of news; but you must try not to take it too much to heart."

Then he told her of the disappointing letter he had received from Herbert Snowe. This, however, did not seem to grieve her so much as he had expected. In truth, she could not help faintly hoping that it might give her anxieties a reprieve by putting off yet a while Hugh's endeavor to make a start for himself. But he did not leave her long in this delusion.

"I must try to borrow the money elsewhere," said he. "The opportunity of buying that connection is too good a one to be lost without an effort."

"Did he not say something—did not Mr. Frost make you an offer of a desirable position elsewhere?" asked Mrs. Lockwood, hesitatingly.

"Oh, I suppose he mentioned that to you also during his memorable visit? Well, neither, I am not mysterious, and I was about to tell you that he did make me an offer on the part of this new company in which he is interested. But—"

"But you refused it?"

Hugh stooped to his mother that in order not to appear obstinate and ungracious, he had taken two days to consider of the proposition. But he added that his mind was already made up on the subject.

"The place is," he said, "that I mistrust the whole business. There are rumors afloat about the company which would make a prudent man think twice before he had any thing to do with it."

"But you would be a paid employé. You would run no risk."

"I should risk losing my time and getting neither cash nor credit."

"It is really thought so ill of, this undertaking?"

"In our office it is spoken of as a very unsafe concern. We certainly should have Hugh had gone well in the English money market the Parthenope Embellishment might have turned up trumps. But there is a strong presumption of gambling on a great scale, and with other folks' money! One or two more failures of great houses such as we had lately would involve the company in ruin. But you need not look so anxious, mother dear. Really, my unambitious little craft is out of such deep waters, and will keep out of them."

"But, nevertheless, Hugh," asked Mrs. Lockwood, in her usual deliberate calm tones, but with cheeks paler than before, "you have no any reason for supposing that Mr. Frost has ventured money in this company?"

"Invested money! Invested?—for of course he has ventured other peoples' if he puffs the thing to everyone as he does with all. I can not say. People are beginning to say that he is not so solid a man as was supposed. I hear—I believe I have been told—that he has gone in for what he has a very extravagant wife, and that he has been rash in speculating. Mother, what is the matter?"

Hugh suddenly checked his speech to ask this question. For Mrs. Lockwood had dropped her head on her hands, and the tears were running down her face.

"Mother! Darling mother, do speak to me! For God's sake tell me what is the matter! Is it my fault? Have I done or said any thing to vex you?"

She took her head silently, but the tears gathered and fell more quickly and copiously at every moment.

"Hugh," she faltered out at last, "I tried to do right."

"I did so do right! You have done right—always right. You are the best woman in the world."

"Don't, Hugh! Don't talk so! It goes to my heart to hear you when I know how your fate would change if I were to tell you—"

"To tell me what?" asked Hugh, almost breathless with surprise and apprehension.

"Oh, Hugh, you would hate me here are if I were to confess some great fault to you. You are like the justice of the men; your love is mingled with pride!"

"Some great fault!" echoed Hugh.

"There! You look at me with a look on your face like your father!"

The poor woman bowed her face yet lower, and hid it in her hands, while her delicate frame shook with sobs. For a few minutes, which seemed an interminable time to Hugh, all stood silent, and looking, as she had said, very stern. He was struggling within himself, and undergoing a painful ordeal which was not progressed in the set lines of his strong young face. At length he went to his mother, lifted her hands gently, and took her hand.

"Mother," he said, "nothing can blot out all the years of love and care and tenderness you have given to me. I can not believe that you have been guilty of any crime. Your last severe conscience exaggerates its importance no doubt. Some trifle has made a little pause and went on with an effort—" but silenced somewhat by, if you will confide in me, I shall never cease to love you. I will not hear any more, mother! Nothing can alter that."

"Oh, my son!" she cried, and threw her arms round his neck as he knelt beside her.

Then in a moment the weary secret of years was outcome. She told him all the truth, from the miserable story of her youth to the time of her marriage, and the subsequent persecution from which Mr. Frost had relieved her, and the price she had to pay for that relief. As she spoke, feeling her sin in not the sting of injustice. She beat on his shoulder, she wondered at herself for having so long kept the secret of tearing her solitary burden all these years, and at the apprehension she had felt at the thought of the confession which now seemed so easy, sweet, and natural.

Hugh heard her without speaking, only now and then pressing the hand he held in his to give her courage when she faltered.

"Oh, mother, how you have suffered in your life!" That was his first thought when she ceased to speak. His next was how to find to utter, although it sounded like a reproach.

"If you had but trusted my father! He loved you so truly!"

"Ah, Hugh, if I had, but it was so terrible to me to risk losing his love. And he often said—as you have been used to say after him—that he could never reinstate in his heart any one who had once been guilty of deliberate deception. You can not know, you strong upright natures, how the weak are bent and warped. You can not—or so I fancy—make allowance for temptation, or give credit for all the hard struggle and combat that ends sometimes in defeat at last."

Hugh could not quite easily get over the revelation but some of his first words were a struggle with himself to be gentle with her; he would not add to her pain by look or gesture, if he could help it. He felt sure that all was not as it had been between them. He knew that he could never again rest on the absolute ground rest in his mother which had been a joy to him for so many years. Tenderness, gratitude, and pity remained. But the pure reverence had irrevocable. The pain of this knowledge acted as a spur to his resentment against Mr. Frost.

"You have the paper acknowledging this man's debt to my father?" said Hugh.

"It will not be difficult to produce. If to patronize me, and help me, and offer me this and that, when an act of common honesty would have put me in a position to help myself years ago!"

Hugh, the dreadful idea that you hinted at just now that you had in my mind for some time past, although I buried not dwelt on it. I must in fear that you have not the right to make immediate restitution of the money due to you."

"Restitution or exposure! I shall give him the choice. I will not be cheated even so! I am in some degree compounding with knavery."

Mrs. Lockwood clasped and unclasped her hands nervously.

"He always found some excuse for putting me off all these years," she said.

"He shall not put me off, I promise him."

"Oh, my boy, if through my cowardice you should lose the money your father vouched so hard to bequeath to you!"

"We will hope better, mother dear. This man must have enough to pay me what he owes. It is a great deal to us, but not much to a rich man. Mr. Frost is in a fine position for years, and the name of the firm stands high."

"And almost as rich as he said, and Maud's inheritance?" stammered Mrs. Lockwood.

The calm security of her manner had given place to a nervous hesitation in addressing Hugh that was almost pathetic.

"Do you like better, of that, dear mother," said Hugh, "or my choice will rise beyond my power to control it. That man is a consummate scoundrel. Don't—I am sure of it now, I suspected it then—trying to sound me as to the probability of my being induced to bear false witness?"

"Oh, Hugh!"

"He thought it might be highly convenient for him, and might ease his pocket and his cares for his conscience; that he was troubled with it I won't bear thinking of."

"May you not be mistaken? And may there not be some mistake?"

"Excuse!" echoed Hugh.

His mother sank silently at the fierce tone of his voice. He walked to the door, and had almost passed out of the room, when she called him, in a low and hesitating a tone that he stood uncertain whether she had spoken or not.

"Did you call me, mother?" he said.

"You never left me before without a word or a kiss, Hugh, when you were a toddling child."

He came back at once, and took her in his arms, and kissed her forehead, fondly. But still he was puzzled by her tone and cool history. A strange kind of repentance grew up in her mind was reparation was so much for the evil done or for the tardy confession of it. Yet it had seemed, so long as the confession was yet unspoken, and even when she was speaking it, as if it must take a load from her heart.

"If I had but your tongue," she thought, "my son would have loved me and trusted me still. Now I am afraid to see him again, lest I should find some change in him, my boy whom I love better than my life! What signified the money? What signified it to me? He knew nothing of it, and he would not have grieved for it. What phantom of duty was it that haunted and harried me into doing right?"

She forgot, in the present pain of her mortified pride and grief, all the miserable human fear secrecy had cost her. Her soul was tossed to and fro by many revulsions of feeling before her meditations were ended. The habitual resentment of her youth were bearing bitter fruit. She did not lack conscience. She could endure, and had endured much, with fortitude and energy. But the greatness of Renunciation was not hers. She had hastened her sufferings against her faults all her life long. She had been prone to demand strict justice for herself, and to think that she merited it out rigidly to others. There had been a secret sustaining consolation amidst the heartbreaking remorse of her younger days, in the conviction that they were undeserved. Pride could not always rest on the sting of injustice. But for the stroke of merited calamity humility alone bring healing.

Hugh thought that she had paid her price of suffering. She had faced the pain of confessing to her son that she had sinned. And yet the peace which that pain was meant to purchase did not descend upon her heart. She had not learned even yet that no human sacrifice can bribe the past to hide its face and be silent. Her sin seemed to look upon the irrevocable without rancor: thus, and thus only, does its stern sphinx-face reveal to us a sweetness and a wisdom of its own.

CHAPTER IX.

CONFIDENCE.

It was past six o'clock on that same spring evening when Veronica's note was delivered at Gower Street. Hugh had just quitted his mother, after the interview recorded in the preceding chapter, and was discussing the little entrance hall when the messenger arrived.

"Are you Mr. Hugh Lockwood, Sir?" asked the man. "I was told to give the letter into his own hands."

Hugh assured the messenger that he was right; and began to read the note as he stood there, with some anxiety. When he had glanced rapidly through the note he turned to the messenger.

"Are you to wait for an answer?" he said.

"No, Sir; I have not been instructed that."

"Very good. I will send or bring the reply. Tell Lady Gale that her note has been safely received."

When the man was gone Hugh ran up to his own room to read the letter again, and to consider its contents. What should he do? That he must tell Maud of it was clear to him. He did not think he should be justified in withholding it from her. But how should he advise her to act? He cogitated for some time without coming to any conclusion; and at last went in search of her, determined to let himself be greatly guided by her manner of receiving that which he had to impart.

He found her in the little drawing-room that had been so long occupied by Lady Talbis. She was sedately sketching and appeared to take away with her; for she was to accompany her guardian to Shipley in two days. Mrs. Shenderbury had invited her to stay at Cower House for a while. But Maud had declared that she could not bear to be a sojourner for the first week or so of his return home. Afterward she had promised to divide her time as nearly as might be between Lowater and Cower House.

"What are you doing there, my own? You look as pale as a spirit in the twilight," said Hugh, entering the room.

"I am doing what spirits have no occasion for—painting, Sir," she answered. "Marriage is, however, a condition of civilized morality, against which it is vain to rebel."

It is a condition of morality which you of the gentler sex accept with great fortitude, I have always noticed," said Hugh, seating himself on the marry-spirit in the perseverance with which one sees women drag about piles of portfolios and sketching-tackle."

He answered lightly and cheerfully, as she had spoken. But his heart sank at the prospect of so speedily parting with her.

"See, dear Hugh," said Maud, pointing to a packet of ruled manuscript music that was white, "these are to be left in your charge. The last—Beethoven's sonatas, Haydn's, Hummel's, and a few of the songs I shall take with me. I have packed up the sonatas of Kozelach that I used to play to Mr. Rye—poor Mr. Rye!"

She smiled, but a tear was in her eye, and her voice shook a little. Presently she went on. "I have chosen all the old things that Uncle Charles is fond of. He said the other day that he never had any music now. He used to be so fond of me as his great pleasures."

"I have not heard you play or sing for some time, Maud."

"Not since—not since dear Aunt Hilda died. I have not cared to make music for my own sake. But I shall be thankful if I can cheer Uncle Charles by it."

Hugh drew near her, and looked down proudly on the golden-haired head bending over the packet. "Dear Maud! I love you, my own love!" he said, sadly.

"Love me, Hugh! No; that you must not. Don't be too sorry, you poor boy. Remember how I shall be loving you all the time—yes, all the time, every hour that we are parted."

She put up her hands on his shoulders, and laid her shining head against his breast with childish fondness.

"Ah, my own, best darling! Always unselfish, always encouraging, always brave. What troubles can hurt me that leave me your love? My heart has no room for any thing but gratitude for the wealth of you, Maud."

"Are there troubles, Hugh?" she asked, quickly, looking up into his face, and then drooping up into his face. "If you really think me brave, you will let me know the troubles. It is my right, you know."

"There are no troubles—no real troubles. But I will tell you every thing, and take counsel of my wise little wife. First, I must tell you that I carried out our plan this day. I don't start, but I called on Mr. Levegere's office, where I found Mr. Simpson, the lawyer employed by—by the other side, and Levy, and I have told them what I had to say, as briefly as possible, just as you bade me."

"I am very grateful to you, Hugh. And the result? Tell me in a word."

"I have no doubt Veronica's claim will be established. Indeed, I believe that it may be said to be so already."

"Thank you, Hugh!"

"I will give you the details of my interview later, if you desire to hear them. But now I have something else to say to you. Sit down by me here on the couch. I have just had a note—"

You must excuse me, little hands are cold! Maud, my darling, there is nothing to fear!"

"No, dear Hugh. I—so fear. I fear nothing as long as you hold my hand in yours. But I—I—"

"You have been agitated and excited too much lately. I know it, dearest. I hate to distress you. But I am sure it would not be right to conceal this thing from you."

"Thank you, Hugh."

"I got this note not half an hour ago. Can you see to read it by this light?" She took the small, perfumed note to the window, and read it through eagerly. While she was reading Hugh kept silence, and watched her with tender anxiety. In a minute she turned her face toward him and held out her hand.

"When may I go? You will take me, Hugh? Let us lose no time.

"You wish to go, then?"

"Wish to go! Oh yes, yes, Hugh. Dear Hugh, you will not oppose it?"

"I will not oppose it, Maud, if you tell me after a little reflection, that you seriously wish to go."

"I think I ought to see her."

"She does not deserve it of you."

"Dear Hugh, she has done wrong. She deceived her father, and was cruelly deceived in her turn. I know there is nothing so abominable to you as insincerity."

Hugh thought of his own many speeches to that effect, and some of his subsequent practice, and, so thinking, he winced a little and turned away his head.

"You are accustomed to expect moral strength and rectitude, from having the example of your mother and sister before your eyes. But suppose we to see our faces against the weak who wish to return to the right?"

"I know not what proof of such a wish has been given by—Lady Gale."

"Dearest Hugh, if she were all heartless and selfish, she would not long to see me in the hour of her trouble."

"She says no word of her father."

Maud's face fell a little, and she bent her head thoughtfully.

"Does that show much heart?" continued Hugh.

"Perhaps—I think—I do believe that she is more afraid of him than she is of me. And that would not be unnatural, Hugh. Dearest Hugh, I do not defend, nor even excuse, Veronica. But if, now—having seen to what misery, for herself and others, mere girlish vanity and worldliness have led—she is wavering at a turning-point in her life, where a kind hand, a loving word, may have power to strengthen her in better things, ought I not to give them to her if I can?"

"If," said Hugh, slowly, "she was not so without repugnance, without doing violence to your own feelings, perhaps—"

"I can! I can, indeed, Hugh! Ah, you, who have been blessed with a good and wise mother, can not guess how much of what is wrong in Veronica is due to early indulgence. Poor Aunt Stella was kind; but she could neither rule nor rule such a nature as Veronica's. And then, Hugh, don't give me credit for more than I deserve—but I think, I do think, she was my sister for so many years. And I loved her—I have always loved her. Let me go!"

They debated when and how this was to be.

"I hate the idea of your going to see her unknown to Mr. Levincourt," said Hugh. "I believe he will be justly hurt and angered when he hears of it. If you have any objection to him, you must try to induce her to make some advances to her father. It is her barest duty. And—think, my dearest," as the tears filled over her fondly to his side as though to encourage her against the gravity of his words, and the serious resolution in his face. "I know that, Maud. You must make this lady understand that your path in life and hers will henceforward be widely different. It must be so. Were we to plan the contrary, circumstances would still be too strong for us. She will be rich, and you, Maudie, shall be only just not very poor. She will live in great cities; we in an obscure provincial nook. The social atmosphere that will in all probability surround Lady Gale, would not suit my life. And our claims will probably be too bleak for her."

"I will do what you tell me, Hugh. When may I go? To-night?"

"She says in her note that she will be at home all to-morrow."

"Yes; but she also says 'this evening.' And, besides, to-morrow will be my last day with you!"

Thanks, darling. Well, Maud, if you are prepared—if you are strong enough—we will go to-night."

Hugh went down stairs, and informed his mother that he and Maud were going out for a while, but would return to supper.

It was not unusual for them to take an evening walk together, after the business of the day was over for Hugh.

"Are you going to the park, Hugh?" asked Mrs. Lockwood.

"No, mother."

At another time she would have questioned him further. But now she was in a hurry to look at her heart which made her refrain. Was he growing less kind, less confiding already? Were these the first fruits of her mistaken policy of confessing what she might still have hidden? She was too proud, or too prudent—perhaps at the bottom of her heart too just—to show any tempers or suspicion. She merely bade him see that Maud was well wrapped up, as the evening would be chilly.

And then, when the street door had closed upon them, she sat and watched their progress down the long dreary street from behind the concealment of the vile blind in the front parlour, with a yearning sense of unhappiness.

Arrived at the bottom of the street, Hugh called a cab. "You must drive to the place, my pet," he said, putting Maud into the vehicle. "It is a long way: and you must not be tired or harassed when you reach the hotel."

"Oh, where is it, Hugh? How odd that I never thought of asking! But I put my hand into yours and come with you, much as a little child follows its nurse. Sometimes I feel—you won't laugh, Hugh?"

"I shall not laugh, Maudie. I am in no laughing mood. I may smile, perhaps. But smiles and tears are sometimes near akin, you know."

"Well, then, I feel very often when I am with you, as I have never felt with any one except my mother. I can remember the perfect security, the sense of repose and trust I had in her presence. She was so sure of her love. It came down like the dew from heaven. I needed to make no effort, to say no word. I was a tiny child when I lost her, but I have not forgotten her love. Hugh. And since, since I have loved you, Hugh, it seems to me as though I had come back to me in all its peace and sweetness."

"My own treasure!"

They sat silent with their hands locked in each other's until they had nearly reached the place they were bound for. "Dear Hugh said: "we are nearly at our destination, Maud. I shall leave you after I have seen you safely in the hand. It is now half-past seven. At nine o'clock I will come back for you. You will be ready?"

"Yes, Hugh."

"God bless you, my dearest. I shall be glad when this interview is over. My presence unlikely, these sudden gusts and storms shake you too much."

"Oh," she answered, smiling into his face, though with a trembling lip, "there are lilies of a tougher fibre than you have forgotten me, if they are elastic, the poor slight things. It is the strong stiff stubborn tree that gets broken."

"Am I stiff and stubborn, Maud?"

"No; you are strong and good, and I am so grateful for it."

He inquired in the hall of the hotel for Lady Gale, and found that directions had been given to admit Miss Desmond whenever she might present herself.

"Miss Desmond?" said the porter. "Lady Gale begs you will go up stairs. This way, if you please."

The man directed a waiter to conduct Miss Desmond to Lady Gale's apartment. Hugh gave her a momentary clasp of the hand, whispered, "At nine, Maud," and stood watching her until her slight figure had disappeared, passing lightly and noiselessly up the thickly-carpeted stairs.

ABSENCE.

THE April sunshine, soft and fair,
Touches the bosom of the snow,
Wild violets scent the warm still air;
But ever through the bright spring hours,
Like Banquo's ghost, the sorrow flits,
My spirit hungers to be fed,
And finds for love's dear daily bread,
Yearning, beloved, for thee!

The day wears on, the evening lone
Comes up across the misty sea,
I watch the stars as one by one
They glimmer out; my eyes are wet;
My heart is filled with vague regret,
Haunting it like a sad refrain;
It can not still this restless pain,
Thinking, beloved, of thee!

The twilight deepens; brooding sleep
Shadows the green earth tenderly;
The hours are silent, and the hour deep;
The peace of heaven seems strangely near;
I kneel beneath the motionless elm,
And soft upon my troubled breast
Comes down a blessed sense of rest,
Praying, beloved, for thee!

"A BROWN STUDY."

THE interesting engraving from a painting by the late WILLIAM HUNT, which we print on page 103, is a pleasant illustration of the peculiarity pointed out in the following lines, and insisted with which this great master of water-color art delighted to treat subjects of a similar kind. Such as that we painted an "interior" it was generally some unpretending farm-house or cottage-chamber, and his figure was always a contemplative children of the homeliest type—plow-boys, farm-house lasses, shepherds, or the like. He produced several drawings of negro children, one of which, now in the Kilsion Collection in the South Kensington Museum, is of the highest merit. The little mulatto is not made to look more ridiculous or less intelligent as he bends over the sum written down on his slate than if he were a white boy. We hardly need call attention to the artistic treatment of the subject—the felicitous expression of the little fellow's face, as unconsciously biting his pencil, he follows the figures in brown study, quite forgetful of his task. The picture might have been studied in one of our own schools for freeborn's children in the South.

THE HAIR.

THE quality and color of the hair was a subject of speculative theory for the ancients. Lank hair was considered indicative of pusillanimity and cowardice; curly hair of courage and the qualities of a calf! Frizzy hair was thought an unmistakable sign of treachery and falsehood. The hair most in esteem was that terminating in ringlets. Dares, the historian, states that Achilles and Ajax Telamon had curling locks; such also was the hair of Timon, the Athenian. As to Augustus, and other emperors, nature had favored him with such redundant locks, that no hairdresser in Rome could produce the like. Auburn or light brown hair was thought the most distinguished, as portending intelligence, industry, a peaceful disposition, as well as a great susceptibility to the tender passion. Castor and Pollux had brown hair; so also had Menelaus. Black hair indicated a propensity to have been estranged by the Romans; but red was an object of aversion. Ages before the time of Judas, red hair was thought a mark of reprobation, both in the case of Typhon, who deprived his brother of the sceptre of Egypt, and Nebuchadnezzar, who acquired a tin exposition of his atrocities. Even the donkey tribe suffered from this ill-omened visitation, according to the proverb of "wicked as a red ass." Asses of that color were held in such detestation by the Egyptians, that whenever they sacrificed one by hurling it from a high wall.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE recent establishment in the city of New York of a lying-in hospital, upon a plan somewhat analogous to those so well known upon the Continent of Europe, lends interest to the history of the first institution of the kind in this country, that opened in 1751. Its basis, financially, was a fund given for the purpose by Captain Cornes, a shipmaster in early life, and afterward a man noted for his efforts for the public welfare. The original idea of the founder did not include the indiscriminate reception of all applicants, but only or accessitous parents might choose to cast upon the institution; but circumstances led an inquiry into character and circumstances in each case. The number of beds originally was limited and extended, by the aid of money granted by Parliament, to 40, and the hospital of 1751 was born. In 1799 it was found to lead to grave abuses and evils. Within about three years over 12,000 infants were thrown upon the hospital. Parish officers stripped their own houses of pauper babies and sent them to the hospital. Mothers abandoned robbed helpless wives of their few-hours-old children, and sent them to the hospital. The managers found that the country set up a new trade, the carrying of babies at so much a head up to the hospital doors. Investigation turned out the carries of the enormities resulting from this practice. The managers petitioned the Legislature to obtain the provisions for indiscriminate admission, and the institution is now conducted under the regulation that,

"The committee shall be satisfied of the previous good character and present necessity of the mother of any child before it is received into the house." The object of this regulation is to protect the mother and child; and that the reception of a child may in all probability be the means of saving the mother in the course of virtue and the way of an honest livelihood."

Many of the causes which defeated the utility of the first charitable system in this instance, however, doubtless exist in far less force in this country than in England.

Along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad men spoke yesterday of a tremendous abundance. The beds are often fifty yards wide and one hundred long, and are usually one or two miles apart. The grass and plants are covered between and underneath large smooth pebbles. Roses and wild flowers are found in great profusion of vines, pine trees, cedar forests, valleys of corn, and figures of every imaginable shape. The hunt after agates is exciting.

Lausenne, on Lake Geneva, has had a shower of ants. To be sure, it lasted only a couple of minutes, but millions of the insects appeared in the course of it; it was not possible to walk without crushing them.

Maine is not likely to lack for timber at present. The State offers timberd land to actual settlers for fifty cents an acre, and the land can be "worked out," if they choose, on the new roads.

Minnesota does not need ice-machines. Water can be got, at a little distance, anywhere.

A terrible accident recently occurred at the Worcester depôt in Boston. A train had just arrived, and before it stopped a woman, in haste to leave the cars, jumped upon the platform while it was in rapid motion, owing to the motion of the cars. She fell back upon the track and was dragged by the train more than the dead in a few hours. There is always a risk in getting off of a car or any train in motion; but a passenger who comparatively safe if great care be taken to jump on the ground. It is most dangerous to jump or step in the opposite direction.

Harvard University has eleven hundred and seven students, forty-nine professors, and forty-two other teachers. Fourteen of the latter is reported gone.

The pyramids will never cease to give rise to curious speculations. Sir John Herschel calculates that the great pyramid contains 12,700,000,000 pounds. Lyell gives a larger estimate of 6,000,000 tons. According to Perring, the present quantity of masonry is 6,316,-000 cubic yards, or 9,000,000 cubic feet.

The Pope is a great smoker, invariably taking a cigar after every meal. The Holy Father once visited the tobacco manufactory which is in the Trastevere. Being told that a great part of the work was done by the girls of the Trastevere, who are more celebrated for their good looks than for their chastity, he exclaimed, "Conduct me, then, to these servants of God." He was presented with several thousand of the best cigars.

The hotel-keepers who recently met in convention, to concert measures for protecting ice in summer, unanimously agreed that the ice companies supply it will best encouraged by their patronage, and that it would be a bold call for ice-makers next summer. About six years ago such an ice-machine was brought over into the United States, and the New Orleans Ice Company was started. Improvements have recently been made in the apparatus, and we understand that what has thus already been done in the Southern Provinces are in use, chiefly in tropical climates, or in countries bordering thereon. The materials used in the manufacture of the ice are water, nitrate of ammonia, steam, and salt. Ammonia possesses the peculiar property of parting with its ammoniacal gas when heated, and of reabsorbing it most powerfully when cooled again; the gas has the property of becoming liquefied by pressure, the liquefied gas becomes cold by evaporation, and communicating that cold to the surrounding vessel; and when returning to the gaseous state, the pressure being removed, it will reabsorb this heat, and also cool the surrounding vessel, which in turn may exert a freezing action on water. If a liquid is forced to become a vapor without giving it a special heat, it will, in the process of evaporation, absorb the required heat forcibly from the surrounding bodies, and produce sensible cold. Without entering into the details of the process, we may state that ice is now being successfully manufactured in Philadelphia by the use of liquid ammonia. Many large breweries have been applied to this purpose. In Van der Weyde, of New York, has invented an ice machine in which chloroform or cryogene is used. This substance possesses many advantages over ammonia, being a warmer product obtained during the distillation of petroleum. It is a secondary charge, but is not very volatile, and its peculiar lubricating properties protect the machine with which it comes in contact from corrosion, which is a great desideratum. The cryogene of Van der Weyde's machines, capable of producing ten tons of ice per day, is including the rest, $8,250 in value, about $3000, while the ammonia machine of the same capacity costs $25,000. The price of ice can be made by the latter is, in favorable circumstances, as low as $2 per ton by the former as $4.

We understand that Professor Agassiz has been seriously ill—a consequence of nervous prostration and overwork. His physician, however, considers rest, consequently there will probably be no public lectures from him for some time.

A correspondent of the London Times at Rome says that a fine specimen of the art of wood-carving in imitation of the addresses made in the Œcumenical Council, or rather in the manner which either has been, or will be, the closest attestation an Italian has great difficulty in pronouncing "A Greek word" in public or private life. In that vast hall seven hundred Fathers can do little more than listen to the rolling echoes, and ask, 'What are the wild waves saying?' As much sense could be made out of a storm at sea."

What must be the patience of Japanese novel-readers! A Japanese novelist, Jenkibo Shikitei, who has been at work upon one book of fiction for forty years, and is not yet through, just completed a work of light literature extends to a hundred and six volumes, and has occupied a good half of the author's life in its composition.

Are our poets wealthy, and is it the gift of poesy that has brought them gold as well as fame? What poet, living or dead, always to be relied upon, but Byron is reputed worth $500,000, made chiefly not by poetry, but by Augustus Walpole, who left a property of $200,000, the gift of his father-in-law, Nathan Appleton, besides the very considerable profit of his poems; Holmes is worth $100,000, Longfellow probably increased by lecturing and literature; Whittier is worth $30,000 or $40,000, and owes his property to Garrison's reputed worth $70,000, inherited and earned in the publishing business; Lowell is worth $50,000 or $60,000, hereditary and acquired in his professorship in Harvard College.

Admiral Edward Wallis Hoare, the oldest officer in the Royal Navy and Great Britain's oldest admiral of the fleet, near Ryde, Isle of Wight. He was 91 years old, having been born in the year 1779 at a village.

The curious discovery has been made by an English surgeon that monkeys can not be poisoned with strychnine. They seem to eat all kinds of poison with impunity. Monkeys, then, are slightly different from men.

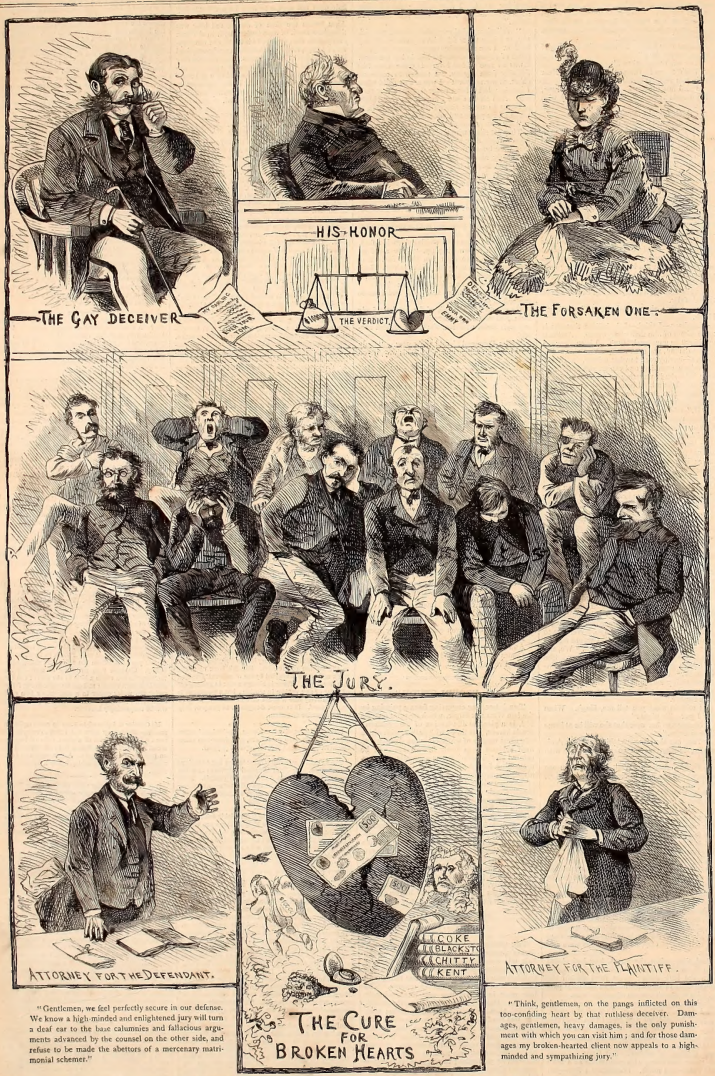
An English engineer, living on the shores of the Adriatic, has recently submitted to the Board of Admiralty a deadly torpedo. The inventor declines to explain the secret of its powers, but says that it is the depositary of his own secret. The torpedo is in the shape of a large fish, floating at any determined depth under the surface of the water, but furnished with explosive matter, but the motive power is the aforesaid secret, provided by himself. The inventor is like a sword-fish, with not only a snout in front, but with a motion propelling him at any rate and darting up vertically. Charged with dynamite or nitro-glycerine, and provided with a hook to attach to the ship, great iron-built vessel—and can be made to run forward under the water either in a straight or in a curved line. With such engines of destruction, naval battles will be surpassingly horrible.

M. Ollivier is believed to have in contemplation a measure which may have the effect of greatly deadening in Paris. Instead of a short time of imprisonment, a fine of 100 francs is to be inflicted both on principals and seconds. A few sentences of this sort rightly enforced would produce a most salutary effect.

It is curious to notice what various forms Parisian journals adopt when they allude to the Emperor. The Journal officiel describes him as "S. M. l'Empereur," Constitutionnel, His Majesty the Emperor; Presse, the Emperor; Paris Soir, Napoleon III.; Vie, Napoleon III.; Cloche, Napoleon; Rèveil, the Executive; Figaro, Cæsar; Marseillaise, Sardanapalus, Herod, and Heliogabalus.

Professor Blot is looking round for a larger kitchen; his establishment is not extensive enough to satisfy Brooklyn. It is, however, remarkable sufficiently to make the practical experiment of having their cooking done in the most artistic and artificial manner. His culinary establishment is a marvel of neatness and order.

We note that an establishment on the same general plan is about to begin operations as quite an extensive scale in Boston. It is located in Washington Street, near the old Roxbury line; but order boxes are thick all over the city, and more are being put up daily. Orders from these boxes are collected twice a day, and an extra force is employed to get them all punctually answered. Here is a special bill of fare for each day of the week. Any one accustomed to any thing that he chooses, on any day of the week, by having such a card sent to him, and can thus recover a dinner of several courses for a party of any size, down to the simple lunch of a man at his place of business. The prices charged seem quite reasonable.

A new dispensary has been opened on Broadway, between Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth streets, for the gratuitous treatment of diseases of the throat and chest. The institution has acquired a high reputation for skill in such diseases, is the attending physician, the institution having been established by his influence.


"Gentlemen, we feel perfectly secure in our defense. We know a high-minded and enlightened jury will turn a deaf ear to the base calumnies and fallacious arguments advanced by the counsel on the other side, and refuse to be made the abettors of a mercenary matrimonial schemer."

"Think, gentlemen, on the pangs inflicted on this too-confiding heart by that ruthless deceiver. Damages, gentlemen, heavy damages, is the only punishment with which you can visit him; and for those damages my broken-hearted client now appeals to a high-minded and sympathizing jury."

BREACH OF PROMISE—HOW TO REPAIR BROKEN HEARTS.—[FROM A SKETCH BY PARK BENJAMIN.]

JAPANESE LADIES.

JAPANESE LADIES.

THE strange figures in our illustration on this page exhibit the street costume of the fashionable ladies of Japan. They certainly present a very absurd appearance; but if a Japanese artist were to visit New York to-day, would he not find in Broadway and Fifth Avenue costumes equally grotesque and ugly, and even more deficient in the qualities of good taste and refinement? Before we laugh at the costumes of these semi-civilized people, perhaps it would be well to inquire whether our friends of the Celestial Empire are altogether unjust in styling us "outside barbarians" in matters of taste and fashion. Ladies who take delight in the fulsomeness of the "Grecian bend" have little right to laugh at their Japanese sisters.

A PARISIAN BALLET GIRL.

THERE are two sides to the life of ballet girls in Paris. The sad fate which awaits most members of this strange profession, of which Anglo-Saxon countries happily know but little, is sometimes relieved by a happier experience; and I may as well illustrate it by the story of a young ballet girl, told to me by my friend Monsieur Paul, as we sat sipping post-prandial cognac at the Grand Café. Her motives for becoming a danseuse, her conduct on the stage and off, were as praiseworthy and proper as one would find in any class of society. I will follow as nearly as I can the words of Paul in relating it. They had just brought out, he said, at the Porte St. Martin, a great spectacular piece, of rare attractions, requiring a very numerous corps de ballet. The sub-manager, a friend of Paul's, had invited him behind the scenes on the first night of the representation. He went, and had his usual chat with his favorites in the corps, in the green-room, before the rising of the curtain. While in the green-room he noticed, sitting quite apart from the rest of the girls, a young danseuse whom he had seen a few times before, and to whom he had always spoken in vain; she never would answer him; and he always remarked that she treated the other gallants in the same distant way. On this evening she was sitting apart, and Paul observed that tears were rolling down her cheeks, which were thickly rouged. She was attired, very thinly, in scant pink gauze. He approached her, and, touched by her evident depression, asked what the matter was. She shook her head, and turned away. One of the other girls —a bold huzzy—came up, on this, and said: "Can't you guess what's the matter with our fine little Mademoiselle Eulalie? Why she's crying because she's got to appear in that light dress and offer the king, in the play, a goblet of wine, kneeling. How terrible!" And the speaker bounced off, laughing.

"We Frenchmen," said Paul to me, "are so hardened by our devil-my-care life that we are seldom susceptible to pity. But I was really touched by Mlle. Eulalie's emotion; perhaps it was because she was unusually pretty, and so wonderfully fresh and innocent.

During the play Paul saw her on the stage. The poor thing was forcing a smile during the first acts; but when it came to the place where she had to kneel, and thus expose herself to the rude gaze of the parterre, she hesitated and trembled like a leaf; and the tears came once more, and by an agonizing effort were forced back. When she arose, her own modest color so mounted to her face as to quite outblush her rouge paint; and after the last act she went into the greenroom again—and fainted. Paul felt interested, and, bien sûr as was, from his heart sympathised with the poor thing. It wasn't a sham, he thought, and he considered himself a good judge. In a work or so, after a good deal of effort, he managed, by getting the sub-manager to introduce him, to make Mlle. Eulalie's acquaintance; and he assured me he never was further from having an unworthy motive in his life. He assured me, further, that the first beginning of his acquaintance with this poor girl was from a feeling akin to pity, and not from any dishonorable thought concerning her.

"And thank God," continued Paul, "she's out of that abominable place now!"

After an acquaintance in which he had to win her confidence by the most genuine steps—for she was most timid as well as modest—he learned her history, and with it, to venereal regret respect this same poor, simple ballet girl.

"I suppose," said Paul, "my interest in her at first arose from the difference between her and the rest; she was a phenomenon."

Her real name was Virginie Vallier—Eulalie was her fancy stage-name. She was eighteen. Her father was dead; her mother had married again, her second husband having been till within a year a joiner; but meeting with an accident, the step-father had become invalided, and was the inmate of a suburban maison de santé. Her mother was a very sickly but pretty woman of fifty-two, and by her second husband had a family of three small girls. Since her husband's misfortunes she had hardly been able to make out for what she did was to copy documents for lawyers and attorneys; for she had had a good education, and this has always been a regular occupation for many French people of the lower bourgeois class. Madame Vallier herself, though once been poor, had learned it in her younger days, and had since taught governesses how to do the per-like hand." It appears that a nephew of the unfortunate step-father was acting in scenic pieces at the Châtelet, and was on good terms in his art. He, observing the advantage which young Françoise possessed—her pretty person, of movement, and freshness—proposed that she should take lessons for the ballet. She studied the matter, who refreshed her counsel; she showed heroic little girl, though shuddering at the prospect, was so earnest in favor of the task that she at last won Madame Reynard's consent.

The girl now the difficulties her mother had in providing means for her subsistence as well as the support of the unfortunate invalid at the asylum, and was ambitious only to make money for their supporting them. Her cousin was able to be of great assistance; he engaged a master at less than half price, to be paid from the first earnings of Françoise; and when she became proficient, which she did very rapidly (she had natural and natural quickness), he procured her a good situation at one of the smaller theatres, where she at first, of course, appeared as figurante. She rose quickly, had the satisfaction of earning home a goodly number of francs every week, and of seeing both her mother and her poor imbecile step-father supplied with many comforts of which they had been long deprived.

The occasion of which Paul spoke, when she was so agitated and shaken with fear, was that in which she had been called on to appear as a prominent figure in the scene, and to dress with that voluptuous abandon which is peculiar on the Paris stage; and that explains her distress. But her excellent behavior did not cause with the emotion and sacrifice. When she came to the ballet, rehearsal mornings, she was observed to carry a little parcel of papers, neatly and snugly wrapped up and tied; and at intervals, when she was not wanted on the stage, she was seen sitting with great rapidity at one of the rickety deal tables in the green-room.

She was doing her mother's copy work.

And more. Immediately after rehearsal, which lasted till or after twelve, she went home and continued her copying, working at it three or four hours; then she went to the market and bought a basket of fruit, with which she rode in an omnibus to the asylum, and treated the imbecile father to the coveted delicacies. Returning home she took a slight dinner, washed up the dishes, and was off again buying the next day's provisions. At six she returned to the theatre, where she staid till after midnight. When she was weary spectacle at last came to its grand sulphur and serial scene, and the curtain swung heavily down, shutting out the staring gazers of the audience, and leaving the stage blank and desolate, her cousin escorted her quickly through the scene lumber room into promptly at six in the morning, made breakfast, cleared up the dishes, and set at once to writing again. And working like this, exactly, Francoise managed to gather, toward the end of her stage career (for she was, happily, near the end when Paul became acquainted with her), about one hundred francs a week, which was a capital income for poor Parisian folk. And there never was a word of scandal whispered against her, but it was remarked by all her associates and originally she bore herself in all her toil and trouble.

"Now," said Paul, "is not this a character worth celebrating in a story? Why don't you, who write for the papers and so on, take it up?"

"Perhaps I shall," said I. "Where is Mlle. Eulalie now?"

"Such a girl," replied my friend, "was sure to be found out and appreciated. A young lawyer's clerk, a Protestant, of thoroughly respectable family, and a competency in money, was struck by her modesty, her zeal, her heroism. She became his wife six months ago, and is studying under his affectionate tuition."

One good redeeming Paris story, though I. But it is perhaps a single flower in a desert—or rather, a gentle violet in a huge partere of flaunting peonies. As has been said, the lives of most ballet girls are almost unmitigatedly bad. And how should they be otherwise? The associations of the theatre in any country are too apt to be demoralizing, especially to the young and helpless; and in France, where morality is at a low ebb, the evil is magnified. But the public must be reminded at any cost; and the case of a few score of young girls is a trifle, when put in comparison with the sanction of the enterprising manager to delight his friends with a display of seductive female beauty.

It was charming indeed to listen to the story of Eulalie; and when I saw Paul, callous, blasé youth of the world, moved with genuine emotions as he told it, I felt that the gay Parisian natures, after all, was not altogether hopeless.

LIFE UNDER THE OCEAN.

THE question of the mode of nutrition of animals at the bottom of the sea is a very interesting one. The practical distinction between plants and animals is, that plants prepare the food of animals by decomposing certain inorganic substances which animals can not use as food, and recombining their elements into a variety of compounds upon which animals can feed. This process is, however, constantly effected under the influence of light. It is only where there is light in the depths, and naturally there are no plants found in the depths of the sea or lake of animal life. On what do these animals feed? The answer seems to be sufficiently simple: nearly all, if not entirely all, feed on the dead animal matter for the small number of higher forms feed upon plants—but upon one another. Nature is economical, whose distinctive character is that they have no special organs of nutrition, but that they absorb nourishment through the whole surface of their jelly-like bodies. Most of these animals secrete exquisitely formed skeletons, external or internal, sometimes of silica. There is no doubt that they extract both of these substances from the seawater, although silica often exists in such quantities so small as to elude detection by chemical tests. All sea-water contains a certain proportion of organic matter in solution. Its sources are obvious. All rivers contain a huge quantity; every drop of water from the land which averages about a mile in width of clive and red sea-weeds: in the middle of the ocean there is a marine meadow, the Sargasso Sea, extending over three millions of square miles: the sea is full of animals which are constantly dying and decaying; and the water of the Gulf Stream, especially, current coasts usually show a quantity of organic matter is enormous. It is, therefore, quite intelligible that a world of animals should live in these depths of the sea, on the supposition that they should chiefly belong to a class capable of extracting their own nourishment through the surface, of matter in solution; developing but little heat, and incurring a very small amount of waste by any manifestation of gital activity.

Haste, if not necessity, makes a Hair Dressing indispensable to many. The new "Vicos," which Dr. Ayer's laboratory issues as the best Hair Dressing, will no have ever tried. It restores not only the color, but the gloss and luxuriance to faded and gray hair. —(Jos.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PIMPLES ON THE FACE.

Comedones, Black-Heads, Flesh Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, and Blotched Disfigurations of the Face, originate from a Suppressed Secretion, and are positively cured by Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It tones the Skin, prevents Wrinkles, opens the pores, evokes morbid Secretions, cures all Eruptions of the Skin, and contains no Lead poison.

Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all Druggists. Send for Circular.

ROGERS'
Groups of Statuary.

These groups will please, with all the express changes prepaid, to any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz.:

Council of War, $75. Taking the Oath, $20. Courtship and Marriage, $15. Sharp Shooter, $10. Home Guard, $10. Each.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

Address
JOHN ROGERS,
212 Fifth Ave.,
New York.

Heavy Rolled-Gold
HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, are manufactured on the most correct and improved principles, and warranted for finish and wear equal to some SOLID GOLD. Price $20.

Fac-simile Waltham Patent Levers, $20; Chronometer Balance, $20; Lever Escapement, Hunting-case, Stiffarm, $25; Aluminium Bronze Full-Jeweled Patent Lever, $15 and $20: Metal Hunting-Case Watches, for Peddlers' Trade, $6 per dozen. Heavy Rolled-Gold Chains, most approved styles, $2 to $10 each. Expressed C. O. D., with permission to examine, by paying the Express agent charges both ways.

JOHN FOGGAN, Watch Importer and Dealer,
No. 79 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$20 A DAY. Business new. For circulars and sample, send 25c. to C. E. BAND & CO., Bridgeport, Ct.

HITCHCOCK'S HALF-DIME MUSIC.

The cheap system of Music in the United States and Canada was originated in the Fall of 1868 by BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, of the City of New York, and by great expense the Half-Dime and Ten-Cent or Dime Series have been introduced into nearly every household. Both these Titles are claimed and copyrighted under Copyrights and as Trade-Marks. Dealers as well as Purchasers of Music can therefore readily discriminate between the deserving enterprise which has established a valuable and cheap country, and the lack of moral honesty which has induced unscrupulous imitators to endeavor to profit by the advertising and labor of the Author of these Series.

CATALOGUE OF HALF-DIME MUSIC.
☞ The Price of each Number is FIVE CENTS. ☜

NO.	AUTHOR.	NO.	AUTHOR.
1.	Captain Jinks.	94.	Continental Schottische.
2.	Won't You Tell Me Why, Robin?	95.	The Cavalier.
3.	We'd Better Bide a Wee.	96.	Beautiful Rose.
4.	Blue Eyes.	97.	I'm not Myself at all.
5.	Not Enough.	98.	Nan Gossip.
6.	Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye.	99.	Molly Bawn.
7.	I Think When I Take a Small Many.	100.	Gambling Waltz.
8.	Praise of Tears.	101.	Go it while You're Young.
9.	Champagne Charlie.	102.	Mollie Darling.
10.	Skating Schottische.	103.	Rose-wood Tree.
11.	Come Back to Erin.	104.	Old Oak Tree and Evergreen Tree.
12.	The Dublin Boy's Whistle.	105.	Oh! I Have a Song!
13.	The Dublin Boy's Whistle.	106.	This World is Full of Beauty.
14.	Little Nugget Mine.	107.	Sweet Kate Kearney.
15.	Maggie's Secret.	108.	Good-Night.
16.	His Love Modes over all.	109.	Far Away Maid.
17.	The Old Cottage Clock.	110.	Dancing Shadow.
18.	Silver Threads.	111.	Old Massa Gone.
19.	The Rose of Erin.	112.	O Take Me to Thy Heart Again.
20.	Arnie-Arnie. Polka Mazurka.	113.	Mary Blane Polka.
21.	She might not Suit your Fancy.	114.	Only a Lock of Hair.
22.	Wait till the Clouds Roll By.	115.	Ida Lee Polka.
23.	Waltz of Flowers at Long Branch.	116.	Wive at Swallows Homeward Fly.
24.	Still I Love Them.	117.	Then You'll Remember Me.
25.	The Flowing Bell. Sacred Song.	118.	Little Bird, Little Bird on the Tree.
26.	Take Back the Heart.	119.	She is not Fair to Outward View.
27.	See her Abroad Hero. Inst'l.	120.	Where has my Love Been.
28.	There's a Charm in Spring.	121.	The Drowning-Room Schottische.
29.	Up in a Balloon.	122.	Sparkling Eyes.
30.	Olympic Schottische.	123.	The Love Light in your Eyes.
31.	Little Nell.	124.	The Boy's Good Bye.
32.	Beautiful Bells.	125.	Bodkin.
33.	Light of the World. Sacred Song.	126.	Rodwell.
34.	The Life Boat.	127.	Rodwell.
35.	Sweet Bird of the Forest.	128.	Hatton.
36.	I will not Speak to Them Inst'l.	129.	Hatton.
37.	Susan's Story.	130.	Ah, Viviani.
38.	Power of Love. Inst'l.	131.	Viviani.
39.	Flying Trapeze.	132.	Guglielmo.
40.	Belles of Savannah.	133.	Raymond.
41.	Gems from Orpheus. Violin and Piano.	134.	Raymond.
42.	Gems from Faust. Violin and Piano.	135.	Raymond.
43.	Velocipede Johnny.	136.	Leander.
44.	St. Nicholas Polka.	137.	Bailey.
45.	The Moonlit Sea.	138.	Proctor.
46.	Sweet Violets Waltz. Inst'l.	139.	Offenbach.
47.	Home, Sweet Home. Inst'l.	140.	Richards.
48.	Old Folks at Home. Polka. Inst'l.	141.	Richards.
49.	Life Boat Polka. Inst'l.	142.	Offenbach.
50.	Call me Pink Gem.	143.	L'Eclair.
51.	Why Weep Here?	144.	Nahan.
52.	Pretty, Pretty Bird.	145.	Waverly.
53.	Three Fingers on the Bells.	146.	Raymond.
54.	Five O'Clock in the Morning.	147.	Claribel.
55.	Lily Dale.	148.	Waverly.
56.	Rosh-Buck's Song.	149.	Waverly.
57.	Sweetheart.	150.	Bailey.
58.	The Smile of Memory.	151.	Waverly.
59.	Make Haste.	152.	Irving.
60.	Meet Me in the Lane, Love.	153.	Raymond.
61.	Rose of Killarney.	154.	Raymond.
62.	The Fairy Bell.	155.	Raymond.
63.	Where there's a Will there's a Way.	156.	Sear.
64.	Be Mine Dearest.	157.	Glover.
65.	Boston Belles.	158.	Raymond.
66.	Gentleman's Own Belles.	159.	Raymond.
67.	Barney O'Rea.	160.	Lover.
68.	My Mother Dear.	161.	Lover.
69.	Day and Night I Thought of Thee.	162.	Shirtall.
70.	The Pleasant Life.	163.	Covert.
71.	My Angel.	164.	Guglielmo.
72.	Oh, Ye Pretty, Blue-Eyed Witch.	165.	Bayley.
73.	Oh would I were a Bird.	166.	Bumpkin.
74.	The Fairy Bell.	167.	Waverly.
75.	Mary Blane.	168.	Scotch.
76.	After Dark.	169.	Scotch.
77.	The Beautiful Young Lady.	170.	Raymond.
78.	Larboard Watch. Duet.	171.	Copeland.
79.	Mary Ann.	172.	Knight.
80.	Maggie Morgan.	173.	Hunt.
81.	Willie with the Wooing.	174.	Adams.
82.	School for Jolly Dogs.	175.	Adams.
83.	Kitty Tyrrel.	176.	Wallace.
84.	The Bell goes a Ringing for Sairah.	177.	Rogers.
85.	Castles in the Air.	178.	Rogers.
86.	Scenes that are Brightest.	179.	Rogers.
87.	Old Folks at Home. Duet.	180.	Rogers.
88.	Cremorne Polka Mazurka.	181.	Bernard.
89.	Nothing Else Will.	182.	Lover.
90.	Ke-Bosh Polka.	183.	Knight.
91.	Sally, Sally.
92.	Of what is the Old Man Thinking?

The above are sold by dealers everywhere, or can be ordered through any Newsdealer. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. Any 20 pieces sent in pasteboard rollers on receipt of $1. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.

Send for Catalogue.

Eight per Cent. Gold
FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS
OF THE ISSUE OF
$1,500,000
ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in the New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold. Trustees, Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $13,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. The line connects St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, will make a short and through route to California. For Complete particulars call at office.

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 1,600,000 acres, which, at the lowest estimate, at.....$4,000,000
First Mortgage Bonds.....1,500,000
Total.....$15,500,000

Length of Road, 171 miles. Price 97½ and accrued interest. Circulars and maps free. The undersigned, also, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. Subscriptions will be received at the Company's office, No. 54 Pine street, New York, and by bankers and duly authorized agents throughout the United States.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,
No. 54 Pine Street, New York.
TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,
No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

1000 CHILDREN'S CARRIAGES, from $4 to $25. L. P. TIBBALS, 479 Broadway, New York. Carriage Repaired.

MAPLE SUGAR, Young Hyson Tea, Pitudield, Mass., Rev. C. S. Seward, Principal. The best semi-annual term opens March 9, 1870.

ESTB. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1849.
(111 Washington St., N.Y.)
SAPOLIO
THE BEST THING OUT FOR CLEANING
Windows (without Water), Paint, Oilcloths, Floors, Tables, and all Woodwork, China, Glass, Looking-Glass, Mirrors, and for General House-Cleaning Purposes.
FOR POLISHING
Knives, Tin Ware, Brass, Steel, Iron, and all Metallic Wares. REMOVES, as by Magic, Stains and Rust, leaving a brilliant surface, equal to New.
Removes Stains from Marble, Paint, and Wood.
Is not injurious, and QUICKER, BETTER, and CHEAPER than Soda, Rock, Rotten Stone, Acid, or Lye. It will be found, on trial, the most perfect, reliable, and indispensable article ever offered to the public—it dispenses with one entirely; in fact, a preparation no individual or class can afford to do without.
We refer to the many testimonials in our possession, from families, hotels, and manufacturers; also to more than FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND persons who have it in daily use in house and shop, and will send you little to test our claims—do it.
For Sale—Wholesale and Retail—by Grocery, Drug, and Notion Houses throughout the United States.

OLD AND NEW.

Edited by Rev. E. E. HALE.

MARCH.

RELIGION.

Revelation. Henry James.
Things New and Old. Washington Gladden.

EDUCATION.

The School Master and the Bureau. Sidney Andrews.
What a Young Man Needs at College. President Stearns.
Religion in Schools. A. D. Mayo.

TRAVEL.

Nature and the Great Railroad. (Illustrated.) W. T. Brigham.
In Search of a Climate.

NATIONAL POLITY.

England's New Colony.
The March of Empire. J. K. Hosmer.

LITERATURE.

Stories by Miss Foke, John C. Rose, Frederic Jacobs.
Poetry by Paul H. Hayne, T. W. Parsons, Mrs. Whitney, Miss Palfrey.

THE EXAMINER.

Criticisms calling attention to notable new books.

RECORD OF PROGRESS.

A Model Town in England; Sunday in its Practical Relations; Protestantism at the Court of Good Hope; The Hebrews in Cincinnati, &c., &c.

For Sale by all Newsdealers.
35 cents. $4 00 a year.

Published by H. O. HOUGHTON & CO.,
Riverside, Cambridge, Mass.

Trade supplied by the News Companies.

JUST THIS ONCE.—Reader, the "Star-Spangled Banner," the cheapest and best paper of its class, elects you a member of the Grand Order. It has tears or tears—one of good, joyful, sympathetic tears—for the beggar; but it is independent—fearless—free. In its columns are revealed facts, humbugs, and a very few pitiful sneaky apologies for newspapers, who, jealous of its immense success, would deceive people 10 times in giving it gratuitous advertising. Let us tell you what it is. It is a large, folio-size sheet, 8 pages, 40 columns, illustrated, floridly overflowing with Wit, Humor, Fun, Satire, Quirks, and all the combined polity that can be condensed into its bright and sparkling pages. It has good, fair, reliable stories, and will arouse the sensible kind, a very little stand, and a perfect storm of fun in the ranks of humanity, from the old sedentary body clan. It is the very paper that constantly titulates every humbug. It tates and fights liars, slanderers, thieves, and false pretenders, while it works for good humor, good objects, and for TRUTH. We have still plenty of Accepted Agencies (Local Agents Plates). We will carefully mount one on a roller, send it to you postage paid, and the paper 4 WEEKS A YEAR, FOR ONLY 75 CENTS.

Will you not try it once. It is not a "humbug" we are responsible. We promise to refund your money if you are not delighted. THIS IS JUST THE TIME. Specimens, 6 cents. Will you not send only 75 cents to the people's friend?

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

THE VETERAN OF THE GRAND ARMY.

A Novel of thrilling interest; characters drawn from life. It exhibits the powers and passions working of the G. A. R., and brings to view remarkable characters developed by the war for the Union. Just the novel semi-monthly, in Eight Parts, at 35 cents per part, by CYRUS & ALFRED CRIPPEN, Publishers.

Parts 1 and 2 now ready. The Trade supplied by the AMERICAN and NEW YORK NEWS COMPANIES.

Opinions of the Press.

"The first part indicates that the story will be interesting, full of incident, and worthy of general circulation."—Boston Daily Journal.

"The first part is handsomely printed, and opens very favorably."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"The first part only has yet been issued; but this, besides being very handsomely printed, opens in a way into an interesting and exciting story."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

PREFERENCE GIVEN TO SOLDIERS AS AGENTS.

BOONEY & CO.'S CHAMPION MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A new Catalogue ready, free on application. Glee Books, Choir Books, Operas and Oratorio Choruses, for the use of Choral Societies, 8 cents each. THE BALLAD SINGER—a new book for Schools and the best composers, 8 cents each. THE MUSICAL CABINET—a complete library of modern music, collected and Secular, Vocal and Instrumental, in books, 50 cents each. HUGHLIGHT MUSICAL BOOK, and elegant series of popular music-books, 40 cents each. ORATORIOS ANCIENT AND MODERN, and OPERATORIOS AND STUDIES, for all instruments, 50 cents each. PRACTICAL METHOD FOR THE FLUTE, by the FLUTE LIBRARY, 13 books, 50 cents each. SCHOOL MUSIC BOOKS, by L. O. Emerson, Tourjee, Eastman, Perkins, and others, 50 cents. Send for catalogue, with words and music, Operas in Piano-forte Duets, Music for Bands, &c. Any book sent for examination at price and perfectly satisfactory in shape.—New York Times. To be had of all music and book dealers.

BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

"It is inferior to no paper of its class in America."—The Fredericktown, N. B., Farmer gives this as its opinion of the and we invite your subscriptions, believing that you will get your money's worth.

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

Terms: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year. Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

H. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

SOMETHING NEW.

Two Million Copies of the Annual SHAKESPERIAN ALMANAC for 1870 will be given away. It is the intention that the distribution may be made as rapidly as possible. I should not wish to have it sold, but desire it to come as a gift to every one who subscribes for letters now to be published. Send for a circular to me or the Seven Acre of Man's Life, and it will be forwarded in a manner. Address DR. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 81 Grand Street, Jersey City, New Jersey.

A New Theory Concerning

CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS.—Dr. C. A. WHITE, No. 30 West Twenty-Sixth St., New York, during his sojourn in France, discovered a new and successful mode of treating diseases of the Lungs and Liver. The patients not only feel better and stop coughing, but it is well established, according to the statistics of the Hospitals.

Dr. WHITE sends a pamphlet, demonstrating this new practice, free to all who apply for it by mail.

$200 $25

The celebrated DITMARSH GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Gerold)—Thoroughly established. Watches have been on time—thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation established. Manufactured expressly for sale, and no well established as to require any recommendations. Prices:—Full-jeweled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance to fine solid gold cases costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance $200 gold watch. Only for these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $10 to $6. Also, Solid Gold Jewelry, equal, at one-half the usual prices.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have ever seen.—N. Y. Times.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Herald.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have found no reason for recommending them.—Tribune & Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the

UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

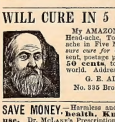
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 49 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

THE RAMSDELL NORWAY OATS.

Every person who owns a farm, garden, or village lot, should send for our large illustrated circular, containing a full and interesting account of this wonderful grain. We send it free. 10 to 150 bushels per acre can be grown; and it will pay, on every one will want to buy seed when they see it growing. Several farmers have made purchases the past year, and more will do so the coming season. Look out for counterfeit seed, which is being offered by unprincipled parties. Send orders to the originators. Price $2 50 per bushel; 85 per half bushel; $1 50 per peck, and free. D. W. RAMSDELL & CO., 119 Pearl Street, New York; 181 South Canal, Chicago, Ill.; or 611 Fourth Street, St. Louis, Mo.

40,000 Sold.—The wonder of the World. The Magnetic Thief Indicator, or "Dollar Watch." A Reward Offered. Detects each and every kind of Gold, Superior Compass attachment, Enameled Dial, Hour and Hour works, glass crystal, size of Dollar watch. Will denote correct time, warranted five years, expects each day, minutes and minutes. This is not WOOD Compass. Is entirely new, patented, 6000 sold in three weeks. Only $1 each, mailed free, in neat morocco case. Trade supplied at a liberal sale manufacturers. MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Boston.

WILL CURE IN 5 MINUTES.



BY AMAZON ROOT will cure Head-ache, Tooth-ache, or Ear-ache in 5 minutes. Only sure cure for Catarrh. Will be sent postpaid on receipt of 50 cents, to any part of the world. Try it.

G. E. ALZORA, M.D.,
No. 335 Broadway, New York.

SAVE MONEY.—Harmless and elegant. Save your Hair. Dr. Marsh's Prescriptions and Recipe for Hair Restorative, Hair Oils and Dyes. Communications to beautify the complexion; to remove pimples, freckles, and tan, spots, and safety; to restore gray hair; to force the whiskers, &c., to grow in three weeks; to make a permanent and safe Hair Restorative; various Medical Prescriptions, &c. Any Druggist will procure them. Address Dr. C. P. MARSH, Box D., C. P. McLANE, Box 1263, Buffalo, N. Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of these Presses, and a little time spent in learning it, every man can do his own printing, than save many times its cost annually. Each press contains full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., and a great deal of information for men-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., to cuts. ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Murray Street, New York.

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Sample and circular sticking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me.; Boston, Mass.; or Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass for the best Family Chart. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. Agents Wanted! All classes of people need our Self book. It tells "ALL ABOUT" hunting, fishing, trapping, and farming. Big Pay. Big Sale. Any one can make reliable book on hunting and trapping; nearly 100 pp. and over 50 fine cuts. Price only 50 cents. Send for 25 cents. Send to the revised publishers,

HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Agents! Read this!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address SHAW & CO., Marshall, Mich.

THE MAGIC EGG.—Agents wanted. Sales 25 per day by the sale of three amazing and singular articles. Sample Egg and articles by mail, post-paid, 25 cents. Address W. EARL, 56 Lught Street, N. Y.

WANTED.—For the address of my energetic canvassers. Salary or fees. Profits large. Goods ready. Profits paying $35 to $50 per day, free. Address D. S. LEXINGTON & CO., 162 Nassau Street, New York.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SUGAR, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address P. T. BARNUM, Bridgeport, Conn., Proprietor of Vinegar Bitters.

$25 CAPITAL.—Partner wanted in every Town in the U.S. Business new and permanent. Address M. C. HOGUET, Solicitor of Patents, 67 Nassau Street, New York.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.—Any book sent by mail pronounced on a smooth face in six weeks. Price 50 cents. Prof. MILLER, Adams, Mass.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR—Pickpocket Detective—and Capillary Pen Fountain. Mailed on receipt of 50 cents each. HENRY GAY, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.

Mrs. M. HOGUET, Bridgeport, N. J.

EMPLOYMENT.—$100 a month with Stencil Dies, 11 Samples free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR MARCH 1870.

CONTENTS:

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Study.—Mummy of a Cat.—Turvy's Ancient Occupation.—Pussy in Clover.—Pussy in Japan.—Pussy and her Kittens.—On the Sofa.—After the Tailor.—Curtailing.—Literal Sine Labore.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—IV. THE MARRIAGE OF THE CROWN PRINCE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Betrothal.—Frederick and Wilhelmina.—The King and his Servant.—Frik in his Library.—The Ball Supper.

SHADOWS.

SAVOYARD COMMON CARBINE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Wooping-Tree.—Rales's Experiment.—An Aerial Tree.—Dubosq's Experiment.—Guerin's Experiment.—Murchison's Experiment.—The Monkey-Cup.—The Cow-Tree.—The Wine-Tree.—The Flabellaria.—A Tidal Inundation.—The Proverca.—Shells of the Infusoria.—A Floating Iceberg—Spectre of the Brocken.—The Delta of the Nile.

BROKEN MUSIC.

CHATTY-CHAT SAUNTERINGS IN ENGLAND—(Sawster V., Part II.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Shanklin Cliss.—John Keats.—Bonchurch.—Ventnor, from Pulpit Rock.—The Well of St. Lawrence.—Ventnor Downs.—Black-Gang Chine.—Carisbrooke Castle.—Elizabeth's Well.—Scatchell's Bay and the Needle Rocks.—The Natural Reemy.—Farringford, the Residence of Alfred Tennyson.

A NEW JUDGMENT OF PARIS.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

MISS ELLINGTON'S NIECE.

A BRAVE LADY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Waiting on the Stair.—"She used sometimes to hear her Children's Voices about the empty House."

OUR RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

EDITORS: Quoted from this Number, the Author having failed to furnish Copy in time for publication.

JESSIE.

OLIVER, LIBERATOR OF SOUTH AMERICA.

ON A PHOTOGRAPH OF ATHENS.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume. Back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number issued after receipt of order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given. It is all necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, a Post-Office Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to all other forms, as the risk of losing the letter or its contents, if it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine—Whole Page, $150; Half Page, $75; Quarter Page, $38—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar—$1 50 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

PIMPLES.

The undersigned will cheerfully mail (free) to all who wish it, the Recipe and full directions for preparing and using a simple and beautifying VEGETABLE BALM, that will immediately remove TAN, FRECKLES, PIMPLES, ERUPTIONS and Blotches, leaving the skin soft, clear, smooth, and beautiful. Also, a sure and effectual method for preventing, by return mail, the Hair from falling off, and for producing a new and luxuriant growth of hair on a bald head of smooth face.

The above can be obtained by return mail, by addressing THOS. F. CHAPMAN, CHEMIST, P. O. Box 5138. 186 Broadway, New York.

WATCH FREE! And $200 a day sure. No humbug. No gift enterprise. No money wanted in advance. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

A VALUABLE RECIPE.—Every family should have it. Given free. Address C. F. RICHARDS, 76 Fifth Ave., Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE BEWITCHING BROKERS.—WOMEN ON 'CHANGE.

A NEW DISCOVERY!!

PHALON'S

"VITALIA;"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Grey Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or fluorine matter, requires no shaking, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to exert a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N. Y.

Stammering

Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., Box 5076, New York.

$250 CITY LOTS.—Advance 100 per cent. annually. E. C. BLAKESLEE, 47 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

NEW YORK.

Steinway & Sons,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT

PIANO-FORTES,

Beg to Announce

A GENERAL REDUCTION

in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Pianos. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long-felt and frequently-expressed want, by persons of moderate means, teachers, schools, &c., have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of instrument, termed

The "School" Piano.

A thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior mechanism, and workmanship as their Parlor Pianos, but with plain, but the only difference being their Cases, of which a comprehensive and perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means.

At Exceedingly Moderate Prices.

STEINWAY & SONS also desire to call special attention to their new

PATENT UPRIGHT PIANOS,

with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Price-Lists and Illustrated Catalogues mailed free on application.

EVERY PIANO is WARRANTED for 5 YEARS.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall, Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth St. (Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place), New York.

WARNER, PECK, & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Children's Carriages,

Springfield, Mass.

GREGORY'S SEED CATALOGUE.

MY ANNUAL CATALOGUE, containing a list of many novelties, besides all the standard vegetables of the garden, is now ready, and will be sent to all applicants with a choice selection of Flower Seed, will be forwarded gratis to all. To any seed-dealer I will prove any list presented. I warrant it shall reach each purchaser. I warrant all flower forwarded shall reach me. Send for catalogue.

JAMES J. H. GREGORY, MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

$732 in 31 DAYS

Made by one Agent, selling SILVER'S PATENT ELASTIC BRACE. Address SILVER MANUFACTURING CO., Box Hooper Grobe and American Agriculturist. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. CASSO & CO., 39 Cortlandt St., N. Y.; 139 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

SHERMAN'S PATENT BRAKE, to prevent Retrograde Motion on Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines. Sent by mail, postage paid, with Instructions for using, on the receipt of $1 00.

AGENTS WANTED. Address

SHERMAN PATENT BRAKE COMPANY,

Box 5810, Philadelphia, Pa.

Woodward's ARCHITECTURE.

Designs and Hints on Building. With priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, 25 cents per annum.

Books sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Harney's Barns, Out-buildings, & Fences.

Just published, with 200 Designs & Plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fence, Stable Fittings and Furniture.

Ten Dollars.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village and Suburban Houses, with Specifications and Estimates.

Twelve Dollars.

Woodward's Suburban & Country Houses.

70 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses.

188 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Country Homes.

150 Designs. $1 50.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,

191 Broadway, New York.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY, Can not be Excelled.

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Triple Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED; and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, HALLGROUND, CROSS, SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

"ECONOMY IS WEALTH"—FRANKLIN.

WHY will people pay $50 or more for a Sewing Machine when $27 will buy one that has a standard reputation, a genuine thread, complete with all the instructed upon entirely new and practical principles, and is fully warranted for three years. These celebrated Machines, fully licensed, are intended for poor people who want to save time, labor, and money. Agents Wanted. Machines sent to Agents and given away to needy families. For circulars and reduced prices, address J. C. UTTIS & CO., or FRANKLIN and DIAMOND S. M. CO., Box 757, Boston, Mass.

A Novelty. Gent Cigar Tip. Samples, 50 cents. A. GRANT, Box 5486, N. Y. P. O.

ELGIN WATCHES

MANUFACTURED BY

The National Watch Company.

All the Grades of the Elgin Watches,

INCLUDING THE

"LADY ELGIN,"

READY FOR

SPRING TRADE.

The Company also call the attention of Watch buyers to the fact that the Elgin Watches now offered have several peculiar improvements over all others, and also a new as constructed as to enclose the works, and form a protection against dust, enabling the movement to remain in order without cleaning double the time that a watch will ordinarily run without this protection.

PATENT DUST EXCLUDER,

The Company feel confident, after having had their Watches three years in market, and selling many thousands of them in all parts of the country, that the Elgin Watches are the best time-keepers now offered to the American public, for either Ladies' or Gentlemen's use, Railway or other uses.

OVER FIVE HUNDRED DEALERS

in various parts of the land have unanimously ordered them, and in the nine numerous lines of Railroads, including the Union Pacific and the Pennsylvania Central, and officers of these roads, with other prominent R. R. officials, endorse them as the best watches for the use of R. R. employés and travelers yet introduced.

The following are presented as specimens of these testimonials:

UNION PACIFIC R. R., OFFICE OF GEN'L SUP'T.]
OMAHA, Jan. 15, 1869.

HON. T. M. AVERY, President National Watch Co., Chicago, Ill.:

Dear Sir:—During the month that I have carried one of your "B. W. Raymond" Watches it has not failed to keep the time with so much accuracy as to leave nothing to desire in this regard. For accuracy in time-keeping, beauty of movement and finish, your Watch will bear favorable comparison with any watch made in America, and I am confident that in all respects they will compete successfully in the markets of the world with similar manufactures of older nations. They need only to be known to be appreciated.

Yours, most respectfully,

C. G. HAMMOND, Gen'l Sup't.

OFFICE OF THE HOUSE HOUSE RAILROAD,
GEN'L SUP'T, NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870.

T. M. AVERY, Esq., President National Watch Co.:

Dear Sir,—The Watch made by your Company, which I have carried the past two months, has kept excellent time. I have carried it frequently on engines, and subjected it to all kinds of usage. During the time it has run uniformly with our standard clock.

Truly yours, F. M. TOUSEY, Supt.

The following dealers also, in various parts of the country, have certified that they consider the Elgin Watches to be all that the Company have advertised them, as being well finished, handsome in appearance, and as possessing a combination of qualities, than any in market of similar price, and that they have great confidence in recommending them to the public on account of their general merit:

Wm. Ellery, Jr., Cincinnati. | Warren, Spadone, & Co., Cincinnati.
Warren, Spadone, & Co., Keokuk & Co., St. Louis.
Middleton & Bro., N. Y. | E. Crittenden & Co., Cleveland.
T. B. Pierce, " | M. Burt, Cleveland.
Henry Claudel, " | Morse, Reddin, & Hamilton, Chicago.
Geo. W. Pratt, " | Scott, Barrett, & Co., Phila.
Scott, Barrett, & Co., Phila. | J. H. House, Denver, Col.
Murphy, " | M. M. Baldwin & Co., San Francisco, Cal.
J. R. Reed & Co., Pittsb'h. | Francisco, Cal.
Jenkins & Hatch, " | Andrew & Co., Cincinnati. Koch & Co., Peoria, Ill.
And over 400 others.

Various grades, and prices made to suit different tastes.

No Movements Retailed by the Company.

☞ Call on your Jeweler and ask to see the Elgin Watches.

Business Office and Salesroom National Watch Company, 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. It is simple, durable, and not liable to get out of order. We will pay $200 for any Machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every good stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which good men cannot fail to make from three to four times that amount. Address for particulars SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.

CAUTION.—Beware of all Agents selling Machines under the same name as ours, unless they can show a certificate of agency signed by us. We have withheld extensive territory from those who have sold by other parties, and shall prosecute all parties selling other Sewing Machines with our name, to the full extent of the law, unless such Machines were bought of us or our Agents. Do not be imposed upon by parties who copy our advertisement and circular, and offer worthless Machines in their place.

STUDDED BOOTS.

STUDS instead of EYELETS.

The Studded Boots are lced by simply winding the string from one Stud to another. That empty one may try them at once, we will send a sample pair at Jobbers' prices. Every Pair Warranted. Send 3cent stamp for descriptive price-list.

BOSTON SHOE STUD CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.

$30 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user liable to prosecution. Address the nearest office for circular.

Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 689.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his servant, nor his maid, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is his."

"Lord, have mercy upon us, and write all these thy laws in our hearts, we beseech thee."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1870.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SENATE.

IT is generally understood that there is a coolness between the Executive and the Senate; and the rejection of some of the most important of the nominations made by the President is a sign of a want of the harmony that usually prevails when both branches of the government are of the same party. Events during the late administration naturally exalted the power of the Senate. Undoubtedly it represented the popular will against a bad and designing man, and its action was generally justified. It has, therefore, easily come to feel a certain superiority to the other branches of the government. But it should be wary. It should remember that circumstances are wholly changed.

It is well understood that the difficulty in Washington is the manner in which the President exercises his power of appointment and nomination. He is, like his Attorney-General, independent; and there are those who would be glad to make him suffer for it, as his Attorney-General is supposed to have suffered. Now, many of the staunchest Republicans in the country have not hesitated to criticise in the most conspicuous nomination of the President—that of General SICKLES, the delay of whose confirmation by the Senate is a fact to be noted with pleasure. But no thoughtful man can wish that the President had been governed wholly by the most partisan considerations in filling the offices. And he said in his Message what no President for a generation had dared to say, that when members of Congress ought to be supposed glad to hear, that efficient officers had been retained against remonstrance wholly political.

Indeed, without folly or forgetfulness of the exact situation, General GRANT unquestionably means to be a practical President. In this consideration, we have no doubt, is the welfare of the country, and to that mere party objects must sometimes be made to yield. The civil system has become so peculiarly—and of late years so passionately—partisan, that this is an incomprehensible outcome. Yet, with reference with the integrity which distinguishes every act of the President, it is a course which excites the professional politician simply and unaccountable. In his political independence, which is not carried to the point of imperiling any principle, and which does not proceed from any fanciful and absurd "no party" theory, that political will-o'-the-wisp of weak minds, the President undoubtedly possesses a very large share of the most intelligent citizens in the country. There is a greater willingness than ever to consider in the public service actual qualifications as well as vociferous party zeal. There is a growing disposition to believe that a very large number of the subordinate offices should be removed from the hazards of unscrupulous party intrigue. And we believe first that the agitation of reform in the civil service is widely discussed, with an intelligence and a sense of its necessity which have been hitherto unknown.

It is well for the Senate to remember, therefore, that if the President is independent the country is not unwise and well for the country. reflect that its feeling should be manifested in a manner to command Senatorial attention. In the contest with ANDREW JOHNSON the President usurping power for the worst of purposes, the Senate was heartily sustained by the country. But the country does not see that President GRANT aims either at usurpation or at an unpatriotic or inhuman use of power. It sees a simple, honest, faithful, steady man, in whose character and purpose it has the utmost confidence. It sees a President who is honored by the very nature of the office he holds upon him; and who is stronger in the trust of the people to-day than ever before. If, therefore, the Senate declines to support him—if its members choose to criticise him pettishly and harshly—if they forget the necessity of cordial co-operation to a successful administration, and of success in administration to continued party power—the Senate may disbarass and demoralize the party, but it can do no more. It can not divert from the President a popular confidence which is founded upon his evident wish to serve the country and not to aggrandize himself; and it is therefore to be sincerely hoped that the Senate will not compel its party friends to take sides so spiteful as a difference between itself and the President.

THE AMENDMENT ADOPTED.

BEFORE this paper is issued it is not improbable that the formal proclamation of the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment will have been made.

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Counting New York and Indiana, about whose action there is question, thirty States have ratified this amendment. Omitting New York and Indiana, it is ratified by twenty-eight.

This amendment, with the restoration of Virginia, Mississippi, Georgia, and Texas to representation in Congress, formally ends the work of political pacification begun by the war. A terrible and fatal wrong was lodged in the national system. It has been expelled, but not without fearful cost. How appalling the law has been vindicated which links injustice and misfortune! Henceforth the Fifteenth Amendment will remain the country like the sun and no nation can do wrong with impunity. Sooner or later the penalty will be exacted and paid to the uttermost.

It is instructive to look at the list of States that deliberately voted against the amendment. It tells its own story. New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, California, and probably Oregon. In New York the party which is dominant in the Senate and Assembly by unbalanced power last autumn, by means which are notorious, and the real feeling of the voters of New York was belied by the formal vote of assent to the amendment. It was as characteristic an act as the Democratic party ever performed. It could no longer defy the educated citizen, but it could try to.

Every citizen of the United States who has contributed to this truly American and humane triumph has reason to be proud. His further duty is to help break down the prejudice that would long survive the removal of the ban under which the colored race has lain in this country. No law, indeed, can remove feeling, but manly good sense can.

THE CASE OF FITZ JOHN PORTER.

IT is very natural that his friends should wish to reopen the case of Mr. FITZ JOHN PORTER. The family name is involved in the worst manner under the finding of the Commissioners; but the facts are familiar to the country, and the judgment of the court has been long affirmed by public opinion. No soldier had ever a fairer trial. He was patiently heard, the facts were carefully weighed, and the verdict was so decided that it is generally understood the penalty would have been very much severer except for the interference of President LINCOLN.

Nobody knows, said a very distinguished general in the service, what envy is, if he has not been in the army; and it is not too much to say that the presumption was against Mr. PORTER from the first. When it was alleged, after the misfortune of General POPE, that General PORTER had virtually refused to hasten to the rescue in obedience to orders, the country had seen enough of the spirit of insubordination to be obliged to obey the administration. Their personal friendships and professional sympathies were very much with their opponents, and neither the moral enormity nor the political folly of the rebellion were ever comprehended by them. General MCCLELLAN and Mr. BUELL were of this kind; and had the first remained in command in the East and the last in the West, it is very difficult to perceive what the result of the war must inevitably have been. In any body expected to believe that General FITZ JOHN PORTER was moved with these feelings that he worked as men work whose hearts and hopes are fixed upon an object? And is it to be supposed that Mr. PORTER, who became an intimate friend of MCCLELLAN'S, who had been partly suspected by POPE, was so intent upon the defeat of his rival that his personal jealousies would not affect his action? If MCCLELLAN had been in POPE'S place, would not General PORTER'S conduct have been materially different?

Such doubts as these, founded upon knowledge of human nature and sympathy, created the general presumption against Mr. PORTER. But the verdict against him was rendered not upon presumption but evidence. A board of soldiers were satisfied, after the most careful hearing of testimony and elaborate argument, that he had failed in his duty, both official and intentionally. He was tried, indeed, during the war; but for that very reason he was more likely to be fairly tried, for the feeling which give their character to facts were then fresh and intelligible as they are not now. He was tried at a time when a merely technical defense was useless, and when the spirit of his conduct was fully appreciated, as it might not be now.

It is not likely that the case will be reopened as it certainly is not desirable that it should be. It is not improbable, however, that at some future day, if the Democratic party should obtain power, it might grant Mr. PORTER'S request. But should that day ever arrive, there is no saying what may not be done. We shall have the merits of ROBERT E. LEE, as "a Christian gentleman," and a "great captain," fully recognized. The much-injured YOUNGS will be restored to his lofty niche in the Pantheon of Patriotism. The unforgiving FLOYD will be celebrated as a minister of peace and fraternity. Our own FERNANDO WOOD, who bewailed his inability to dispatch ammunition and weapons to TOOMBS, will have a medal struck in his honor as the model Democratic Conservative National Unionist. The mildew of slander will be wiped from the precious name of TWEED; and Admiral PORTER must not be surprised if the glory of the truest patriotism be awarded to RAPHAEL SEMMES. When this day comes, we may not believe, the loyal people of this country will believe that FITZ JOHN PORTER honestly and heartily did all that he possibly could to obey the spirit as well as the letter of his orders, to help General POPE to win a victory.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

THE dry-goods market has been somewhat enlivened by the operations of the two leading houses in marking down some styles of prints, shirtings, and sheetings. Up to this time there was very general dullness; but as it became known that at a certain hour the goods would be opened and sold at a price previously announced, the attendance on each successive occasion was large, and the effort to obtain the articles was spirited. Indeed, such was the excitement at times that sales had to be stopped.

The question has been widely discussed in commercial circles whether this policy was expedient. It is very certain that it will not be resorted to from choice, and equally so that it was necessitated by the fall in the price of gold and cotton, and the want of activity in trade.

Although the supply of forty millions of pounds of cotton, the unprecedented quantity of merchandise, whatever may be the condition of affairs, yet, when they are unfavorable, purchases at the ten-hoard market are postponed to the last moment. The rapidity with which goods may be transported is favorable to such delay, and the last week in the season thus fast.

So far as the West and Northwest are concerned, they still suffer from having their fall crops underrated, and from high gold collections, due chiefly to the condition of the grain market; and the South, which was here in large force at the opening, is very economic in doubt as to the price at which the residue of last year's crop will be sold. It is to be regretted that the season has been, in fact, much as the activity of trade depended in great part upon maintaining its price. Under the pressure to which we have so often referred, cotton has recently fallen about two cents a pound. As the foreign manufacturer will use every effort of what remains unbiassed of as our looms will require, and as the whole country participates in the advantage enjoyed by those who are nearest the fabrication in price will be regarded as unfortunate. It introduces a new feature of uncertainty into this season's sales which is met by the "drives," as they are called, resorted to by the leading houses. Goods will continue to sympathize with gold and cotton, whether it shall be the fate of the latter to rise or to fall.

At the port of New York our imports for the month of February last, exclusive of specie, amount to twenty-three millions and upward, at gold value; while our exports, exclusive of specie, for the same period, which is one of the principal exporting months, are only $12,893,-166 in currency. It is too early to obtain the figures for the whole country; but as general fact is evident, that although the quantity of exports is in excess of those of last year, the value is less. It must be recollected that the excess of imports over exports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, was stated by Mr. WELLS at about seventy-eight millions of dollars. At the date of the January excess at the port of New York, it would appear that the total of excess for the last fiscal year will be considerably less. This ought to make a deep impression. There is no escape for us from the tenor of the figures such as the following: we are the apparent loser which is against them; because they are the chief carriers of their productions out and home, and have the benefit of the freights they earn, and we are not the chief carriers either of our exports or imports, and have to pay a large excess of freights over what we earn to foreign ship owners.

Instead of feeling the force of this controlling fact, it is remarked with as much indifference as if this balance had never to be paid. This, with other items of indebtedness to Europe, amounts to a thousand and ten millions of dollars per annum, and gold falls from day to day in the face of this extreme imprudence. Before the war, specie and bank notes were the sheave off any demand for the settlement of this annual amount, and on for that reason temporarily contained the case with gold, is considered a great financial achievement that gold has been forced down to the price at which our bonds known as the 5's have been recently held. The country is excited over this exploit, as if it had been accomplished by prudently abstaining from undue extravagance, by a wise reform of our currency, by an excess of exports instead of imports, and by courage in bearing the burden of payment, instead of the imprudence and wickedness of a large augmentation of our obligations to foreign people.

The public opinion is much voluntarily of opinion in relation to all financial questions, there ought to be none as to the folly and danger of running up a debt every year to foreign people of such huge proportions; but yet it appears from the Treasury report made in December, that it is expected for the fiscal year commencing on the next first of July, that the duties on imports will equal what they now are, which means that the value and extent of our imports shall run on till, at least, July, 1871. As the value of our exports is constantly diminishing, and the industry of the country is very serious, by disturbed, there can be no relief from the addition of two hundred and fifty millions of foreign indebtedness, if the present policy shall be continued for the period named. This is but a small part of the penalty we shall pay for an attempt to fund our debt when our paper system is at its full height, and in advance of such an adjustment of our financial affairs as would prevent a severe shock.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, in one of the most accurate and comprehensive speeches made this session in Congress, suggests that a scheme of paying off such a great war and after such serious disturbance would naturally follow rather than precede a return to a solid system. The improvement made in the midst of inflation has powerfully disturbed the whole trade and industry of the country. No one can assign any limit to its continuance. The fact that our financial ease is due wholly to the facility with which we are allowed to borrow, for the time, the sums we may need to invest until we become too deeply entangled to be easily relieved.

It is gratifying to witness any sign of wisdom in the resolution, passed unanimously by the Senate, against the policy of inflation. If it were possible to improve the condition of affairs, we say done by "shrinkage" in the price of all our commodities would not be without compensation, for then it would be permanent.

THE CASE OF APPOINTMENTS.

THE offense of Mr. WHITTEMORE in selling the West Point cadetships was so flagrant that the House should not have given him even the opportunity of resignation. It did not deny the charge. He merely said that the money received had been devoted to charity. Of that, of course, no one could know. But it was known to be a trust confided to a representative to be used for the public welfare has been sold for money. It is the last sign of political degradation that places should be put into the market; and Congress, upon confession of the offense, should have expressed its censure in the strongest manner.

Undoubtedly the offense seems to be less enormous because of the vicious system of our civil service, which sells offices for political and party purposes. If the money that a man has paid and the time that he has given to the election of certain candidates are to be considered as "claims" upon an office, then they are the price of the office. When we ask "what for this man should that be sold for?" in office?" we mean how much time and money has he paid for it. And we must not be surprised to find unscrupulous politicians willing to have the money paid into their own pockets instead of spent for the general welfare of the party. We are all implicated with the unhappy servantive. But we have taught him to commit the offense for which he suffers. So long as we insist that offices shall be sold for civil service, we must expect that appointments will be sold for money.

THE RIGHTS OF RAILWAY TRAVELERS.

As the time is apparently rapidly approaching when the great railway companies will be our absolute masters, it is time, may a country by what means, for passenger off the train? That drunken, obscene, profane, and disorderly passengers should be peremptorily removed is universally conceded. But every body who travels much by rail has probably observed that those are the very persons who are the most forbearing. It is some one like the unfortunate Mr. DWIGHT, who was put off the cars of the New Jersey Railroad and Transit Company at Jersey City. From the testimony of Mr. COLEMAN at the trial it appears that his business compels him to travel constantly, as much as twenty-five thirty thousand miles during the year; and he has found by experience that a ticket generally carries him either way between two points. About two years ago he bought a railroad ticket in Providence for New York; but upon reaching New Haven, instead of using the coupon that would have passed him by rail from that city to New York, he went by steamer, of course presenting the coupon. Returning from a short time afterward to New Haven, he presented the coupon at the gate in the station, and was roughly told by the guard that it was good for nothing. Appealing to the conductor, that officer peremptorily agreed with the quarkeeper. Mr. COLEMAN stated that he was in the habit of using coupons upon other roads, to which the conductor replied that it was so true, and warned him that if he tried to get upon the train he should be put off.

Mr. COLEMAN then bought a ticket and took his place, intending to ascertain why the coupon was refused. When the conductor came through the car to inspect the tickets Mr. COLEMAN accosted him politely, and stated that he was traveling constantly, and was often obliged to diverge from his course; and that, if such coupons were not taken by the railroad authorities, when no change in the rate of fare had been made, the annual loss to himself would be very serious. The conductor replied that the coupons were good from New Haven to New York, but not the other way. That he had been instructed not to take them except under such circumstances, and he would not. Mr. COLEMAN then said that it seemed to him that he had paid for seventy-four miles travel upon the road, or the distance from New York to New Haven, and that he could see no reason why he made any difference which way he took it. Several of the passengers, some of them officers of other roads, agreed in this view. The conductor or said that he should lose his place if he disobeyed instructions; upon which Mr. COLEMAN remarked that, so far as that was concerned, he returned in his tickets in New York, it would not be known which way this was taken.

This remark, although innocently meant, was plainly susceptible of misinterpretation, and the conductor immediately replied, so as to be heard by the other passengers, that Mr. COLEMAN might as well ask him to steal ten dollars because the Company might not know it. Mr. COLEMAN did not deny that, thereupon, the conductor said that, if he chose, he could put him off at the first station. Mr. COLEMAN replied that, in that case, he should pursue the matter further. At this moment a gentleman sitting near said to the conductor that he was "a railroad man," and advised him, if he thought that Mr. COLEMAN was making his fare, to telegraph ahead and have him arrested upon arrival. The conductor replied that they didn't do business in that way upon that road. Mr. COLEMAN then said that he would submit to a policeman, but not to the conductor and his roughs.

The train stopped at Stamford, and the conductor entered the car with five or six men. He ordered them to pull Mr. COLEMAN out and put him on the platform. Mr. COLEMAN resolutely resisted and a struggle followed, during which he was dragged from the seat with his coat torn, and as soon as he was thrown to the aisle of the car three heavy blows were struck him from behind. Fearing for his life he abandoned passive resistance and rushed at the nearest man. He was then lifted by main force, carried through the car amidst the confusion of the passengers, the women alarmed and the men striving to prevent the assault of the conductor and his aids. From the platform of the car Mr. COLEMAN was thrown heavily upon the platform of the station. He had several flesh-wounds, and was severely and permanently injured in the struggle.

Mr. COLEMAN sued the Railway Company for $10,000 damages in the Superior Court in Boston. The Judge charged against it upon every point, holding that the ticket was a contract; that the Company could make by-laws, and that if any of them were broken by a passenger he was a trespasser; to refuse to show the proper ticket was a trespass, and being a trespasser in the Company's car at a legitimate house, it had the right to remove him by force if necessary, avoiding an excess. The only question was, was there an excess of violence? The jury returned $3200 damages, and the Judge, after several weeks' delay, set aside the verdict on the ground of excessive damages. At the second trial, in the same court, the jury disagreed, being eleven for damages and one opposed; and there will be another trial at the approaching term of the court.

Mr. COLEMAN claims that a railroad ticket is not a contract, but a baggage-check, merely evidence of property in possession, which the holder is bound to return, or its equivalent. He insists that it is an essentially malicious for a company to refuse its tickets either way as to the government to issue letter stamps that would not take a letter both ways; and that a steamer ticket must be considered to be like a horse-car or a ferry-boat ticket, good both ways. He insists that if a company of men build a cotton mill, and he owns them two dollars, and they choose to think that he intends to evade payment, and thereupon order a party of roughs to seize him and throw him about, the company of men will be dealt with by the law, and he does not see that they can take the law into their own hands because they build a railroad instead of a mill. Ought a conductor to be allowed to be judge, jury, and executioner in his own differences with passengers? The law, in fine, should be interpreted, says Mr. COLEMAN, so that the railroad shall be a convenience for the public, and not the public a convenience for the railroad.

In this case, upon the evidence there can be little doubt that excessive violence was used, and that Mr. COLEMAN is entitled to recover for what he suffered by the outrage, and for the consequence of the personal defense which that assault required. As for the other questions involved, some kind of judicial interpretation is clearly desirable. Is a railroad ticket a contract? Are the rights of a railroad company in a car those of a man in his own house? Or are they any other than those of a landlord in a hotel? May the landlord's clerk order a person to be thrown out of the house because a reasonable question arises between them? May a railroad company make rules at pleasure, and empower a subaltern to enforce them without reference them at discretion? Since the Legislature limits the fare that may be charged for every mile of travel, why should it not determine the very point involved in this suit, whether between two stations upon a road a ticket should be good either way?

This case and the experience of travelers readily suggest many similar questions, to which some final answer is due. Surely the railroad companies must, of course, be allowed to make rules for the management of their roads. But those rules should be reasonable, necessary, and plainly for the public convenience. And it is to juries, not to railroad companies, that the public must look for the reasonable decision of the question and the insolence of railway management. In bringing and contesting this action Mr. COLEMAN represents the public. The public seeks the settlement of questions in which we are all interested. It is true that the essential right might have been secured by an order or decision by his peaceful submission to ejection, pro forma. But those who have had differences with many of the railroad companies will easily understand that his conduct was not unnatural. We shall watch the trial with great interest, and refer to subsequent action.

PERSONAL PROVOCATION.

THE World, alluding to our remark that under personal provocation it had branded some of the Ring by name as corrupt, says:

"Harper's Weekly knows perfectly well that we have no personal quarrel, we have had no 'personal provocation,' for we have had no dealings with the Ring. We are neither afraid, nor desired, nor had favors from the Ring, nor the Ring from the World. Will Harper's Weekly correct its statement?"

We should be very sorry to be unjust, still more to be carefully or maliciously unjust. But there may be public provocation quite other than that of the kind mentioned by the World, nor was that the kind we had in view. We were speaking of the public provocation by the vow of the Ring that the editor of the World did not vote for the candidates of his party—an avowal which public satisfactory impression of it were felt to be an attack quite beyond the rule of lawful political difference of opinion. It was an attempt to coerce the conscience of the World as personally a hypocrite, or a man who pretended to be a Democrat in his paper but who did not press the Democratic nominee. The World was a personal provocation, and in repelling it the World branded by name certain members of the Ring as corrupt.

Of course we do not suppose that this occasioned the hostility of the World to the Ring. But certainly it did not diminish it, and, except for that personal provocation, we have as yet no evidence in the World's articles against the Ring that it would have stigmatized any of the members by name, more than the Judges, who, it says, sell justice for a price.

The World is a miscarriage, but it certainly is not careful injustice, which is malicious misrepresentation.

NOTES.

THE Times, with singular carelessness, accused General BUTLER of "a gross and deliberate literary mistake" in his article in "Our Relations with England," in the March number of Harper's Magazine. In speaking of the comments of the English papers upon the President's Message, General BUTLER quoted from the Journals, and the Times and News, and then from the Spectator, which he says, in a quotation, contains among the class which was most unfriendly to America during the war. In making this statement we understand that General BUTLER asserts nothing new. The Spectator was certainly very friendly to us; but its readers, of whom Mr. GLADSTONE was the type, were certainly not. The News and this Star we suppose to be the only English journals that may be said to have circulated among those who were friendly to America during the war.

THERE is one very touching line in the letter which the SALAMANCA wrote upon the night that it was tried at three o'clock and shot at five, and a quarter of an hour was given him to arrange his affairs. He used the time in writing a letter, giving directions about various bequests. "Give to Madame St. Just $2000, to AGLAUE $1000, to the daughter of Mr. LAFORET $2000, to my mother $1000, to FLORA $3000; and tell all my little son never to meddle with the politics of the country." It is a strange, sad, far-away echo of CARDINAL WOLSEY'S adjuration to the young CROMWELL: "I charge thee, fling away ambition." In his decade of days are the words of utterly despairing men.

EVERY honest man in the country will rejoice that CONGRESS has abolished the wretched habit of permitting members to print, as speeches delivered upon the floor, essays which may have been written for the most indirect statement, which involve the honor of Congress as they are permitted to be spoken. The occasion was the publication in the Globe of a speech of Senator MORRILL, a member who apparently represents the worst spirit and tendency of the Democratic party, to which he belongs. The attacks upon the President and Secretary of State, and upon Senator SUMNER, were monstrous and inexcusable. Mr. MUNGEN'S subsequent defense of his printed speech, upon the floor, was hardly less offensive. We observe that the Washington correspondent of the World, alluding to the recent attack of the majority to prohibit the publication of unspoken essays as an advertisement of MUNGEN'S speech. Would the World favor the publication of the speeches the particular case which moved Congress to action was one which, ought no action to have been taken because the case must be cited? It is not a party question, it is a matter of common decency, which the correspondence of the World should have condemned as swiftly and strongly as that of any Republican paper.

IN the debate upon the admission of Senator PEARCE, of Maryland, Senator IVE made a most earnest and eloquent remarks upon the change in the constitution of the colored population. Senator GARRETT DAVIS, of Kentucky, replied that if his friend from Nevada did not know upon the face of that proposition he would not so eloquently praise them; and Mr. DAVIS then produced the celebrated letter of the Democratic party in the great election upon equal rights, and remarked that he did not believe Senator NYE ever accompanied it with his name to the advertisement. When Mr. DOUGLAS urged this masterly argument, in his famous debate with Mr. LINCOLN, in Illinois, the latter said that he saw the effect of electing Mr. LINCOLN to the Presidency and of uniting the country how immensely overrated Mr. DOUGLAS was—Mr. LINCOLN replied that he was so dull that he could not possibly see why a colored man should not have all the rights because he himself might not wish to marry a colored woman. Mr. DAVIS'S letter is certainly worth while thrice to slay the slain, he would probably have answered Mr. DAVIS'S forcible reply by voluntarily declaring that he was not even white Dinahs, also, whom he would not care to accompany to a place of amusement.

A VERY valuable companion to the reader of the Bible, and to the reader of travel in the East, is a beautiful chromo-lithograph, made in Berlin from the designs of Professor W. H. PERSHE, of Lansing, Michigan, entitled "A General Panoramic View of the Holy Land, or Palestine in Perspective," representing a bird's-eye view of the country in proper relation. It is done apparently with the utmost care and accuracy, and gives at a vivid and satisfactory impression of the topography of the country. It is accompanied by a very full index, in the Biblical student and Sunday-school classes, it will be the most delightful interpreter; while it is well worthy general attention for the faithfulness of the design and the masterly execution.

AMONG the most entertaining of recent books is Miss MITFORD'S "Life and Letters," published by the Appletons, full of sketches of the distinguished literary characters of the last half century in England. It is also a very touching record of the devotion of a daughter to a worthless parent. Dr. MITFORD, the father, was one of the good-natured fellows who ask only to have their own way, and who bring sorrow and ruin upon wife and children with the best intention in the world. He is by their confession that Dr. MITFORD squandered his wife's fortune and his daughter's earnings, and left them penniless; his wife was pinching and his daughter writing night in the morning which to save money for bread in the country, devoted himself diligently to field sports in town. A more selfish gentleman has not lately appeared in literature, and the reader is continually grieved by Miss MITFORD'S blind idolatry of such a reprobate. The reader, too, will be surprised to find that Miss MITFORD had so much literary skill which has wholly perished. Her letters, however, which have been preserved, are much the best part of her writing; always lively, and often sparkling, with strokes of sudden enthusiasm for persons suddenly cherished, and with a certain British propriety of tone and subdued delight in the scenes which are very entertaining. With all this, however, there is a fidelity and simplicity of character, and a patient conscientiousness which are most attractive. The book grows sober as it proceeds; but the reader's respect for the writer increases, and he turns the last pages with sad admiration.

ANOTHER pleasant book is "A Day by the Fire," a series of LEIGH HUNT'S essays collected for the first time, and, as we presume from the initials, by Mr. J. E. BABSON, who did a similar service for CHARLES LAMB about six years ago, and published valuable volumes. The book is a light, happy touch of LEIGH HUNT full in this letter the book, published by Messrs. ROBERTS BROTHERS, as a companion of "The Sea," upon sirens and mermaids and fairies, nymphs and tritons and genii, with a miscellany of other topics, and always with the familiar dainty elegance and scholarship and blithe humor.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

February 21.—In the Senate, a joint resolution was introduced, declaring the thanks of Congress to Admiral FARRAGUT for the requisite number of States. The case of Fitz John Porter came up on the report of the Chandler committee in the House, and after the correspondence on the subject. The Senator made a long speech, in which he expressed the hope that the proceedings of the court-martial would not be interfered with. He was replied to by General WILSON, who favored a new trial, and the matter was finally disposed of by the withdrawal of the resolution. A resolution was agreed to that no undelivered speech should be left in the Globe office. In the House, the names of the votes introduced, among which were the following: That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to cause instructions to be issued to prevent the coercion of the people of a colony who are in the habit of electing delegates to the Legislature of the territories from those who have heretofore been denied the right by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; to remove political disabilities in States ratifying the Fifteenth Amendment; to abolish the office of Assessor Agent, and to pay pensions through postmasters; to restore the income tax to three per cent. on receipts above $2000; to increase the tax on distilled spirits $1 per gallon, and to repeal the distributive clause in the matter of banking currency. The resolution of Mr. Loughridge, of Iowa, to refer the Texas Pacific Railroad bill to the Committee on Public Lands, was adopted by a yea and nay vote of 126 to 74. The Senate bill to relieve certain disabilities imposed by various States for participation in the rebellion was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, with instructions to report by bill, containing some two hundred names, was offered as an amendment. A long discussion ensued, which ended in the passage of the bill by a majority of the House.

February 23.—In the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Pease, the elected Senator from Mississippi, were presented and made the subject of a long debate as to the validity of the election. The vote was then taken.—In the House, four of the members elect from Mississippi took the oath of office. The case of Mr. Whittemore, charged with selling cadetship, was then taken up. The report of the Committee in favor of Mr. Whittemore's seat was debated until the following day.

February 24.—In the Senate, the case of Mr. Pease was again debated without result. A resolution against a Chinese immigration was offered, but went out a division.—In the House, the first business of the day was the case of Mr. Whittemore. The accused member was proceeding to reply to the charges made against him, when he was interrupted by the Speaker, who announced that copies of telegrams containing the charges had been forwarded to, together with its acceptance by the Governor of South Carolina. Mr. Whittemore, on the floor, protested against the jurisdiction of the House in the premises, he being no longer a member of the House if accepted the position. The House, however, decided that upon the right of a member to resign without consent of the House. It was then decided that the resignation was effective; the resolution of expulsion was withdrawn, and a resolution of censure substituting Mr. Whittemore unworthy of his seat, was unanimously adopted.

February 25.—In the Senate, the credentials of General Adams, elected Senator from Mississippi, were presented and referred. The discussion in regard to the Pease credentials was then resumed, and many speeches were made, both for and against him, and he took his seat.—In the House, little business was done, except the beginning of an investigation, and to establish a system of national education.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

On Friday, February 18, a train on the Mississippi Central Railroad ran through a trestle bridge near Pulaski, Mississippi, precipitating the engine, express, and four passenger cars, and killing and maiming a large number of passengers. Twenty-one dead bodies were taken from the wreck. The trestle was sixty feet high, and the fall was terrible. It is said the accident was caused by a loose rail thrown by the spread of the track when the engine had passed over it.

On the 22d of February the President signed the bill admitting Virginia to representation in Congress. Of the four Representatives who were elected, Mr. Segar had been elected before the war and two in the rebel service. General Barry, the representative at large, was elected by Democratic assent in consequence of wounds received in an affray during the canvass.

General Reynolds, Military Governor of Texas, has officially notified the Governor-elect of the ratification of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

In the Senate of the New York Legislature, a bill providing for the election of Regents by the vote of the Senate and Court of Common Pleas in New York has been reported; and a bill to abolish the Excise law has been passed by a small majority.

Mr. Bayard Taylor was recently received from his long trip through Alaska, California, Mexico, and Cuba. His health has been much benefited by the journey.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ASCENSIVE to a dispatch from Rome, several American ecclesiastics have been expelled from that city, and the Pope has refused correspondence with them on subjects connected with the Œcumenical Council.

In the British House of Commons, a bill has been introduced in the House of Lords. It was stated in debate that the Irish Church Bill would be ready before the 1st of July. Those against it say it would deprive the Church of $10,000,000 a year.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone has introduced a bargent given on Washington's birthday by the Lord Mayor of London, at which he made a long speech in English.

On the 22d inst. Mr. Bright ceases great anxiety in England.

A report having been circulated that the Emperor of France had become dissatisfied with his Ministry because of their inability to reconcile the differences in the Legislature on the question of discontinuing the system of official candidates for Deputies, he confidently represented that the Emperor has made no such complaint, and that he is entirely satisfied with the Ministry, and that he believes they have the confidence of every honest Frenchman.

The Madrid Correspondencia has published a letter denying that he is a pretender to the Spanish throne, and declaring that the duties of his position as considered a Spanish citizen, and longs for a definite Constitution.

UNDER BROADWAY—A PASSENGER STATION.

UNDER BROADWAY.

THE Pneumatic Tunnel, now in process of construction under the principal thoroughfare of New York, commences in the sub-basements of the spacious marble building of DEVLIN & CO., corner of Broadway and Warren Street, and extends, at present, to a point a little below Murray Street. One of our illustrations on this page gives an interior view of the tunnel, looking south from near the entrance. It is eight feet in diameter, built of solid masonry, is dry and clean, painted white, and lighted with gas. The tunnel passes under all the gas and water pipes and sewers; but, though so far below the surface of the street, the rumbling of wheels and the tramp of horses overhead can be distinctly heard by one standing within it.

The tunnel is constructed by means of a shield, consisting of a strong cylinder, something like a barrel with both heads taken out. It is pushed forward by eighteen powerful hydraulic rams, and makes a bore of its own diameter through the sand. The loosened sand, as it falls through the rear end of the cylinder, is carried back through the tunnel in cars, and delivered upon an elevator on Warren Street, where it is raised to the pavement and carted away. As fast as the cylinder advances, the tunnel is arched with

UNDER BROADWAY—THE TUNNEL.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

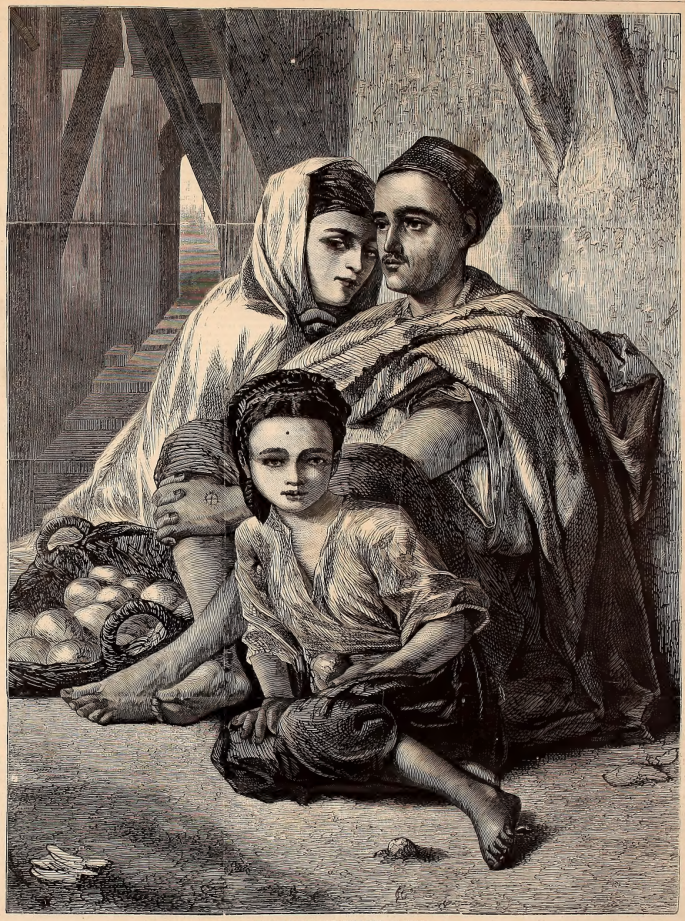
UNDER BROADWAY—INTERIOR OF PASSENGER CAR.

masonry. By means of this machine, which was designed by Mr. A. E. BEACH, the tunnel is pushed forward without any interruption to the business of Broadway.

Another of our illustrations shows the mouth of the tunnel and a passenger car, as seen from the station, which is a nicely-finished underground apartment 120 feet in length, lighted from the Warren Street sidewalk. Another illustration shows the interior of the passenger car, which carries eighteen passengers, has very comfortable seats, and is lighted with oxyhydrogen gas. The cars are to be propelled by the atmospheric system, consisting in driving through the tunnel a strong blast of air, which presses against the rear of the car and carries it along like a sailboat before the wind. This air current of course secures perfect ventilation within the car. The air is driven into the tunnel by means of an immense blowing engine operated by steam. Mr. JOSIAH DIXON, long known for his efforts to establish the underground railway, is the superintendent of the work.

As soon as the necessary authority can be obtained from the Legislature, it is the intention of the Company to proceed to construct a first-class underground railway, with large cars, to run from South Ferry under Broadway to Central Park, and above that point; together with a Fourth Avenue branch to Harlem River. They will be able, when their arrangements are complete, to transport more than twenty thousand passengers per hour each way.

A STATE DINNER AT THE WHITE HOUSE.—FROM A SKETCH BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 165.]



KABYLE ORANGE SELLERS, ALGERIA.

STATE DINNER AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

IT has always been the custom of our Presidents to give, during the winter, a series of state dinners at the White House, to which members of the Diplomatic Corps, Senators and Congressmen, members of the Cabinet, and other gentlemen of official position are invited. The table is generally spread for thirty-four guests, and, as may be seen from our illustration on page 164, is elegantly and sumptuously furnished. The flowers that form one of the principal ornamental attractions on these occasions are furnished from the conservatory of the White House.

KABYLE ORANGE SELLERS, ALGERIA.

THE picturesque figures grouped in our illustration on this page are faithful representatives of the Kabyles, a gallant people of Algeria, who call themselves by names which signify noble and free. Under the brave and intelligent leadership of ABD-EL-KADER they for a long time bade defiance to the military skill of the French marshals; but the stalwart aborigines were conquered at last, and their redoubtable leader swore fealty to France. The Kabyles, as may be perceived from our illustration, have intelligent countenances, though they have never shown any tendency to rise above their original level. Their language is so poor as to be without the conjunction, a part of speech that is very necessary if you want to construct an intelligible sentence, and they are obliged to borrow from the Arabic all words of religious or scientific significance. In the country their dwellings are of the roughest order; cabins made of the branches of trees, plastered over with mud. Their dress is coarse and scanty. As to their religion, little is known about it, for they carefully keep strangers at a distance; but, like most ignorant races, they have a prodigious veneration for their priests, who profess to work miracles. The origin of this curious race of people has never been investigated; but there is one tribe among them with blue eyes and fair hair and complexion, who are thought to be descendants of the Vandals.

The city of Algiers, where this Kabyle family are waiting for somebody to buy their oranges, rises white on the side of a steep hill, above a sapphire bay; and the summit of the hill is crowned by a citadel. Its streets are narrow and filthy; but this the French occupants are gradually amending, having actually taken down the principal mosque in order to get space for their official edifices. Many of the other mosques, which are chiefly octagonal buildings of marble, have been turned into churches. Fountains and baths are plentiful. Before the French took possession there were few shops, and still the greater part of the business is done in the bazars, quite in the Oriental fashion. There may you purchase silken shawls and leather slippers, enamelled brooches and bracelets, curious work in opal and onyx and amber, from cross-legged merchants who might have stepped straight out of the "Arabian Nights." Sinbad the Sailor, opulent with his ivory and diamonds, Aladdin in quest of his lost lamp, are to be seen any day in the Algiers bazar. Cross the narrow street: lo, a café of a thousand colonnes, marble tables, gilded mirrors, Frenchmen playing dominos and drinking absinthe. You can have as good a dinner as if you were in Paris itself, and there is an opera, of course. Thus do extremes meet, where Europe's highest civilization encounters the languid, stagnant, sleepy life of Africa.

BEYOND THIS PRESENT.

"We measure life by years and tears," he said:
"We live a little; then life leaves us dead,
And the long grass grows greenly overhead."

The years pass on, some swiftly and some slow;
Each takes a little from out summer's glow,
Each gives a little of white winter's snow.

Forever more and more they take and add;
We lose the things that seed to make us glad;
We keep but those that make us slow and sad.

Hot tears well up from out the fountain heart;
We wipe them off with proud resentful start;
Alas, our pride heals not their bitter smart!

The eye is but the surface; deep and wide
Abides within the secret of their ebb and flow.
The heart must rest ere that full flow be dried.

As on the league swings the door of Time,
We catch sweet glimpses of a land sublime,
Filled with the goldenness of Heaven's prime.

And One stands up; oh, fair and full in sight,
With clear true voice He calls us from our night!
Help us, O God, to see and hear aright!

For if we see Him, we shall see Thee too;
And if we hear His voice, we will tell on true,
And fill our hands with some best work to do.

And then these years and tears shall surely cease;
Time to Eternity shall make increase;
And smiles shall benefit an endless peace.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SIXTH.

DROPPED.

SIR PATRICK made a bad breakfast. Blanche's absence fretted him, and Anne Silvester's letter puzzled him.

He read it, short as it was, a second time, and a third. If it meant any thing, it meant that the motive at the bottom of Anne's flight was to accomplish the sacrifice of herself to the happiness of Blanche. She had parted for life from his fiance for his niece's sake! What did this mean? And how was it to be reconciled with Anne's position—so described to him by Mrs. Inchbold during his visit to Craig Fernie?

All Sir Patrick's ingenuity, all Sir Patrick's experience, failed to find so much as the shadow of an answer to that question.

While he was still wondering over the letter, Arnold and the surgeon entered the breakfast-room together.

"Have you heard about Blanche?" asked Arnold, excitedly. "She is in no danger, Sir Patrick—the worst of it is over now."

The surgeon interposed before Sir Patrick could appeal to him.

"Mr. Brinkworth's interest in the young lady is a little exaggerates the state of the case," he said. "I have seen her, at Lady Lundie's request; and I can assure you that there is not the slightest reason for any present alarm. She appears to have had a nervous attack, which has yielded to the simplest domestic remedies. The only anxiety you need feel is connected with the management of her in the future. She is suffering from some mental depression which it is not for me to fathom, friends, to alleviate and remove. If you can turn her thoughts from the painful subject—whatever it may be—which she has on her mind to-day now, you will do all that needs to be done. He took a very proper front in this case, and strolled out into the garden, leaving Sir Patrick and Arnold together.

"You heard that?" said Sir Patrick.

"To be right, do you think?" asked Arnold.

"Right! Do you suppose a man has any reputation by making mistakes? You no one of the new generation, Master Arnold. You can all of you stare at a nervous man; just as you can an atom of respect for his fame. If Shakspeare came to life again, and talked of play-writing, the first pretentious nobody who sat supreme at dinner would differ with him as composedly as he might differ with you and me. Mr. Brinkworth is dead among us; the present age has buried it, without a stone to mark the place. So much for that! Let's get back to Blanche. I suppose you can guess what the painful subject is that's dwelling on her mind? Miss Silvester has baffled me, and baffled the Edinburgh police. Blanche discovered their secret, and she has kept it; and Blanche received that letter this morning."

He pushed Anne's letter across the breakfast-table.

Arnold read it, and handed it back without a word. Viewed by the new light in which he saw Geoffrey's character after the quarrel on the heath, the letter conveyed but one conclusion to his mind. Geoffrey had deserted her.

"Well?" said Sir Patrick. "Do you understand what it means?"

"I understand Blanche's wretchedness when she read it."

He said no more than that. It was plain that no information which he could afford—even if he had considered himself at liberty to give it—would be of the slightest use in assisting Sir Patrick to trace Miss Silvester, under present circumstances. Arnold's natural and just magnification to induce him to break the honorable silence which he had maintained thus far. And —more unfortunately still—assuming the temptation to present itself, Arnold's capacity to resist it had never been so strong a capacity as it was now.

To the two powerful motives which had hitherto tied his tongue—respect for Anne's reputation, and reluctance to reveal to Blanche the deception which he had been practising in practice on her at the inn—to these two motives there was now added a third. The momentous task of learning the confidence which Geoffrey had reposed in him would be doubled enormous if he proved false to his friend after Geoffrey had personally insulted him. The paltry revenge which that false friend had unthinkingly suggested to him of taking, on revenge of which Arnold's nature was simply incapable. Never had his lips been more effectually sealed than at this moment —when his whole future depended on Sir Patrick's discovering the part that he had played in past events at Craig Fernie.

"Yes! yes!" resumed Sir Patrick, impatiently. "Blanche is out of danger—that's quite enough. But here is my niece apparently answerable for this unhappy woman's disappearance. Can you explain what you mean by the last words in the letter?"

"I! Blanche herself is completely mystified. How should I know?"

Answering in those terms, he spoke with perfect sincerity. Anne's vague distrust of the position in which they had been placed themselves, somewhat as the inn had produced no corresponding effect on Arnold at the time. He had not perceived it—he had not even understood it. As a necessary result, not the faintest suspicion of the motive under which Anne was acting existed in his mind now.

Sir Patrick put the letter into his pocket-book, and abandoned all further attempt at interpreting the meaning of it in despair.

"Enough, and more than enough, of groping in the dark," he said. "One point is clear to me after what has happened up stairs this morning. We must assert the position in which Miss Silvester has placed us. I shall give up all further efforts to trace her, and I shall write to-day."

"Surely that will be a dreadful disappointment to Blanche, Sir Patrick?"

"I don't deny it. We must face that result.

"If you are sure there is nothing else to be done, I suppose we must."

"I am not sure of any thing of the sort, Master Arnold! There are two chances still left of discovering Miss Silvester. We must see both of them independent of any thing that Miss Silvester can do to help us. Mr. Bashwood—"

"Then why not try them, Sir? It seems hard to drop Miss Silvester when she is in trouble."

"Mr. Bashwood, I was about to say when you rejoined Sir Patrick. "And we can't run the risk, after what has happened, of appearing to be neglecting Blanche to any further suspense. I have thought of my niece's interests throughout this business, and I never forget them by mind, and decline to agitate her by more experiments, ending (quite possibly) in more failures, in the cases I am thinking of. My interests still. I have no other motive. However numerous my weaknesses may be, I am not yet sufficiently weak-minded as a detective policeman is not one of them. The case, from the police point of view, is by no means lost. Mr. Bashwood is the best witness for Blanche's sake. Instead of encouraging her unnecessarily to see him, under present circumstances, we must apply the remedy suggested by our medical friend."

"What is that to be done?" asked Arnold.

The sly twist of humour began to show itself in Sir Patrick's face.

"Has she nothing to think of in the future, which is a pleasanter subject of reflection than the past? Is not her friend Mr. Bashwood as interested, my young gentleman, as the remedy for her? Let her see him. Those are the drugs in the moral prescription. Can you guess what it is?"

Arnold started to his feet, and brightened into a new being.

"Perhaps you object to be hurried?" said Sir Patrick.

"Object! If Blanche will only consent, I'll take her to church to-day, if she comes down to-night!"

"Thank you!" said Sir Patrick, drily. "Mr. Arnold Brinkworth, may you always be as ready to take Time by the forelock as you are now! Let's see what we can do for you. Time is on—just possible—if Blanche consents (as you say), and if we can hurry the lawyers—that you may be married in three weeks' or a month's time."

"What have the lawyers got to do with it?"

"My good fellow, you are not a prodigy in a novel! This is the most unromantic affair of the sort that ever happened. Here are a young gentleman and a young lady, both rich people; both well matched in birth and character; one of age, and the other marrying with the full consent and approval of her guardian. What is the consequence of this purely prosaic state of things? Lawyers and settlements, of course!"

"Come into the library, Sir Patrick; and I'll soon cover the lawyers!" In Allie of paper, and a dip of ink. "I hereby give every blessed farthing I have got in the world to my dear Blanche.' Sign that; stick a wafer on the side; clap your finger on the wafer; I deliver this as my act and deed;' and there it is—done!"

"It is, really? You are a born legislator. You create and codify your own system all in a breath. Moses-Justinian-Mahomet, give me your arm! There is one atom of sense in what you have just said. Come into the library'—is a suggestion worth attending to. Do you happen, among your other superfluities, to have such a thing as a lawyer about you?"

"I have got two. One in London; and one in Edinburgh."

"We will take the nearest of the two, because we are in a hurry. Who is the Edinburgh lawyer? Pringle of Firt Street? Couldn't be a better man. Come and write to him. Yes, I have got your abstract of a marriage settlement with the brevity of an ancient Roman. I learn to my confusion by an amateur lawyer. Here is my abstract: You are just and generous to Blanche; Blanche is just and generous to you and you both combine to be just and generous together to your children. There is a model settlement! And there are your instructions to Pringle of Pitt Street! Can you do it by yourself? No; of course you can't. Now don't be impatient, Arnold! See the points in their order as they come. You are going to be married; you state to whom; you add that I am the lady's guardian; you give the name and address of my lawyer in Edinburgh; you write your instructions plain and in simple words, and leave details to your legal adviser; you refer the lawyer to each other for information that the deed requirements be prepared as speedily as possible; and you give your address at this house. There and no where else. Do you see it now? Are the rising generation! Oh, the progress we are making in these enlightened modern times! Come, Blanche! your lawyer Blanche, and make her happy, and increase the population—and all without knowing it—in the purest English language. One can only say with the learned Benvorshire, looking out of his window at the illimitable British Empire, "How marvellous are Heaven to its creatures!" Take up the pen. Is dictate! I'll not repeat."

Sir Patrick read the letter over, approved of it, and saw it safe in the box for the post. This done, he peremptorily forbade Arnold to speak to his niece on the subject of the marriage without his express permission. "There's something else's consent to be got," he said, "besides Blanche's consent and mine."

"Lady Lundie?"

"Lady Lundie. Strictly speaking, I am the only authority. But my sister-in-law is Blanche's step-mother, and she is appointed guardian in the event of my death. She has a right to be consulted—in theory, if not in law. Would you like to do it?"

Arnold's face fell. He looked at Sir Patrick in silent misery.

"What! you can't even speak to such a perfectly plain proposition as Lady Lundie? You may have been a very useful fellow at sea. A more helpless young man I never met with on shore. Get out with you into the garden among the other sparrows! Somebody must confront her lyrship. Just say you're—I must."

He pushed Arnold out of the library, and displed meditatively to the knob of his cane. His victory disappeared now that he was alone. His experience of Lady Lundie's character told him that, in attempting to carry out the proposed arrangement for hurrying Blanche's marriage, he was undertaking no easy task. "I suppose," mused Sir Patrick, "because of his late bereavement," I suppose poor Tom had some way of managing her. I wish I had a regular appetite for it. Had been the wife of a bricklayer, she is the sort of woman who would have been kept in perfect order by the strictest and regular application of her husband's fist. But Tom wasn't a bricklayer. I wonder how Tom died?" After a little time thinking on this point Sir Patrick gave up the problem as beyond human solution. "Poor Tom! he's dead. I'll ask my own mother-wit must help me to do it."

In that resigned frame of mind he hobbled out of the library, and knocked at the door of Lady Lundie's boudoir.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SEVENTH.

OUTWITTED.

SIR PATRICK found his sister-in-law immersed in domestic business. Her ladyship's correspondence was waiting for her; her ladyship's household bills and ledgers; her ladyship's Diary and Memorandum-book. Every one of the implements of ladyship's desk, envelope-case, match-box, and taper candlestick (all in ebony and silver); her ladyship herself, irreproachably dressed in correct morning costume, blessed with perfect health both of the serviceous and the principles; absolutely void of vice, and formidably full of virtue, presented, to every properly-constituted mind, the most imposing representation of the principle—the British Matron on her throne, asking the world in general, When will you produce the like of me?"

"I am afraid I disturb you," said Sir Patrick, "I am a perfectly idle person. Shall I look in a little later?"

Lady Lundie put her hand to her head, and smiled faintly.

"A little pressure here, Sir Patrick. Pray sit down. Duty finds me current: Duty finds me cheerful; Duty finds me accessible. From a poor, weak woman, Duty must expect no more. Here, at my desk, Duty (ladyship consulted her scarlet memorandum-book) "I have got it here, under its proper head, distinguished by initial letters. P.—the poor. No. H.M.—heathen missions. No. V.T.A.—Visitors to arrive. No. P.I.P.—Here it is: private interview with Patrick. Will you forgive me the little harmless familiarity of omitting your title? Thank you! You are always so good. I am quite at your service when you like to begin. If it's any thing painful, pray don't hesitate. I am quite prepared."

With that intimation her ladyship threw herself back in her chair, with her elbows on the arms, and her fingers joined at the tips, as if she was receiving a deputation. "Yes?" she said, interrogatively. Sir Patrick paid a private tribute of pity to his late brother's memory, and entered on his business.

"You won't call it a painful matter," he began. "Let us say it's a matter of domestic anxiety. Blanche—"

Lady Lundie emitted a faint scream, and put her hand over her eyes.

"Sir Patrick!" cried her ladyship, in a tone of touching remonstrance. "Oh, Sir Patrick, must you?"

"Yes. I must."

Lady Lundie's magnificent eyes looked up at the hidden roof of human sympathy, and was lodged in the ceiling. The hidden court looked down at Lady Lundie, and saw—Duty administering to a sick patient against her will.

"Go on, Sir Patrick. The motto of woman is Self-sacrifice. You shn't see how you distress me. Go on."

Sir Patrick went on impassively—without betraying the slightest expression of sympathy or surprise.

He was about to refer to the nervous attack from which Blanche has suffered this morning," he said. "May I ask whether you have been informed of the cause which has led to that distressing attack?"

"Where?" exclaimed Lady Lundie, with a sudden bound in her chair, and a sudden development of vocal power to correspond. "The thing I abominate from injudicious English lips—cruel, cruel behaviour I was prepared to pass over! And Sir Patrick hints on it! Innocently—don't say he did on purpose—innocently, I trust it!"

"Hints on what, my dear Madam?"

"On Blanche's behaviour this morning. Blanche's heartless secrecy. Blanche's undutiful silence. I repeat the words: Heartless secrecy. Undutiful silence."

"Allow me for one moment, Lady Lundie—"

"Allow me, Sir Patrick! I have been how unwilling I am to speak of it. Heaven knows that not a word of reference to it escaped my lips. If you leave me no choice except the distress of the household, as a Christian woman, as the widow of your dear brother, as a mother to this unhappy girl, I must state the facts. I know you mean well; I know you wish to spare me. Please (unless I am mistaken) don't."

Sir Patrick bowed, and submitted. (If he had only been a bricklayer! and if Lady Lundie had only been his wife! How ladyship unscrupulously was, the strongest person of the two!)

"I said just now, Sir Patrick, for your sake," said Lady Lundie, "over the horrors—I can not, with the best wish to spare you, conscientiously keep back from you any other minor matter that took place up stairs. The moment I heard that Blanche was ill I went to her room. Before I always find me ready, Sir Patrick, to my dying day. Shocking as the whole thing was, I preserved calmly every one of the symptoms of my self-possession. I closed my ears to the profane violence of the language. I used the necessary remedies, as an English gentlewoman at the head of her household. It was only when I distinctly heard the name of a person, never to be mentioned again in my family circle, issue (if I may use the expression) from Blanche's lips that I began to feel myself unnerved. I said to myself, 'Hedgkins, this is not Hysteria. This is a possession of the devil. Send for the clergyman!'"

Chloroform, applied in the capacity of an exorcism, was entirely new to Sir Patrick. He suppressed his private sense of amusement effectually. Lady Lundie went on:

"Mr. Orde is an excellent person—but Hopkins has a tongue. She met our distinguished medical guest in the corridor, and told him. He was so good as to come to me. I was shocked to trouble him to act in his professional capacity under the circumstances which existed; or, in my house. Besides, I considered it more a case for a clergyman than for a medical man. However, there was the help for it if Hopkins's tongue. I requested our eminent friend to favor us with—I think the exact scientific term is—a diagnosis. He took the opportunity which was only to be expected from a person in his profession. He prescribed. I right? Did he prognose? or did he diagnose? A habit of speaking correctly is so important, Sir Patrick; and I should be so grieved to misread you!"

